emerging crises in various parts of the world and is draining the pool of available troops both for the world body and for NATO." This growth "marks the end of a retreat in funding for new missions by the United States," as, "Despite its initial reservations about the virtues of U.N. nation-building, the Bush administration has led efforts to reinforce existing operations and create new ones for Haiti, Liberia, Sudan and Lebanon. It has repeatedly approved operations in countries where it has few national interests." U.S. ambassador to the United Nations John R. Bolton "said that the Bush administration continues to have misgivings about the organization's fitness to effectively manage its peacekeeping operations but that a proliferation of crises has forced U.S. support."

Annan Said To Have Brought Relevance Back To UN. Author James Traub writes in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K) that Secretary-General of the UN, Kofi Annan has "restored the relevance of the U.N. The new U.N. head brought Washington back into the fold through a combination of unflagging solicitude and gentle prodding." Also, his "willingness to upbraid African leaders on behalf of Western principles…gave him the freedom to make demands of the West on issues of development." However, "a secretary-general, for all that we romanticize him, can do very little to alter the fundamental calculations of states. As the United Nations begins in earnest to choose a replacement for Annan, we must bear in mind that a secretary-general is, in the end, a creature of the geopolitical moment," and "the U.N., at least that part dealing with issues of peace and security, cannot be any more effective than its most powerful members want or permit it to be."

Author Argues That Despite UN's Flaws, There Is No Viable Alternative. Author David Rieff writes in the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), "In a world in which the so-called clash of civilizations is no longer an academic hypothesis but increasingly a reality, at least in the minds and hearts of enormous numbers of ordinary Muslims and Christians who each see the other as bent on all-out war…the limits of what Western militaries can accomplish politically has become obvious" and "unilateralism — and the reliance on 'coalitions of the willing' — which seemed so promising in the late-1990s, has turned out not to be a viable alternative to the U.N. system after all." It turns out "there is really no viable alternative to the U.N. … How else to explain U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton — a man who is on record as having said that if 10 stories were removed from the U.N. headquarters building no one would notice the difference — behaving these days like a U.N. booster?" Thus, "the U.N.'s future is perfectly viable because no one has a good alternative to propose."

Goldberg Argues For Confirming John Bolton. Jonah Goldberg writes in his column in he Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), "I speak now not so much in praise of John Bolton as in dispraise of Boltophobia." John "Bolton (like most Americans) thinks that the U.N. is the problem, while those infected with Boltophobia think that it's the solution -- and that the U.S. is the problem." Bolton did "a first-rate job as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations during his yearlong interim appointment," and "most Americans agree with Bolton that the U.N. is a cesspool of its own crapulence, stealing American tax dollars intended for global do-goodery while working against American interests." We can keep Boltophobia "from controlling our lives. And that means Bolton should be confirmed."

Author Urges Senate To Reject Bolton. Stephen Schlesinger, author or "Act of Creation," on the founding of the United Nations, writes in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), "Bolton has had 12 months to show his stuff. And frankly, there is still no evidence to suggest that he deserves a full-time posting. Bolton has never been a diplomat — which, among his supporters, is regarded as a mark of honor." He "has for a long time been an excessive and unrestrained critic of the U.N.," and "His record since taking over as ambassador in August 2005 has shown that his adversarial stance toward the institution has not softened." Bolton also "has, on occasion, reportedly sneaked around his own nominal boss, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to Vice President Dick Cheney." Additionally, "he doesn't get along well with our allies. His bristling nature has left many bruised feelings among his colleagues. His accomplishments are marginal at best." For "harmonize differing viewpoints and work out compromises to further U.S. national security interests," it is "a serious error…appointing a Jacobin to work inside a collegial global body." Bolton as our Ambassador to the UN is "a blemish on our nation. His nomination should be rejected again by the Senate."

Cambodia Welcomes Chinese Investments. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Lee, 918K) reports, "For centuries, the Kingdom of Cambodia has tried to fend off greater powers such as Thailand, Vietnam and France. But today Phnom Penh is welcoming the Chinese with open arms, praising Beijing as a government that offers its largess unconditionally." The Times adds, "Some Western diplomats see China's growing influence here as a threat to American political interests in the region "

China's Baidu Search Engine Prospers Under Government Censorship. The New York Times (9/17, Barboza, 1.21M) profiles Chinese search engine Baidu. The Times writes, "But Baidu's evolution…offer[s] textbook examples of the payoffs and perils of doing business in China and suggest that Baidu may prove to be far more resilient than some analysts believe. … In exchange for letting censors oversee its Web site, Baidu has sealed its dominance with support from the Chinese government, which regularly blocks Google here and imposes strict rules and censorship on other foreign Internet companies. In addition, analysts say, entrepreneurs in China have a knack for pummeling American Internet giants."

India, Pakistan Agree To Resume Peace Talks. The New York Times/AP (9/17) reports, "Pakistan and India agreed Saturday to restart peace talks" after the Pakistani president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, and the Indian prime minister, Manmohan Singh, working "out the details Saturday morning on the sidelines of the Nonaligned Movement summit meeting in Havana," agreeing "on cabinet-level talks." Both called "their meeting as a breakthrough for peace," and "Mr. Singh also said he had accepted an invitation to travel to Pakistan to further the process." A fuller version of the AP (9/17, Arrington) story adds, "Their joint statement said they had a 'cordial, frank exchange of views on all aspects of India and Pakistan relations' and they 'strongly condemn all acts of terrorism.'" The AFP (9/17, Moser) notes, "India had earlier indicated a condemnation of terrorism was key to reaching an agreement on the resumption of negotiations over Kashmir." Indian foreign secretary designate Shivshankar Menon noted "the agreement on terrorism 'has made it possible for us to clear resumption of the dialogue.'"

Russian Regulator's Murder Demonstrates Upper Class's Vulnerability. he New York Times (9/17, Chivers, 1.21M) reports, "Violent deaths continuously punctuate the civic discourse in Russia. The list of victims and motives is grim and long: contract hits on rivals, bombs to settle business disputes, racist attacks on laborers from the Caucasus or Central Asia and students from Africa or South America, and the almost regular killings of police officers in Russian republics where ethnic and religious tensions are inflamed. … But the murder last week of Andrei Kozlov, one of Russia's top bank regulators, served as a reminder that even the upper strata of society here are not immune from the vicious rules of the Russian street."

Hoagland Says Democracy Not "Totally Dead" In Russia. In his column in the Washington Post (9/17, B7, 748K), Jim Hoagland writes, "That frustrating zigzag pattern is at work today in Russia as President Vladimir Putin deepens an authoritarian transformation underwritten by surging oil and gas revenue that buys him public calm. But the political and economic centralization he manages may carry the seeds of its own demise. This transformation of Russia -- as dispiriting as it has seemed recently to many in the West and here -- is not carved in stone. The deep concern that the Kremlin's rulers show for the opinion of their relatively well-educated public is one sign that not even they believe democracy is totally dead here."

Chavez Recommends Books. The New York Times (9/17, Romero, 1.21M) reports that often, when Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez "drops the names of books he is reading or has grown to love, giving insight into the various intellectual and literary influences on his thinking," including an "anti-Bush staples": "Dude, Where's My Country?" by filmmaker Michael Moore. This practice "reflects what seems a wider strategy on his part: he seems determined to articulate and spread a national ideology."

Obrador Vows To Set Up Own Mexican Government. The New York Times (9/17, McKinley, 1.21M) reports, "More than 150,000 supporters of" losing presidential candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador "flooded into the capital's historic square on Saturday and declared him 'the legitimate president' of Mexico." At a "massive rally" that "seemed intended to keep Mr. López Obrador and his political agenda from fading out of the national debate, the crowd "unanimously denied Mr. Calderón had won. They declared Mr. López Obrador president, asked him to form a cabinet and supported a constitutional convention." Obrador "vowed to set up his own government and to fight against 'a band of white-collar crooks and corrupt politicians' who he has said stole the election from him."

The AP (9/17, Adams) adds, "Lopez Obrador said he hoped to mass as many as 1 million people for the event. However, the Zocalo is only accommodates fewer than 200,000 people, according to local news media and an architects association." The AFP (9/17, Peyrille) notes, "Although Obrador lost the election by a narrow margin, his protest campaign has drawn dwindling support among the wider public. A poll released last week showed some 74 percent accept the decision of the electoral court declaring Calderon the winner."

The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Enriquez, 918K) is more sympathetic to Obrador, noting that "Although it was unclear how Lopez Obrador would establish a parallel government, or whether the vote was merely a political threat, the rally was a strong rebuke of National Action Party candidate Felipe Calderon." In contrast to the AFP's poll numbers, the Times refrences Obrador's "party's growing political clout."

Election Could Bring Political Trouble For Merkel. The Kansas City Star (9/17, Graham, 278K) reports, "Elections in a northeastern German state this weekend could prove a breakthrough for a far-right party and bring more woe for Chancellor Angela Merkel. Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania, a depressed state of isolated hamlets and tree-lined lakes in former East Germany, elects a new legislature on Sunday, as does the capital Berlin. Polls indicate the Social Democrat governors of both areas should hold on to power in coalition with the former communist Left Party. But the extreme-right National Democratic Party is expected to make significant gains in Mecklenburg, clearing the 5-percent vote hurdle to enter the state's parliament for the first time."

Algeria Turns to Reconciliation Program To End Violence. The Washington Post (9/17, A17, Whitlock, 748K) reports, "[I]n an effort to bring a final end to violence that began in 1992, the Algerian government is pinning its hopes on an ambitious national reconciliation program, which grants official forgiveness to combatants if they set aside their weapons. Under terms of the reconciliation, which expired Aug. 31 but might be extended, about 2,500 prisoners convicted or accused of terrorism have gone free. Also covered by the amnesty are members of the Algerian security services, blamed for the disappearance of 8,000 civilians and accused of systematic torture. The only people not eligible: rapists and those responsible for mass murder or planting bombs in public places."

Kristof Highlights Maternal Mortality Rate In Africa. In a column in the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M), Nicholas Kristof writes that "it should be an international scandal that the number of women dying in pregnancy worldwide has been stuck at a half-million for a quarter-century. Indeed, here in Cameroon the maternal mortality rate has risen since 1998, and over all an African woman now has one chance in 20 of dying in pregnancy. In much of the world, the most dangerous thing a woman can do is to become pregnant." Kristof adds, "These women die because they are poor and female and rural -- the most overlooked and disposable people throughout the developing world. Politics also complicates Western efforts to help. The United Nations Population Fund has helped lead the effort to reduce maternal deaths -- yet the Bush administration has cut off all U.S. funding for the agency because of (false) accusations that it supports abortions in China."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush, GOP Senators Remain At Odds Over Terrorist Interrogation Rules. President Bush in his radio address reiterated his call for Congress to pass a bill clarifying rules for interrogating terrorists. Bush and Senate Majority Leader Frist signaled their expectations that common ground could be reached, but GOP opposition to Bush's proposal was described as increasing in the Washington Post and New York Times. The Post, Times and Los Angeles Times all published editorials staunchly opposed to Bush's counter-terrorism policies Sunday morning and echoing the same them that Bush had overstepped his authority and suggesting he was using national security as an election issue.

The AP (9/17, Riechmann) reports, "President Bush is standing firm in his battle to get Congress to approve the White House plan for detaining, interrogating and prosecuting suspected terrorists. The Senate, though, isn't backing away from its plan either." In his radio address he "said his proposal provides clear rules for U.S. personnel involved in detaining and questioning alleged terrorists held by the CIA" and described how interrogation had been used to successfully prevent terrorist attacks.

Bloomberg (9/17, Dodge) reports Bush "urged Congress to pass two measures he called essential to winning the war on terrorism." Bush said, "There is debate about the specific proposals in this bill, and my administration will work with Congress to find common ground."

The AP (9/17, Davenport) reports, "Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist…said Saturday he has to do more to get Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., in line with other Republicans and the White House on how terrorist suspects should be prosecuted." The AP notes, "Getting his GOP members in line 'is a fundamental challenge from a leadership standpoint,' said Frist, a potential candidate for president in 2008. He said he expects a compromise to emerge in the next two weeks, even though McCain and Graham haven't budged."

GOP Opposition To Bush Over Interrogations Seen As Growing. While the wire services noted Bush's radio message, other prominent newspapers ignored it and focused on the political debate, describing GOP opposition to Bush's interrogation policies as stronger than expected. The New York Times (9/17, A1, Hulse, Zernike, Stolberg, 1.21M) in a front page story reports that "Bush seems equally determined to win provisions he says are needed to interrogate and prosecute terrorism suspects.. … Warner, like his two colleagues, has a network of high-ranking current and retired military officers who provide regular guidance and support. While he has been consulting them privately, some are expected to weigh in publicly in the days ahead. One aide said on Saturday that the number of Senate Republicans behind the three senators was widening beyond the 8 or 10 they had anticipated, with lawmakers -- heavily influenced by Mr. Powell's stance -- preparing to soon go public with their views." And "two senior Bush administration officials acknowledged that the White House had underestimated the depth of opposition Mr. Bush's proposal would provoke. They also said they had focused mostly on gaining Mr. Graham's support and mistakenly believed they had it, based on statements he made about the Geneva Conventions in Senate hearings. A Republican senator separately described the clash between the White House and Mr. Warner's group as 'a train wreck.'"

And the Washington Post (9/17, A5, Weisman, 748K) in an article titled "Tribunal Dispute Could Ruin GOP Strategy" says the debate between the White House and GOP opponents "could ruin" the GOP "legislative strategy" to use national security as a campaign issue. House Majority Leader John Boehner said "It's the legislative process. It's never predictable" and he "and other Republicans remain confident that they are on the right track. Republicans point to recent polls showing a slight uptick in the president's popularity and say that the focus on national security issues is working." Yet "misgivings over the agenda set out by the president and GOP leaders are growing. Rep. Steve Buyer (R-Ind.) said he told Bush on Thursday that he should heed the military's top uniformed lawyers, who have opposed some provisions of the president's tribunal plan. Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.), one of several moderate Northeasterners in tough reelection campaigns, said he has no problem with Bush's bills. He is likely to vote against them." Meanwhile "the showdown between Bush and McCain is grabbing the spotlight from Republican initiatives that were supposed to undergird their case that they are the stronger party on national and homeland security."

Top House Armed Services Democrat Will Seek To Amend Bill To Reflect Senators' Concerns. The AP (9/17, Riechmann) notes, "Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, supports a House bill that takes the administration's position to move the process along, but he said he will attempt to amend the measure next week to look more like the McCain-Warner-Graham measure. He said the Senate bill would be less likely to be challenged by the Supreme Court as unlawful and violating the nation's treaty obligations. 'I don't want to give any terrorist a free pass or get-out-of-jail-free card,' Skelton said."

Romney Supports Bush Terrorist Interrogation Plan. Meeting with GOP officials in Columbia, SC the AP

(9/17, Davenport) quotes Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney saying "I'm foursquare behind the president on this. … We need to provide to the interrogators the definitive rules that they need."

CIA Action On Hold During Political Debate Over Interrogations. The AP (9/17, Shrader) reports that while the "CIA believed it was operating lawfully in detaining and interrogating 96 suspected terrorists" the Supreme Court ruling has "demolished that legal foundation" and for "Bush, the CIA and their allies, the law urgently needs to be changed to protect the interrogation program, which they consider one of the most important ways to deter attacks against the United States." The AP continues, "Bush administration officials say the Justice Department has deemed the CIA's practices lawful. In addition, the senior U.S. official said the House and Senate Intelligence committees have now been told everything about the CIA's overseas prisons and interrogation program, except the countries where the prisons were." Yet "a congressional aide disputed that. The aide said briefings for the Senate committee took place only recently and that the administration has denied the committee access to materials it needs to fulfill its oversight role of the CIA. For example, the committee's top Democrat, West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller, has not been able to see the Justice Department's legal opinions."

Future Of Detainees At Guantanamo Remains Uncertain. Investigative reporter Tim Golden in a 10,464 word article in the New York Times Magazine (9/17) chronicles the service of Col. Mike Bumgarner as "warden of Guantanamo Bay," starting in April 2005. When "Bumgarner took command at Guantánamo, information had emerged to suggest that many of the detainees were not, in fact, the hardened terrorists whom Pentagon officials had claimed to be holding there. Bumgarner did not doubt that his new prisoners were dangerous, but neither was he wary of getting to know them better." He "moved quickly to try to reduce tensions in the camp" but the "detainees did not respond as the military authorities hoped." After a disruption caused by a Saudi named Shaker Aamer, Baumgarner sought to defuse the situation in a meeting. Their "conversation centered on Aamer's thoughts on the detention operation and what could be done to improve it. The Saudi's ideas, it seemed, were perhaps not so far from Hood's. 'His implication was that if you applied the Geneva Conventions fully, everything would be just fine in the camps,' Bumgarner recalled." After "Bush announced broad changes in policies for the detention and prosecution of terror suspects on Sept. 6, he said the government 'will move toward the day when we can eventually close the detention facility at Guantánamo Bay.' But by sending 14 important C.I.A. captives there and pushing to try prisoners before reconstituted military tribunals, he appeared to be extending the life of the detention center for the foreseeable future."

Former US POWs Offer Mixed Reaction To Bush Interrogation Proposal. Howard Goodman in his column in the South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/17, 265K) titled "Don't Jettison Geneva Conventions, Ex-POWs Say" writes that at the "National POW/MIA Recognition Day…about 35 people gathered in the chapel of the VA Medical Center in West Palm Beach." 17 were former POWs. Goodman notes, "We live in a complicated time, when the Bush White House is pressing for permission to loosen time-honored rules regarding our treatment of war captives. There's some logic to this. As Bill Acuri, a Vietnam POW, noted, the Geneva Conventions make sense in terms of opposing armies. 'And the terrorists don't have an army.'" But other Veterans disagreed an Goodman trusts "ex-POWs on this more than a president and vice president who never were imprisoned and never went to war."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/17, 399K) reports, "The fact that the U.S. government has virtually abandoned the designation POW has raised the ire of some former POWs and activists who are keeping alive the issue of missing Americans from all wars." And "Retired Army Col. Ben Purcell of Clarkesville, who spent more than five years in North Vietnamese prison camps, said he never considered himself anything other than a POW, despite the best efforts of his interrogators to convince him otherwise." Purcell said, "I became a prisoner at war. I argued with my interrogators, I went on hunger strikes and I tried to escape." Yet "he found strength in knowing he was a POW and should have been treated according to the articles of the Geneva Conventions."

Bush Accused Of Not Seeking Consensus On National Security. Ron Brownstein in his column titled "Bush Fails To Recapture The Nation's Post-9/11 Unity" in the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K) argues that "the degree of division over national security five years after Sept. 11 is extraordinary." Unlike the Vietnam War, "the fight against Islamic extremism is much more like World War II, when almost all Americans condemned the goals, methods and beliefs of our fascist enemies." Brownstein states, "Bush's decision to invade Iraq amid ambivalence at home and widespread resistance abroad was obviously a critical fork in the road." But "Bush simply hasn't placed a high priority on establishing consensus for his national security strategy." Bush "has provided Democrats and even skeptical Republicans little voice in shaping his national security strategy. Bush has also shown himself to be willing, even eager, to frame national security debates in ways that maximize their political impact." The loss after the 9/11 attacks "is now matched by the tear in the sense of common purpose that inspired so much of the country five years ago."

Yoo Defends Bush Effort To Expand Executive Authority. University of California at Berkeley law school professor John Yoo, a deputy assistant attorney general from 2001 to 2003, in an op-ed in the New York Times (9/17,

1.21M) defends Bush's policies arguing that "the founders intended that wrongheaded or obsolete legislation and judicial decisions would be checked by presidential action, just as executive overreaching is to be checked by the courts and Congress." Yoo concludes, "Congress has for years been avoiding its duty to revamp or repeal outmoded parts of bygone laws in the light of contemporary threats. We have needed energy in the executive branch to fill in that gap. Congress now must act to guide our counterterror policy, but it should not try to micromanage the executive branch, particularly in war, where flexibility of action is paramount."

Three Top US Newspapers Oppose Bush Counter-Terrorsim Policies. The New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) in an editorial argues Bush has the authority to monitor and interrogate terrorists under current laws and writes it is "struck by how often" Bush "acts as though there were not two sides to a debate. We have lost count of the number of times he has said Americans have to choose between protecting the nation precisely the way he wants, and not protecting it at all." Bush "is following a script for the elections: terrify Americans into voting Republican. But behind that seems to be a deeply seated conviction that under his leadership, America is right and does not need the discipline of rules. He does not seem to understand that the rules are what makes this nation as good as it can be."

The Washington Post (9/17, B6, 748K) editorializes, "Rather than admit that he wants to legalize disappearances and torture, Mr. Bush ominously warns that 'the program' won't continue unless Congress passes his bill. He says 'time's running out,' even though it's not. There are no detainees in the CIA prisons at the moment, according to the president, and the only clock running out is that measuring the midterm election campaign. There is no need for Congress to act in the next two weeks. But if it does, the clear answer to Mr. Bush's question, endorsed by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), former secretary of state Colin L. Powell and a host of other responsible Republican and military leaders, is 'no.' For both moral and practical reasons, the country should reject this fundamental violation of its principles."

The Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K) in an editorial writes, "Bush made full use of the 9/11 anniversary last week. In his speeches and remarks, he reminded the nation of the stakes involved in what he calls the war on terror, and he conveyed a renewed sense of urgency to prevent attacks and bring those responsible for 9/11 to justice. Yet if his goal was also to pressure Congress into acting as a rubber stamp for the administration's questionable legal tactics in conducting this war, it was a disappointing week for the president -- and a heartening one for anyone outside the White House."

Former Detainee Urges Congress To Defend Detainees' Rights. Former Guantanamo detainee Abu Bakker Qassim now in Albania in an op-ed in the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) writes, "I was locked up and mistreated for being in the wrong place at the wrong time during America's war in Afghanistan. Like hundreds of Guantánamo detainees, I was never a terrorist or a soldier. … Pakistani bounty hunters sold me and 17 other Uighurs to the United States military like animals for $5,000 a head. The Americans made a terrible mistake." Qassim concludes, "I feel great sadness for the families who lost their loved ones on that horrible day five years ago. And I would be sadder still to see the freedom-loving American people walk away from their respect for the rule of law. I want America to be a strong and respected nation in the world. Only then can it continue to be the source of hope for the hopeless — like my people.

Yemen Arrests Militants. The AP (9/17, Abu-nasr) reports, "Four suspected al-Qaida members who were plotting attacks for Yemen's capital were arrested Saturday, a day after security forces foiled near-simultaneous attempts to blow up two oil installations." The Yemeni interior minister "said the suspects had links to the four suicide bombers who tried to strike the oil installations Friday but were killed during the attacks." He linked the attacks to a videotape by Al Qaeda No. 2 leader Ayman al-Zawahiri that threatened "attacks in the Persian Gulf region and on facilities he accused of stealing Muslim oil."

Tribesmen Pressure Yemen Through Well-Treated Hostages. The AP (9/17, Abu-nasr) reports, "Captives in Yemen get hospitality. While militants in places like Iraq hold and sometimes murder prisoners, Yemeni tribes take hostages to pressure the government for relatively simple demands, such as freeing clan members from jail or improving roads, hospitals and schools." Former hostages "tell of sightseeing trips, parting gifts of pendants, incense or traditional curved daggers, wine served with dinner despite a ban on liquor and afternoons spent shooting — a popular sport among tribesmen."

Definition Of "Moderate" Muslim Debated. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Watanabe, 918K) reports, "Who is a moderate Muslim? … The question has come under intense debate since 9/11 as the public struggles to distinguish peaceful Muslims from Al Qaeda terrorists, and is at the heart of two Southern California skirmishes over who represents moderate Islam." According to the report, "In a dinner scheduled for tonight, the American Jewish Congress plans to honor" Tashbih Sayyed, a journalist based in Alta Loma, Calif., who praises Israel's behavior toward Palestinians as tolerant and criticizes Muslims for corrupting Islam. Also, four other will be honored "for what it sees as their friendly attitudes toward Israel and courageous efforts to reform Islam. Gary Ratner, executive director of the Congress' Western region office in Los Angeles, said the tribute is part of the organization's global efforts to reach out to moderate Muslims in Pakistan, Indonesia, Albania and elsewhere, including sponsoring a dinner in New York last year for Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf." According to the report, "The organization's choice of honorees, however, has offended some Muslims, in part because three of them no longer practice the faith. In contrast, a different award has offended some Jewish sensibilities: the decision by the Los Angeles County Human Relations Commission to honor" Maher Hathout, a Los Angeles Muslim leader who has promoted interfaith relations and women's equality but denounced Israel as a brutal apartheid regime, "as a model of harmonious interfaith relations."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Extensive Intelligence Outsourcing Raises Concerns. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Miller, 918K) reports, "Largely because of the demands of the war on terrorism and the drawn-out conflict in Iraq, U.S. spy agencies have turned to unprecedented numbers of outside contractors to perform jobs once the domain of government-employed analysts and secret agents." Concern has arisen out of the fear "that using contractors to do spying work carries security risks and higher costs."

Abraxas Corporation Epitomizes Today's Intelligence Contractors. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Miller, 918K) reports on Abraxas, a company "that has assembled a deep roster of CIA veterans to handle a wide range of clandestine assignments -- including secret work for an elite team of overseas case officers." Some critics question its role in the CIA's nonofficial cover (NOC) program, saying "that whatever talent Abraxas had assembled, outsourcing any work in such a sensitive program posed an inherent security risk."

Scholar Faults Lack Of Intell Reform Since 9/11. In an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), professor Amy Zegart writes, "Five years after the most devastating terrorist attack in U.S. history, all our worst intelligence deficiencies remain. Intelligence is spread across 16 agencies that operate as warring tribes more than a team." Despite the creation of a director of national intelligence, "the Pentagon has quietly expanded its intelligence activities at home and abroad." Those Pentagon units operate "without warrants, presidential authorizations or meaningful supervision by the director of national intelligence and Congress." The CIA and FBI have not mended their ways. Zegart warns, "We should not confuse luck with effectiveness."

Anthrax Investigation Has Yielded Few Results. The Houston Chronicle (9/17, Rosenberg, 535K) reports, "Five years after anthrax killed five people and introduced America to high-tech bioterrorism, one of the biggest crime mysteries of our times remains unsolved. FBI agents and U.S. postal inspectors have pursued hundreds of leads and interviewed scores of scientists who work with the deadly anthrax bacteria, but the investigation now appears to be languishing." According to the report, "The murders-by-germ in the weeks immediately after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks added to the nation's anxieties and triggered a massive hunt for the perpetrator who used the mail to spread the bacteria. Hundreds of FBI personnel worked the case at the outset, struggling to discern whether the Sept. 11 al-Qaida attacks and the anthrax murders were connected before eventually concluding that they were not." According to the report, "A senior law enforcement official familiar with the investigation insisted that 'the investigation is still ongoing and intensely active.' The official, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly, said there 'are a number of pending and very important leads that are being pursued.'"

Federal Transportation ID Card Initiative Stalls. The Washington Post (9/17, A3, Hsu, 748K) reports, "A Bush administration initiative to secure the nation's ports is bogged down in industry opposition, technology flaws and evidence that it fails to safeguard workers' privacy, according to industry and government analysts. The rocky launch of the Transportation Worker Identification Credential threatens to delay what Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff declared his highest priority after the Dubai port controversy in February: starting by year's end to screen the backgrounds of 750,000 U.S. workers at critical sea, air and land transportation facilities, and issuing them microchip-equipped ID cards." According to the report, "More broadly, the long-overdue ID program foreshadows concerns that hundreds of millions of Americans soon may encounter as the government starts issuing similarly equipped driver's licenses, passports, federal-worker badges and immigrant-guest-worker cards in coming years."

Proposed 'Freedom Tower' At Ground Zero Closer To Reality, Though Questions Remain. The New York Times (9/17, Bagli, 1.21M) reports, "The federal and New York State governments have tentatively agreed to become anchor tenants in the Freedom Tower, the tallest, most symbolic and most scrutinized skyscraper project at ground zero, under a plan expected to be announced today by Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and the governors of New York and New Jersey. The agreements, which would cover about 1 million of the 2.6 million square feet in the building, are a significant step forward in the development of the tower, which is seen by Gov. George E. Pataki and others as a symbol of the city's resilience, but regarded by some critics as folly." According to the report, "The building has been bedeviled by squabbling and delays, as well as questions about design and security and whether there would be enough demand for office space downtown to keep it financially sound. The Freedom Tower, which would rise to the emblematic height of 1,776 feet, including the antenna, is one of four office towers planned for the 16-acre site." According to the report, "The leading candidate to succeed Mr. Pataki, Eliot Spitzer, the Democratic attorney general, has questioned the economic viability of the tower, calling it a 'white elephant.' … Final approval of the project by the Port Authority may be months away, which could put it in the hands of the next New York governor, who takes office in January."

Federal Aid Bypasses Renters In New Orleans. The New York Times (9/17, Saulny, Rivlin, 1.21M) reports, "As billions in housing aid begins to flow here [New Orleans] in the next few weeks, most of it will go to homeowners, who have been appointed by city officials as the true architects of this city's recovery, despite the fact that roughly half the city's residents rented housing before Hurricane Katrina. The renters of New Orleans, it seems, are on their own. Rents are skyrocketing across the city, up an average of 39 percent since Hurricane Katrina. The city has announced that it plans to refurbish only a small fraction of its traditional public housing units. … Though some aid has been set aside for landlords, many lower-income residents who say they are unable to return have been priced out."

National Guard Remain In New Orleans Due To Rising Crime Rates. The AP (9/17) reports National Guard troops and state police will patrol New Orleans "through December, Gov. Kathleen Blanco said Saturday at a summit of law enforcement officials and crime experts called to address a spate of killings marring the recovery from Hurricane Katrina. … Police are on pace to recover as many illegal firearms this year as they did in the two previous years -- even though half as many people live in the city now, said Robert Browning, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. But in a positive sign, court and prison repairs should be done next month, an official said, which means the city's crippled criminal justice system will be able to process its influx of suspects more efficiently."

WAR NEWS:

Jim Baker Said To Lead "Last Hope" Of Salvaging Iraq. The Washington Post (9/17, A23, Abramowitz, 748K) reports, "Is Jim Baker bailing out the Bushes once again?" Former secretary of state James A. Baker III "visited Baghdad two weeks ago to take a look at the vexing political and military situation," as co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which is "widely viewed" by "foreign policy elites" as "perhaps the last hope for a midcourse correction in a venture they generally agree has been a disaster" – and only due to "the involvement of Baker." While "Baker has offered some hints of his thinking -- and his dismay with the way the Iraq occupation has been handled by the administration," he "is not revealing much of his hand."

Professor Argues Against "Fallacy" Of Citing Sunk Costs To Stay In Iraq. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), psychology professor Barry Schwartz argues, "Psychologists, decision scientists and economists ... tell us that it's a mistake to continue with a project or an activity because of what you have already invested in it." Therefore, whatever the US ultimately decides to do in Iraq (stay or leave), it "is unacceptable to justify continued involvement in Iraq or any other conflict on the grounds that we 'owe' it to those who have already fallen."

Andrew Krepinevich Urges Bush To Use "Basic Military Smarts." In the New York Daily News (9/17, 729K), military pundit Andrew Krepinevich writes, "The sad but simple truth: In many ways this war is still being fought with a 'business as usual' approach, and that's hurting our chances of victory." There is no single individual "in overall control of the war effort," nor is there a "war cabinet" that meets daily. Krepinevich warns, "Fixing the problems of unity of command, of playing merry-go-round with generals, of taking a pickup team approach to the adviser effort and of refusing to demand some sacrifices here at home may not guarantee success, but the administration's failures on all fronts are a down payment on failure."

Training Iraqi Forces Is A Logistical Challenge. The AP (9/16, Santana) reports, "While the U.S. training program has made great progress teaching Iraqi soldiers how to fight, the force still relies on American help for distributing supplies — a dependency that is another obstacle to sending U.S. troops home." Iraqi forces, ironically, lack fuel for their tanks, as well as ammunition and spare parts. In addition, their logistical units "are still understaffed," because of an earlier emphasis on training combat units to fight Sunni insurgents.

More Troops Would Help "Somewhat" In Anbar. In a Week in Review piece for the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M), reporter Thom Shanker writes that, if the US indeed sent more forces to violent Anbar province, "The answer is, they would help, in the short term. But many military analysts also warn that sending in another division — anywhere from 12,00 to 15,000 troops — could create more problems." Drawbacks include a possible perception that "among many Iraqis that the United States is a clumsy and violent occupying power."

Columnist Challenges GOP To Increase Troop Levels. Frank Rich in his column in the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) suggests "a thought experiment. Let's pretend everything Mr. Bush said is actually true and then hold him to his word. If the safety of America really depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad, then our safety is in grave peril because we are losing that battle. The security crackdown announced with great fanfare by Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki in June is failing." So "if what the president says is true about the stakes in Baghdad, it's tantamount to treason if Bill Frist, Rick Santorum and John Boehner fail to rally their party's Congressional majority to stave off defeat there. We can't emulate our fathers and grandfathers and whip today's Nazis and Communists with 145,000 troops. Roosevelt and Truman would have regarded those troop levels as defeatism."

CPA Selection Process Allegedly Valued GOP Loyalty Over Relevant Skills. Both the Washington Post and New York Times ran front page stories on alleged US mistakes in Iraq. A 4,461-word excerpt from the new book Life In the Emerald City appears on the front page of the Washington Post (9/17, 748K). In it, Washington Post reporter Rajiv Chandrasekaran argues that Jim O'Beirne ("a political appointee who screens prospective political appointees for Defense Department posts") oversaw a selection process for the CPA that favored Republican loyalties rather than skills relevant for administering Iraq. Chandrasekaran writes, "Many of those chosen by O'Beirne's office to work for the Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran Iraq's government from April 2003 to June 2004, lacked vital skills and experience. A 24-year-old who had never worked in finance -- but had applied for a White House job -- was sent to reopen Baghdad's stock exchange. ... The decision to send the loyal and the willing instead of the best and the brightest is now regarded by many people involved in the 3 1/2 -year effort to stabilize and rebuild Iraq as one of the Bush administration's gravest errors. ... By the time Bremer departed in June 2004, Iraq was in a precarious state."

An accompanying chart shows photos of some politically connected, high-level CPA appointees. A positive book review in the Washington Post Book World (9/17) says that the book "documents the way that an avalanche of unjustifiable mistakes transformed a difficult mission into an impossible one."

Jonathan Chait Blasts Handling Of Iraq War. In the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), op-ed columnist Jonathan Chait writes, "The more we learn about the war's conduct, the more we learn that the administration didn't just make the normal sorts of mistakes that inevitably occur in wartime; it was almost criminally negligent. The Bush administration literally refused to do any planning for the occupation. They invaded before all the available troops were in place, staffed the Coalition Provisional Authority with underqualified hacks vetted solely on the basis of ideological loyalty and rashly disbanded the Iraqi army, which could have provided some early order."

Iraqis Struggle To Root Out Rogue Police State. The New York Times (9/17, Wong, von Zielbauer, 1.21M) reports in a 2,330-word front page story, "Shiite militiamen and criminals entrenched throughout Iraq's police and internal security forces are blocking recent efforts by some Iraqi leaders and the American military to root them out, a step critical to winning the trust of skeptical Sunni Arabs and quelling the sectarian conflict, Iraqi and Western officials say." One Western diplomat said that "more than 1,200 policemen and other employees had been convicted years ago of murder, rape and other violent crimes"; in addition, the Shiite interior minister "has limited power to remove politically connected subordinates and enact changes" because he is independent of "powerful Shiite political leaders."

Iraqi Deputy PM Says Iraq Has Plan. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (9/17, 748K), Iraqi Deputy PM Barham Salih writes, "We must change the dynamic of violence. The Iraqi government has undertaken a searching analysis and is responding with a strategy on two fronts: national and international." Domestic planks "are national reconciliation, democratic federalism, political inclusion and a fair and rational oil policy," while the international strategy "involves a road map for economic development." Apparently mindful of growing US impatience with enactment of reform, he states, "We Iraqis must recognize that it is up to us to resolve our problems. Outsiders cannot deliver for us."

Iraqi Legislators Have Steep Learning Curve. In a Week In Review piece for the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M), reporters Richard Oppel and Abdul Razzaq al-Saiedi write that a "rookie mistake" by Abdul Aziz Al-Hakim, head of a powerful Shiite coalition, "shows how steep the learning curve may be for Iraq's legislators -- even the most wily -- as they observe democratic procedures." His proposal to have the Shiite-dominated southern provinces "form one huge autonomous state, beneath which would lie billions of barrels of oil," foundered for both surprising and unsurprising reasons. Sunnis predictably rejected it for fear of being left "with little oil," but "other Shiite parties, some analysts say, are hesitant to back so grand a vision because such a huge autonomous region could one day fall under the sway of one party," namely, Hakim's.

Sunnis Criticize Baghdad Security Plan As Deaths Mount. The New York Times (9/17, Oppel, 1.21M) reports, "Dozens more bodies have been discovered in Baghdad in the past two days, bringing the four-day total to at least 165 and prompting some Sunni Arab leaders to raise new questions about the recent security operation intended take back Baghdad." Iraqi police reported finding 35 bodies on Friday and at least 21 on Saturday.

The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Roug, 918K) reports, "Police said Saturday that they had recovered 48 bodies throughout Baghdad, bringing the toll from clandestine killings since Monday to about 190 people." Concerning the plan to build a trench around the capital, the Times says, "The deadliest threat is not explosives or large-scale attacks by Sunni-led insurgents but rather secret executions."

Explosions Kill 17 In Baghdad; Maliki Pleads For Unity. The Wall Street Journal/AP (9/17) reports, "After a one-day lull, bloodshed surged again in the capital Saturday, with at least 17 people dead in attacks and 27 probable victims of sectarian killings found dumped in the streets as Iraq's prime minister launched a fresh appeal for reconciliation." The AP says of Maliki's plan, "No major Sunni Arab insurgent group has publicly agreed to join the plan, and many Shiite militias are controlled by legislators themselves." The latest effort to protect Baghdad, Operation Together Forward, "has made little headway, with the city's death toll surpassing 1,500 in July and triggering fears among U.S. commanders that civil war could break out."

Suicide Bomber Kills 18 In Kirkuk. AFP (9/17) reports, "A suicide truck bomber firing a machine gun with one hand exploded his vehicle near a police centre, killing at least 18 people and wounding 65 in Iraq's northern oil city of Kirkuk, police said." Violence had earlier been kept to a minimum, "but in the past few months there has been a sharp increase in the number of explosions and car bombs," which US forces have attributed to groups with Al Qaeda links.

Sectarian Violence Has Cut US Casualties. The Washington Times/London Sunday Telegraph (9/17, Hussein) reports, "The sectarian violence that has brought Iraq to the verge of civil war has had one unexpected benefit: a marked fall in the number of American military casualties in Baghdad. American combat deaths in the capital are down 50 percent from the same three-month period last year and some terrorists say the United States has succeeded in deflecting attention from its own troops."

Senate Intelligence Report On Iraq Dismissed As Inaccurate. Stephen Hayes in a 5,060 word article in the upcoming issue of the Weekly Standard (9/25) disputes the conclusion of the Senate Intelligence report finding that Saddam Hussein resisted "cooperating with al Qaeda or other Islamist groups." The Standard argues, "Saddam Hussein's regime has a long and well-documented history of cooperating with Islamists, including al Qaeda and its affiliates." Citing various instances of such alleged cooperation, the Standard says, "The authors seem determined to write it out of the history. ... The Senate report fails to provide any ... contextual balance to the denials of detained Iraqi officials."

Similarly in an op-ed for the Washington Times (9/17, 88K), journalist Deroy Murdock calls the Senate report finding no connection between Saddam Hussein and Al Qaeda "seriously flawed." The "report relies on unreliable witnesses, ignores potential and actual evidence of Saddam's philanthropy of terror, and yet quietly acknowledges he, in fact, worked with terrorists."

US, Afghan Troops Launch Offensive. The AP (9/17, Abrashi) reports, "Thousands of American and Afghan troops unleashed a new offensive against Taliban militants in eastern Afghanistan on Saturday in an effort to expand the government's reach into the volatile Pakistani border region." The AP describes the operation as involving "7,000 U.S. and Afghan soldiers in the central and eastern provinces of Paktika, Khost, Ghazni, Paktya and Logar." The NATO commander for Afghanistan "said Saturday he expects the military campaign against the Taliban to last another three to five years." In addition, "two separate insurgent attacks on a military base in Khost province killed a U.S.-led coalition soldier and wounded another on Friday, the military said. A number of Afghan troops also were wounded." In other news, "a bomb blast south of the Afghan capital killed three security guards and wounded another on Saturday."

The Washington Post (9/17, A18, Constable, 748K) reports, "Three Afghan aid workers were killed Saturday when their vehicle hit a bomb on a highway just south of the capital, while 7,000 Afghan and U.S. troops launched an operation against Taliban insurgents in five eastern and central provinces," thus leading with the bomb blast, unlike the AP article.

Troops Work To Build Afghans' Trust. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/17, Maykluth, 399K) reports, "U.S. conventional military forces, trained to employ shock-and-awe power, have retooled for a more sophisticated mission" in Afghanistan. Among their tenets is avoidance of excessive force, like killing "the wrong people" and antagonizing locals for "months - years." Gestures like road building, which facilitates fighting insurgents, have improved relations with locals. The Inquirer calls eastern Afghanistan the "forgotten front in a forgotten war," where "during six months ... the 1-32 has taken more casualties than it did during its yearlong deployment to Iraq."

Assassinated Paktia Governor Is Remembered. In an Outlook piece for the Washington Post (9/17, 748K), pundit Barnett Rubin remembers Paktia Governor Hakim Taniwal, who was killed by a suicide bomber. Taniwal argued that anti-Taliban military operations "would have little long-lasting effect without popular support and economic development." He believed that the Pakistani government "helped" the Taliban, but he nonetheless "advocated settling Afghanistan's historic conflict with Pakistan over the Pashtun territories across the frontier known as the Durand Line, which Afghanistan has never recognized as a border, even under the Taliban."

Ten Peace Prize Winners Criticize Bush Decision To Topple Hussein. The Washington Times (9/17, Richardson, 88K) reports that at a gathering of Nobel peace prize winners some criticized the Bush Administration's war against terrorism. They "opened the three-day event by excoriating the White House for its invasion of Iraq and subsequent increases in military spending." They "also issued a statement identifying 10 'barriers to global peace.'" But "absent from the list was global terrorism." 1980 peace prize winner Adolfo Perez Esquivel "compared the nearly 3,000 persons killed on September 11 with the tens of thousands of children who die every day of hunger. 'I call that economic terrorism,' he said."

DOJ:

DOJ Gives Top Award To Enron Task Force. The Houston Chronicle (9/17) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales this week bestowed his office's top annual award to federal prosecutors, FBI agents and paralegals who have served on the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, including those involved in this year's fraud and conspiracy trial of former Enron chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling." The Chronicle continues, "The recipients of the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service included Sean Berkowitz, Kathryn Ruemmler, John Hueston and Cliff Stricklin, the lead prosecutors in the four-month trial of Lay and Skilling." The Chronicle adds, "Other team members who received the award were prosecutors Robb Adkinds and Andrew Stolper and appellate specialists Douglas Wilson and John Drennan. … The award was also given to previous task force attorneys and leaders, including its first director, Leslie Caldwell; her successor as director, Andrew Weissmann; and former task force prosecutors Samuel Buell, Matthew Friedrich, Lisa Monaco, Benton Campbell and Linda Lacewell."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Gives Long Sentence To Alabama Man For Continued Misconduct. The Selma (AL) Times-Journal (9/17, Inge) reports, "A Selma (AL) man who federal authorities say 'continued criminal conduct' will get a longer sentence than recommended." The Times-Journal continues, "DeWayne Lewis, 34, pleaded guilty to a felon in possession of a handgun in May 2006 and faced a sentencing range of 63 to 78 months in prison, under the federal advisory sentencing guidelines. … In the plea agreement, prosecutors had recommended the low end of the guidelines, court officials said. … However, after Lewis testified in his own behalf at the sentencing hearing this week, senior U.S. District Judge Charles R. Butler ruled that Lewis had perjured himself during his testimony and therefore 'lacked acceptance of responsibility for his actions.'" The Times-Journal adds, "While on release awaiting sentencing, Lewis tested positive for cocaine use. … In addition, Lewis was a passenger in a vehicle stopped by the Selma Police Department when a gun was found next to where Lewis was seated. … Judge Butler then sentenced Lewis to the maximum term of 78 months in federal prison, to be followed by three years of supervised probation, according to information obtained from the U.S. Justice Department. … Deborah J. Rhodes, U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Alabama, said the charges resulted from a joint investigation conducted by the ATF&E, The SPD and the Dallas County Sheriff's Office."

Rodriguez Jury To Begin Deliberating Death Penalty Request. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (9/17, Kolpack) reports, "The trial of Alfonso Rodriguez Jr. is entering its final stage, and jurors may begin deliberating this week over whether he should be the first person sentenced to death in North Dakota in nearly 100 years." The Pioneer-Press continues, "The verdict by the federal court jury of seven women and five men must be unanimous for Rodriguez, 53, of Crookston, Minn., to be sentenced to death instead of life in prison. He was convicted late last month of kidnapping resulting in the death of University of North Dakota student Dru Sjodin. … 'I think this part is much harder to predict than when he was found guilty,' said Joseph Daly, a Hamline University law professor who has participated in death penalty cases and has been following the Rodriguez case. 'In North Dakota, jurors are not used to dealing with death penalty cases.'" The Pioneer-Press adds, "North Dakota does not have the death penalty but it is allowed in federal cases. During a trip to Fargo last year, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the government is justified in seeking capital punishment in some cases in states that have outlawed the penalty. … 'I believe the fact the state doesn't have the death penalty doesn't mean that the people of the state would not impose the ultimate sanction when the right circumstances dictate that that happen,' Gonzales said. … Prosecutors point to the fact that jurors, in deciding earlier that Rodriguez was eligible for the death penalty, found that Sjodin, 22, of Pequot Lakes, Minn., was killed in an 'especially heinous, cruel and depraved manner.'"

FBI Criticizes Over Secrecy In Cleveland Agent Sex Scandal. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (9/17, Prine) reported, "It's a steamy story of sex, lies and videotape, told in an obscure federal court case the FBI doesn't want you to hear about. But the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review uncovered the hidden details of 'Dale J. Herr vs. the Department of Justice' at the normally staid U.S. Merit Systems Protection Board." The Tribune-Review notes Herr "concedes in court documents that in 2002 he videotaped his sexual exploits with three women -- two co-workers and one from outside the agency," which eventually led to his dismissal from the bureau. "Although one of the taped women continued a romantic relationship with Herr after the brouhaha," Special Agent Jeffrey B. Killeen "persuaded administrative law judges to remove her name from documents because she was a 'victim.' Killeen also got judges to erase mention of the Cleveland field office and the identities of anyone who gave testimony. … 'Decisions like that are never made lightly,' said Patrick W. Kelley, FBI's deputy general counsel. … 'We have to keep in mind that there may be victims, and we have a duty to protect them from an unwarranted invasion of their privacy. To do that, we must look even at singularly identifying details in cases. We do this to ensure that more damage isn't done to the victims.'" However, "Contacted by the Trib, nearly a dozen top civil libertarians said FBI and board actions in the Herr matter raise questions about when it's appropriate to hide agent misconduct. At issue: Did the FBI push so hard to protect alleged victims, or did the agency fear embarrassment from a salacious story?"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Racial Violence Against New Mexico Navajo Nation Members Again Under Federal Review. The New York Times (9/17, Frosch, 1.21M) reports that in 1974 in Farmington, N.M., "the bodies of three Navajo men were found in nearby Chokecherry Canyon, burned and bludgeoned." The report adds, "The three White high school students charged in their killings were sent not to prison but to reform school. The violence and mild sentences incited marches by Navajos through Farmington's streets and exposed tensions between them and the town's largely white residents." According to the report, the United States Commission on Civil Rights eventually investigated and found widespread mistreatment and prejudice against Navajos. Now, more than three decades later, Navajo leaders here are again calling for federal intervention."

Report Gauges Toll Of Minnesota Human Trafficking. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/17, Medcalf, Padilla) reports, "About 120 social-service groups in Minnesota that responded to a survey estimated that they had worked with more than 500 sex trafficking victims and 55 labor trafficking victims over the past three years." The Star Tribune continues, "The exploitation in Minnesota of victims lured into forced labor and sex should be addressed on an 'organized, statewide' level, according to a Minnesota Department of Public Safety report on human trafficking." The Star Tribune adds, "About 120 social-service groups in Minnesota that responded to a survey estimated that they had worked with more than 500 sex trafficking victims and 55 labor trafficking victims over the past three years. Some victims had been trafficked from Minneapolis, St. Paul, Roseville and the Mall of America, according to the report. .. Without statewide data on trafficking-related arrests, the numbers don't represent the fullness of the crime, according to the report, which was prepared for the Legislature. … Someone is trafficked when 'forced, defrauded or coerced into service regardless of movement,' but sometimes the offense involves transporting people across borders, domestic and international."

Missouri Woman Seeks DOJ Ruling On Monkey In Restaurants. The AP (9/17) reports, "A woman from southwestern Missouri has asked the Springfield-Greene County Health Department to allow her to take her pet monkey into restaurants as a service animal." The AP continues, "The woman, Debby Rose, of Springfield, says Richard, her bonnet macaque monkey, provides emotional support that allows her to overcome an anxiety disorder and go out in public places. Rose said the federal Americans With Disabilities Act should allow the practice." The AP adds, "Health department officials met Friday with a local service agency, the Southwest Center for Independent Living, which is acting as an agent for Rose. The health department told the agency that Rose must produce some kind of federal ruling or certification that the monkey is a service animal under the ADA before it will consider allowing her to take the monkey into public places, said Kevin Gipson, director of health. … Family members said Rose's anxiety was disabling. Without her monkey, she's less able to manage normal tasks, such as grocery shopping and dining out, because of severe anxiety. … Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman from the Justice Department in Washington, said that although the law was somewhat vague regarding emotional-support animals, they were covered. … 'It's kind of a fine line, but the law errs on the side of protecting individuals that are disabled,' she said."

Voting Reform Laws May Increase Likelihood Of Multi-State Election Machine Breakdown. The Washington Post (9/17, A1, Balz, Goldfarb, 748K), in a front-page story, reports, "An overhaul in how states and localities record votes and administer elections since the Florida recount battle six years ago has created conditions that could trigger a repeat -- this time on a national scale -- of last week's Election Day debacle in the Maryland suburbs, election experts said. In the Nov. 7 election, more than 80 percent of voters will use electronic voting machines, and a third of all precincts this year are using the technology for the first time. The changes are part of a national wave, prompted by the federal Help America Vote Act of 2002 and numerous revisions of state laws. … But in Maryland last Tuesday, a combination of human blunders and technological glitches caused long lines and delays in vote-counting. The problems, which followed ones earlier this year in Ohio, Illinois and several other states, have contributed to doubts among some experts about whether the new systems are reliable and whether election officials are adequately prepared to use them. In a polarized political climate, in which elections are routinely marked by litigation and allegations of incompetent administration or outright tampering, some worry that voting problems could cast a Florida-style shadow over this fall's midterm elections."

Maryland Problems Cause Some To Demand Paper Records. The Washington Post (9/17, A4, Barr, 748K) reports, "The primary day debacle in Montgomery and Prince George's counties will add momentum to regional efforts to ensure that election systems create a paper record of each vote, according to some elected officials and activists critical of paperless balloting. They say the crisis at the polls in Florida during the 2000 presidential race, which prompted many states to switch to electronic voting, forced the adoption of overly complex systems that now must be simplified. An aide to Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich…said heightened concerns about electronic voting in last week's primary would strengthen calls for a return to a paper-based system."

Voter ID Laws Tested In primary Elections. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (9/17, Lambrecht, Sichko, 300K) reports, "In the Arizona primary election last week, some Navajo Indians who don't drive and have no use for U.S. government-issued photo IDs didn't vote because of a new state law requiring identification to vote. … But in Macon, Ga., which tested Georgia's controversial photo identification law for the first time last week, only one voter of more than 200 who turned out for a school board special election lacked a picture ID — even though he had driven to the polling place." Missouri "— where a judge last week struck down a new state photo ID law — is not alone in grappling with new voting requirements. More courtroom maneuvering is expected over the Missouri law, which requires voters to produce a valid Missouri drivers license, nondrivers ID, U.S. passport or military ID. In at least eight states, political activists are squaring off over new rules requiring photo IDs as well as proof of citizenship and other identification for voter registration. In most cases, Republicans are supporting the restrictions, and Democratic-leaning groups are fighting them."

Milwaukee Manual Recount Finds Vote Total Was Flawed. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (9/17, Nunnally, 259K) reports, "Milwaukee officials announced Saturday that after a three-day manual count of ballots, Tuesday's primary election brought 46,500 voters to the polls in Milwaukee, not 80,000 as the city previously reported. City Election Commission chief Susan Edman said the ward-by-ward review of turnout confirmed the city's suspicion that a computer programming error by her office caused the misreporting.

Conservatives Using Rights Argument To Promote Causes Globally. In an op/ed in The New York Times Magazine (9/17), The New Republic's Joshua Kurlantzick writes, "Around the world, the N.R.A. is finding that a rights-based approach translates into many languages. … Going global also can provide a defense against the influence of international law, which judges like Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer have increasingly introduced into American courts." According to Kurlantzick, "Conservatives now realize that by co-opting the language of rights, traditionally employed by the political left, they can export their own ideas of universal rights, whether that means the White House's democratization program or a universal right to bear arms."

ANTITRUST:

Florida AG Reviewing Hospital Deal. The Fort Myers (FL) News-Press (9/17, Reed) reports, "The (Florida) state attorney general is looking into Lee Memorial Health System's acquisition of Southwest Florida Regional Medical Center and Gulf Coast Hospital. … 'We are aware of this potential merger, or purchase, and we're in the process of reviewing the situation,' spokeswoman JoAnn Carrin said." The News-Press continues, "In the 1990s, the attorney general had filed an amicus brief on Lee Memorial's behalf during the system's bid to acquire Cape Coral Hospital. At that time, the Federal Trade Commission was challenging Lee Memorial, saying the purchase would have given Lee Memorial too much control of the market. … District and appeals courts rejected the FTC argument and ruled Lee's status as a public hospital exempted it from antitrust action and the FTC did not have jurisdiction over the matter. The FTC dropped its complaint because Health Management Associates, or HMA, purchased it." The News-Press adds, "Cape Coral Hospital ultimately merged with Lee Memorial in June 1996. At the time of that merger, the state was seeking to block Hospital Corporation of America from taking over

Cape Hospital because it would have too much power. .. 'The theory of antitrust is to protect the public,' said Charles Bigelow, a retired attorney who used to work for Lee Memorial and is familiar with its status as a public agency. 'If you apply antitrust to a public hospital, you're protecting the public from itself.'"

Administration Disputes Court's Claim On Environmental Impact Of Alaskan Oil Drilling. Bloomberg (9/16, Efstathiou) reports, "The Bush administration said a Sept. 27 sale of oil drilling leases in Alaska should go forward and rejected a court's objections that environmental effects have not been properly addressed. The U.S. Interior Department said in a court filing yesterday that the impact of expanded drilling on air, water, wetlands and wildlife had been properly considered in the plan to expand drilling in the National Petroleum Reserve." According to the report, "Earlier this month, U.S. District Judge James Singleton in Anchorage ruled that an environmental impact statement prepared by the agency failed 'to adequately address the cumulative effects' of drilling. … Singleton's preliminary decision threatened plans to proceed with the lease sale and drew praise from groups including the National Audubon Society." According to the report, "The sale includes 400,000 acres around Teshekpuk Lake, an area environmental groups consider a critical Arctic wildlife habitat."

Gulf Oil Deposit Discovery Adds Fuel To Offshore Drilling Debate. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (9/17, Gibson, 265K) reports, "Discovery of a vast oil deposit deep under the Gulf of Mexico has put additional pressure on Congress as it considers legislation on whether to allow offshore drilling closer to the Florida coast. The undersea oil field 270 miles southwest of New Orleans, which could expand U.S. reserves by as much as 50 percent, provides new arguments for both sides of a contentious debate over legislation to expand offshore drilling." According to the report, "Proponents say the discovery shows the great potential for tapping the Outer Continental Shelf closer to shore to boost energy supplies. Opponents contend it proves energy companies have plenty of tracts to explore without moving into more environmentally sensitive areas near Florida, California and other states dependent on clean beaches and tourism."

Natural Selection Foods Spinach Scrutinized As Potential Source Of E. Coli Outbreak. The New York Times (9/17, Preston, Marshall, 1.21M) reports, "Packaged spinach salad disappeared from store shelves across the country Saturday, as investigators searched for the source of bacterial contamination that has now sickened more than 100 people. Officials said Saturday that the number of people affected by the E. coli outbreak now stood at 102, up from 94 the day before." According to the report, "Dr. David Acheson, director of food safety at the Food and Drug Administration, reported no additional deaths beyond one that had occurred in Wisconsin. At this point, Dr. Acheson said, federal officials do not know how or when the spinach was contaminated."

Kempthorne Said To Take Interior IG's Allegations "Very Seriously." Time (9/16, Waller, 4.03M) reports, "Complaints are beginning to pile up against the U.S. Interior Department. … The problems surfacing are serious: managerial incompetence, bureaucratic snafus that are costing taxpayers billions of dollars, and a pervasive forgive-and-forget attitude toward senior department officials who cross ethical lines." Time goes on to report on "In scorching testimony before a House Government Reform subcommittee the no-nonsense" Interior IG Earl Devaney "charged that during his seven years as Interior's IG his revelations of misdeeds and foul-ups have been routinely 'disregarded by the department.' … Rather than heads rolling for infractions, the Cabinet agency has become a fault-free zone, Devaney claims. 'Short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of Interior,' says the former Secret Service agent." Time notes, "A case Devaney found particularly troubling was that of Steven Griles, Interior's deputy secretary in George W. Bush's first term. Devaney in 2004 referred 25 possible ethics violations by Griles to the Office of Government Ethics outside of Interior. That office cleared Griles of 23 of the violations but referred the remaining two to then-Secretary Gale Norton for a decision. Devaney says Norton refused, over his objections, to take any action against her deputy. … Meanwhile, Dirk Kempthorne, who replaced Norton as Interior Secretary last July, insists he's taking Devaney's 'allegations concerning issues dating back to 1998 very seriously.'"

Environmentalists Target Evangelicals With Global Warming Film. The Kansas City Star (9/17, Montgomery, 278K) reports, "Before watching the end of the world, hundreds of movie viewers bowed their heads. 'Guard us against the historical arrogance of our own species,' a Methodist minister prayed recently. … Then lights dimmed for the Midwest premiere of 'The Great Warming.' The documentary on the man-made dangers of global warming is being released for church groups to review before the Nov. 7 elections. While its plot is an easy sell to this invited crowd — more left than right, plenty of hybrid cars parked outside — the film raises spiritual questions that could carve up evangelical voting blocs in new ways. FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Alabama Guns Travel Across The Country. The Birmingham News (AL) (9/17, Robinson) reports, "Guns, bought easily and legally in Alabama and other states, are landing in the hands of criminals elsewhere, drawing the ire of leaders who have sued to stop the flow and pledged to fight what they say is a deadly export." The News continues, "Alabama's role as a Top 10 supply state for 'crime guns' - weapons purchased legally here but transferred illegally to others and sometimes used in crimes - is undisputed." The News adds, "New York City police say that 5 percent of the guns recovered at crimes in the first half of 2005 were last sold at retail in Alabama. … 'Alabama ranks, along with some other Southern states and some Midwestern states, in being a supply state because of its traditionally more lenient lifestyle and gun laws,' said Jim Cavanaugh, who supervises ATF operations in portions of the South. 'Guns are more readily available, more easily traded, plentiful. It's real.'" The News notes, "Guns trafficked out of Alabama have turned up during all kinds of investigations in other locations - robberies, assaults, sex crimes, drug crimes and at least 10 homicides - in the past several years, according to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. … Special Agent Eric Kehn said Alabama guns have shown up from coast to coast: from Landover, Md., to Los Angeles; from Chicago to cities throughout Florida. … New York City has sued in Georgia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and Virginia - and pledged to sue wherever needed - alleging a handful of gun dealers have created a public nuisance and are negligent in selling weapons that eventually land in the hands of criminals."

Gun-Ownership Case Heads To Wyoming Courtroom. The AP (9/17, Neary) reports, "Arguments are scheduled next month in a case in which Wyoming is seeking a federal court ruling affirming its authority to help some people convicted of misdemeanor domestic violence regain their right to own a firearm." The AP continues, "Federal law prohibits people with such convictions from owning guns." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Alan Johnson is scheduled to hear arguments in the case Oct. 6 in Cheyenne. … The state alleges that the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives acted illegally when it threatened to disallow about 11,000 concealed weapons permits the state issued as a substitute for federal background checks for firearms purchases. … The federal agency threatened to take that step unless the state repealed a 2004 law that allows people to expunge a first conviction for misdemeanor domestic violence." The AP notes, "Wyoming Attorney General Pat Crank says the current lawsuit comes down to an issue of states' rights. The National Rifle Association and the Gun Owners Foundation in Washington, D.C., have both filed briefs supporting the state's position. … Federal officials, however, say the issue is more narrow. They contend the state law fails to meet the legal standard for expungement. … Although the law allows people to petition in court to expunge a first misdemeanor conviction, it specifies that the record of that first conviction remains on the books for purposes of enhancing penalties for any subsequent crime. … 'The nuts and bolts of the government's position is that an expungement of a conviction wipes the slates clean, and that an expungement erases a conviction,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Carol A. Statkus, one of the lawyers representing the ATF. 'The Wyoming statute that's at issue in this case doesn't do that.'"

Risk Of Steroids, Growth Hormones Not Fully Explained To Young Athletes. In an op/ed in The Washington Post (9/17, B7, 748K), former Major League Baseball Commissioner Fay Vincent writes that "If, as seems likely, many of this generation have been taking such things as steroids and human growth hormones, they have been doing so with the benign neglect of their coaches and school officials." Vincent adds, "It is inconceivable that the people who are around these kids a lot don't know, or at least suspect, that something is going on. And yet we are doing little to educate young athletes to the risks of using such chemicals."

IMMIGRATION:

Federal Detention Facility Contractors Detained For Fake Immigration Documents. The Miami Herald (9/17) reports, "Immigration officers have detained 15 foreign nationals and accused them of using fake documents while working for a company doing roofing contract work at a federal detention facility in South Miami-Dade, ICE said Friday." The Herald continues, "Barbara Gonzalez, the agency's spokeswoman in Miami, said the 15 men were detained Sept. 7 after officers from the bureau of prisons at the Federal Correctional Institution stopped three of them because they suspected their immigration documents were fraudulent." The Herald adds, "Gonzalez said the officers contacted ICE, which dispatched investigators. Gonzalez said the three detained initially were scheduled to work at the facility with a roofing contractor. .. . 'Further information developed by ICE agents revealed that 15 individuals working as contractors were illegal aliens,' Gonzalez said. 'They had fraudulent immigration documents.' … Gonzalez said 13 of the detained men came from Mexico and the other two came from Guatemala. Twelve of the men had fraudulent green cards, and three had fraudulent Social Security cards, she said. … All were transported to the Krome detention center in West Miami-Dade and put in deportation proceedings, Gonzalez said." The Herald notes, "Disclosure of the Miami detentions came three days after two alleged leaders of a nationwide 'employee-leasing conspiracy,' allegedly involving hundreds of undocumented foreign nationals, pleaded guilty in Fort Lauderdale before U.S. District Judge Kenneth Marra, who sentenced a third defendant in the case."

Day Laborers Sue Village After Work Site Closed. The New York Times (9/17, Santos, 1.21M) reports, "The 36-year-old Mexican man has lived in Mamaroneck for eight years, trekking each morning to Columbus Park near the village center to wait for contractors who might pay him $10 an hour at best. But the village closed the hiring site in the park in February, and after that, he testified in court here last week, the police often chased away the employers with tickets, and the workers with fear. … The man…is one of six anonymous day laborers whose federal lawsuit against the Village of Mamaroneck could set a new national standard for the way local governments deal with the fast-growing influx of day laborers in their communities. For a week, Judge Colleen McMahon in Federal District Court heard testimony in a nonjury trial from the laborers, the police, contractors, merchants and village officials. Lawyers in the case said they hoped a decision would be reached by mid-October. The case accuses village officials of harassing the workers as part of a 'deliberate and coordinated' campaign to drive them off the streets, and rests on the workers' 14th Amendment claim that they are discriminated against because they are Hispanic."

National Guard Troops Assigned To Mexican Border Charged With "Beer Fueled" Gunplay. The Houston Chronicle (9/17, Gonzalez, 535K) reports that National Guard troops assigned "to help the U.S. Border Patrol with administrative and other tasks, allowing scores of patrol agents to resume law enforcement duties" allegedly spent "their off-duty time with beer-fueled joyriding and reckless gunfire. … Three soldiers from North Texas, at least one of whom had served in Iraq, were arrested the evening of Sept. 6 on felony deadly-conduct charges after several shots were fired from their private vehicle as it passed a family cookout in a modest Maverick County subdivision, officials said. Several adults and children 'hit the dirt' fearing a drive-by attack, Sheriff Tomas S. Herrera said, but no one was targeted or injured by the gunshots and no property damage was reported.

Maryland Guard Assigned To Border Duty. The Baltimore Sun (9/17, Dolan, 262K) reports 120 volunteers from the Maryland National Guard "have been dispatched to the Sonoran Desert as part of a stopgap interdiction measure announced in May by President Bush. Critics have questioned whether sending up to 6,500 part-time soldiers to watch the southern border is wise for a National Guard still saddled with commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan. They asked whether the Guard should be engaged in a seemingly extracurricular homeland security mission when its leaders struggle to recruit more soldiers and retain the guardsmen in their ranks today. … Watching the flow of people crossing the border every day, some of the Marylanders admit, has been eye-opening and disturbing, causing some to question the nation's immigration policies. Several guardsmen here are still waiting to become citizens and sympathize with those seeking to come to America."

Trucking Companies Reportedly Hire Illegals Without Proper Training. The Dallas Morning News (9/17, Jones, Becka, Lafleur, McGonigle, 500K) reports trucking companies in Texas "hire illegal immigrants who struggle to read road signs and communicate in English with police and emergency personnel." The News adds, "U.S.-Mexico trade has more than doubled since the North American Free Trade Agreement was implemented in 1994, according to federal data. About 68 percent of truck traffic from Mexico enters the U.S. at the Texas border."

TAX:

Battle Over Minimum Wage Boost Threatens Popular Tax Deductions. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Havemann, 918K) reports, "Just about every lawmaker in Congress favors extending a batch of popular tax benefits approved during President Bush's first years in office and authorized through 2005. But in a case study of the tortuous process that can surround even the most highly regarded proposal on Capitol Hill, extension of the tax benefits appears to face an uphill road as Congress nears adjournment. The benefits, claimed by more than 10 million taxpayers last year, give those who live in states without income taxes a deduction for their state sales taxes. They allow a deduction for some college tuition. Teachers may deduct the costs of buying supplies for their classrooms. And a research and development tax credit — hugely popular in the business community — is also part of the package. But so far, these and 43 other tax benefits have become ensnared in a partisan battle over a minimum-wage increase, which Democrats and some moderate Republicans want, and a sharp reduction in the estate tax, dear to the hearts of conservative Republicans."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pentagon Travel System Is Called Wasteful. The ABC News website (9/16, Cochran) reports that the "defense travel system," through which DOD buys plane tickets, is called "a disaster -- four years behind schedule and $200 million over budget." The system's contractor, Northrop Grumman, defends it, while Sen. Tom Coburn (R-OK) and the Citizens Against Government Waste denounce it.

Bonuses To Centers For Disease Control Officials Questioned. The New York Times (9/17, Harris, 1.21M) reports, "Top officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention received premium bonuses in recent years at the expense of scientists and others who perform much of the agency's scientific work, agency records show. Those inside the office of the centers' director, Dr. Julie L. Gerberding, have benefited the most, the records show." According to the report, "From 2002 through mid-2006, William H. Gimson III, the agency's chief operating officer, received bonuses totaling $147,863, which included seven cash awards of more than $2,500. Mr. Gimson's bonuses were about twice the amount granted to any other C.D.C. employee, the agency's records show." According to the report, "The increase in bonuses to these officials was part of a decision by the Bush administration to make transformation of the management of the centers a top priority, said Glen Nowak, chief of media relations at the centers. 'If we want to retain people, we need to recognize them,'" Nowak said, adding, "'We are operating in a highly competitive environment.'"

CDC 'Business Focus' Under Fire By Agency's Employees. The AP (9/17) reports, "The employees at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention who get bonuses most frequently are not scientists, but instead are accountants, budget analysts, computer experts and other administrative managers, according to a published report Sunday. The data appear to reinforce the findings of an internal CDC survey last year that found one of the top concerns among the agency's employees was a 'loss of public health focus/mission in exchange for inappropriate business focus.' According to the report, "The 72 CDC employees who received five or more awards of at least $2,500 from 2000 through July 21 work primarily in non-science jobs, according an analysis by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution of agency data obtained under the Freedom of Information Act. Some of those employees got $30,000, $50,000 and, in one case, more than $140,000 in cumulative bonuses during the period, the paper reported."

GOP Blamed For Rising Medicare Premiums In Democrat's Radio Address. The AP (9/17, Miga) reports, "Democrats say failed Republican policies are behind rising Medicare premiums that are leaving millions of older Americans scrambling for basic health care. Democrat Chris Murphy, a Connecticut state senator who is challenging 12-term Republican Rep. Nancy Johnson, criticized the GOP for failing to embrace the reforms needed to give seniors a break from increased health care costs. … 'My opponent, Nancy Johnson, deserves part of the blame,' said Murphy. 'She wrote the confusing Medicare law in 2003. She is also one of many Republicans who opposes allowing Medicare to negotiate for lower drug prices — a Democratic idea, and more importantly, a good idea.'"

Wealthier Medicare Recipients To Pay Higher Premiums. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K) reports, "High-income retirees may be in for an unpleasant surprise this winter. It involves the monthly premiums that older Americans pay for Medicare Part B, which helps pay the cost of doctor visits, diagnostic tests and other routine care. The premiums, which are automatically deducted from Social Security checks, are currently $88 a month. In January, everyone's premiums will go up to adjust for healthcare inflation, but higher-income recipients will see even larger hikes. As a result, a single retiree with an annual income of $80,000 or less (and a married person earning less than $160,000), could pay $98 a month next year, according to estimates, while a single person earning $81,000 would pay $110 a month. And under the same scenario a single person earning $200,000 would pay $170 a month — or 73% more than lower-income Medicare recipients."

AARP Launches Ad Campaign Calling For Senate Action On Rx Drug Re-Importation. The Miami Herald (9/17, 310K) in its "News Brief" section reports, "The AARP is launching a $500,000 ad campaign today in 14 states pushing for Senate action on legislation that would let consumers buy U.S.-made prescription drugs from Canada and other countries." AARP legislative policy director David Certner "said the campaign focuses on the home states of senators who have shown some openness to letting people buy U.S.-made medicine shipped abroad."

House Deliberates Granting The District Of Columbia Voting Rights. The Washington Post (9/17, B8, 748K) reports, "The House is considering a bill, crafted by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), to give the District a representative with full voting rights. The bill would add two seats to the House, one for the District and one for the state next in line to expand its congressional delegation based on population — currently Utah. A House subcommittee held a hearing on the matter on Thursday."

Legal Scholars Endorse Effort To Grant Voting Rights To D.C. Residents. In an op/ed in The Washington Post (9/17, B8, 748K) Pepperdine Law School Dean Kenneth Starr and retired chief judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit Patricia M. Wald write, "More than 40 years ago, the Supreme Court declared that 'no right is more precious in a free country than that of having a voice in the election of those who make the laws under which, as good citizens, we must live.' And yet, for more than 200 years the citizens of the District have been denied this right because they have no voting representation in Congress." According to Starr and Wald, "To its credit, Congress is taking steps to begin correcting this longstanding injustice. Specifically, the House Government Reform Committee has approved, and the House Judiciary Committee is considering, a bill that would give D.C residents the right to full voting representation in the House." According to Starr and Wald, "While conferring this right is surely the right thing to do, a legitimate question has been raised concerning Congress's authority to confer the right by simple legislation, rather than through constitutional amendment. We have carefully considered this question and believe for three reasons the bill is within Congress's authority: It is consistent with fundamental constitutional principles; it is consistent with the language of Congress's constitutional power; and it is consistent with the governing legal precedents."

Atlantis Crew Sleeps In, Takes Half Day Off After Busy Week. The AP (9/17, Borenstein) reports, "With their hardest tasks behind them, space shuttle Atlantis' six astronauts got time to relax Saturday after almost a week of nonstop work adding a new 17 1/2-ton addition with wing-like solar power panels to the international space station. NASA even let the crew sleep an extra hour before waking them with Jimmy Buffett's beach song 'Twelve Volt Man.' 'We said good morning to them, then a little housekeeping and then left them alone, gave them a chance to enjoy their time on orbit and wind down from what has been a very, very busy series of days on the flight,' said flight director Paul Dye." Saturday was the last full day at the space station for Atlantis' crew. Besides relaxing and enjoying the view from 220 miles above Earth, they still had to unload supplies for the space station, including 90 pounds of oxygen."

Space Junk Can Be Deadly. The New York Times (9/17, Schwartz, 1.21M) reports, "In space, junk can kill. When two bolts slipped away from spacewalking astronauts last week, astronauts and controllers expressed concern that the small objects might have floated into the moving parts of the $372 million truss that had just been added to the station" NASA "recognizes that the thousands of pieces of debris in orbit are potential hazards. The concerns tend to focus on the risk of collision with objects moving at high speed, however; the relative velocity of something that has simply drifted away is low. Still, NASA mission planners require tethers for tools and objects during spacewalks. … John McCullough, the lead flight director for the station, said last week that on Russian spacewalks, 'they throw things away all the time.'"

High Court's Move To Provide Same-Day Transcripts Of Oral Arguments Applauded. The Washington Post (9/17, B6, 748K) opines in an editorial, "When the Supreme Court opens its term next month, it will finally begin making transcripts of its oral arguments available — free, online and on the day of the arguments. That this represents a breakthrough shows how dramatically behind the times the justices are." However, according to the Post, "It is a breakthrough, nonetheless, that will dramatically improve the public's access to court proceedings." According to the Post, "Timely transcripts are a half-measure. They imperfectly convey the atmospherics of an argument … but given the implacable hostility some of the justices feel toward cameras, the move is a huge step forward."

NYTimes Praises Skeptical Book About "Imaginary Weapons." The New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) reviews "Imaginary Weapons" in the Week in Review, praising the book about "the triumph of technological fantasy at the Pentagon." Author Sharon Weinberger argues in her book "that fringe science has reached ever greater heights in military circles," encouraging expenditures such as "roughly $100 billion on missile defense -- which is serious money, levee-fixing money, cancer-curing money -- but has produced only an insubstantial shield."

Paulson Says Slowing Housing Market Won't Cause Economic Collapse. Bloomberg (9/16) reports, "U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, making his debut at a meeting of Group of Seven economy chiefs, told his counterparts they needn't worry about a housing-led collapse of the world's largest economy. … 'The residential housing market is cooling from record unsustainable growth rates, but growth in the U.S. economy is being supported by other components.,'" Paulson said in a statement after meeting G-7 finance ministers and central bank governors in Singapore today. According to the report, "Sales of U.S. existing homes have declined every month since G-7 officials last met in April, and the National Association of Realtors predicts house prices may decline in the remaining months of 2006, which would be the first year-over- year drops since 1993. The International Monetary Fund on Sept. 14 branded the slowing U.S. housing market a ``key risk'' to global expansion.

Media's Effect On Housing Market Analyzed. In a Week In Review piece in The New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) Vikas Bajaj writes, "To hear some people in the real estate industry tell it, one of the biggest problems with the housing market is what is being said about it in the news media. Agents and industry executives say reporters, editors and news anchors are making a cooling market sound worse than it is." According to the report, "While the number of sales may have dropped from 2005 (which was a record-setting year, the end of a five-year run) and more homes stay on the market longer, real estate professionals note that sale prices in much of the country are still higher than they were a year ago." According to the report, "Richard A. Smith, vice chairman and president of the Realogy Corporation, the nation's largest residential real estate broker, said there was a 'constant flood of media that is so negative' that it was discouraging many potential buyers and sellers." The report adds, "The news media have always helped shape public perception of markets, whether for houses, stocks or tulips. But exactly how much the press influences mass consumer behavior is subject to debate."

Consumer Confidence Still High Despite Cooling Housing Market. In an economic view column The New York Times (9/17, 1.21M), Eduardo Porter writes, "There is an Aesop fable about a man — Greek, of course — who sees a swallow fluttering about on an unusually warm winter day. Leaping to the conclusion that summer has arrived, the man sells his only coat to buy himself a good time. Some economists say you merely need to replace the Greek with an American, and the coat with a house or condominium to understand the force powering the American economy during the recent housing boom." According to the report, "In this updated version of the fable, Americans were intoxicated by the leaps in the value of their real estate. Assuming the good times were here to stay, they were unable to resist temptation, impulsively calling the mortgage broker to get another loan to pay for the plasma TV set, the Caribbean vacation and the three-burner barbecue grill." Porter writes, "In Aesop's world, winter set in again, the swallow died and the coatless man blamed the bird for his misfortune, … yet in American morality tales, it seems, spendthrifts aren't always punished." According to Porter, "Winter has surely engulfed the housing market. But to the befuddlement of many economists, who had been expecting consumers to rein in their spending when the price of their homes stopped rising, America's happy consumers have so far eluded the payback."

Benefits, Risks Of Boom In Mortgage Lending Analyzed. The New York Times (9/17, 1.21M) writes in an editorial, "The housing boom would never have lasted as long as it did if mortgage lenders had to worry about being paid back in full. But instead of relying on borrowers to repay, most lenders quickly sell the loans, generating cash to make more mortgages." According to the Times, "The process has encouraged homeownership and created wealth. But there is a downside, too, which demands attention. As the boom thundered on, the pool of available credit grew larger than the pool of creditworthy borrowers, resulting in an explosion of risky mortgages with features like no money down, interest-only payments and super-low teaser rates." The Times adds, "In a market so vast and dynamic, everyone knows that if mortgage defaults should rise, damage could reverberate throughout the financial system. … Many homeowners are at a dangerous juncture." The Times opines, "Interest rates on adjustable mortgages are rising as home values are weakening, precluding for many the chance to refinance. Economists calculate that $750 billion of outstanding mortgage debt is now at measurable risk of default — about 7 percent of the total."

Fed Rate Hike Pause Brings New Interest In Bond Market. The Washington Post/AP (9/17, F4, Paradise) reports, "With some investors wringing their hands about inflation and the Federal Reserve's efforts to keep it in check, those with bond fund holdings could be forgiven for wanting to take their money and run. But while some market observers see volatility ahead, few are ready to call it quits." According to the report, "Bonds have faced a more difficult environment in the past two years as the Federal Reserve raised interest rates 17 consecutive times before pausing last month. While the rate increases hurt bond funds, leaving some investors wary, sentiment changed in late June after Fed comments led investors to believe the rate hikes had come to an end."

Guaranteed Pensions On The Decline. The Washington Post (9/17, F1, Day, 748K) reports that the freezing of pension plans "is part of a long-running trend, as otherwise healthy companies — not only Verizon Communications Inc., but also International Business Machines Corp. and, most recently, DuPont Co. — freeze, terminate or alter the terms of their employees' retirement packages. Most of these companies increased other retirement offerings, which don't include fixed payouts. Today, about 22 million workers, 19 percent of active private-sector employees, have traditional pension plans, compared with 39 percent three decades ago, according to federal government statistics." The report adds, "Financial experts say workers fortunate enough to still have traditional pensions should not rely on them too much for retirement, as the long-term prospects of such plans are increasingly in doubt. While a new law signed last month by President Bush aims to shore up the private pension system by forcing companies to fund their plans more fully, some retirement consultants say the added expense may the trend of companies limiting their plans for existing employees or dropping them for new hires."

Private-Industry Pensions In Jeopardy. The Kansas City Star (9/17, Meyer, 278K) reports, "More than 40 million Americans in the nation's nongovernmental work force are either covered by traditional pension plans or expect to be, authorities estimate. Potentially, three things will happen to the lifetime income streams that these workers and current retirees are expecting after they leave the work force." The report adds, "And two of those — a pension plan being frozen or one being terminated — aren't pretty. Congress passed, and President Bush signed, legislation last month to strengthen traditional pensions with mandates for employers to increase funding, faster repair requirements for underfunded plans, and some special provisions for troubled airlines with potentially whopping pension problems." According to the report, "The new law also significantly improved many features of 401(k) plans and other similar products that increasingly have supplanted traditional pensions over the last two decades. Although surviving pension plans will be stronger, many observers bet that employers will turn even more to 401(k) plans and shift an unprecedented share of the retirement funding load onto workers and their families."

Employers Replacing Pensions With 410 (K)s. The Boston Globe (9/17, Gavin, 425K) reports that IBM factory worker Larry Millette "is among hundreds of thousands of workers whose dreams of long, comfortable retirements are getting upended as U.S. corporations shed both the costs and responsibilities of traditional pensions. Faced with intense competition in a global economy, and huge obligations as baby boomers retire, many of the nation's biggest companies are rewriting the social contract that for 60 or more years has bound them to workers." According to the report, "Since last year, at least a dozen corporations with nearly 1 million US employees either froze pension benefits for current workers, eliminated pension plans for new ones, or both. Today, just over one-third of Fortune 100 companies still offer traditional pensions to new employees, down from one-half in 2002 and 89 percent in 1985, according to Watson Wyatt Worldwide Inc., an Arlington, Va., consulting firm." According to the report, "Now companies are replacing traditional pensions with saving plans such as 401(k)s, which can cut companies' costs by as much as half. … Choosing investments, navigating the ups and downs of financial markets, and putting aside enough money to last through retirement become the problems of workers."

Bush Featured Prominently In Democrats' Ads, But Nearly Absent From GOP's. The New York Times (9/17, Nagourney, 1.21M), in a front-page story, reports President Bush "is emerging as the marquee name in this fall's Congressional elections — courtesy not of his Republican Party but of the Democrats. A review of dozens of campaign commercials finds that Mr. Bush has become the star of the Democrats' advertisement war this fall. … Not surprisingly, given that Mr. Bush's job approval rating continues to hover around 40 percent, it is hard to spot the president in any of the Republican advertisements that were reviewed. In what may be taken as an indication of changing Republican tastes, Senator John McCain of Arizona is popping up everywhere." According to the Times, "The decision by Democrats to invest in advertising directly attacking the war in Iraq, the administration's war on terrorism and the once overwhelmingly popular president is a marked turn from how they handled these issues in 2002 and 2004. … 'In certain districts he's exactly who we want to pivot off,' said Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat leading the effort to win the House. 'I tell all the candidates: Him and his agenda are on the ballot this year.'" The New York Times (9/17, Pear, 1.21M) includes the transcript of a commercial being run by Democrat Patricia Madrid who claims her opponent, Rep. Heather Wilson, "is too close to President Bush on Iraq and other issues."

Shays Says Bush Has "No Credibility" Regarding Iraq. The Washington Post's David Broder (9/17) writes on Rep. Chris Shays' "doubts about what he terms 'the noble mission' that brought the United States to Iraq." Shays "had no qualms about the current president's decision to invade Iraq, because he believed Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. And even now he expresses scorn for those who say they regret their votes to authorize this war because the weapons were not there. 'I would never back away from my vote,' he said. On the other hand… 'The president has no credibility,' Shays said, because of that intelligence blunder and because management of the war has been awful. Notable as he found the Iraqis' political achievement in writing and ratifying a constitution and electing a government in Baghdad, he said: 'Since January, there has been no progress' toward reconciling Shiite-Sunni conflicts and transferring the responsibility for policing the country to the growing army of Iraqis."

Cardin And O'Malley Try To Tie Ehrlich And Steele To Bush. The Washington Post (9/17, A1, Mosk, Wagner, 748K) reports, "The campaigns are for high political office in Maryland, but the Democratic candidates' toughest attacks are focused on a man from Texas: George W. Bush. Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, who is challenging incumbent Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., calls his opponent 'the George Bush Mini-Me of Maryland,' and he has plastered the same photo on three recent campaign mailers. It shows Ehrlich and the president arm in arm. Benjamin L. Cardin (D), the 10-term congressman from Baltimore who is taking on Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in the race for an open U.S. Senate seat, mentions his opponent on the stump. But he saves a battery of attacks for Bush and urges voters to elect Cardin because 'George Bush is leading this nation in the wrong direction.' The Democratic effort to nationalize the two high-profile Maryland campaigns is unmistakable, the latest sign that party leaders believe anger at the president might be the decisive emotion that drives voters to the polls in November."

Democrats Disagree On What To Do In Iraq. In a Week in Review piece for the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M), reporter John Broder writes that Democrats "are trying each of these approaches in a cacophony of frustration and sorrow, reflecting divisions in the party at the national level. If it is hard to see a Democratic plan to end the war, it's because there isn't one." Democrats Eric Massa, Jim Webb, Sen. Joseph Biden, Patricia Madrid and Sen. John Kerry express their views on Iraq should they win office or higher office.

GOP Candidates Given Conflicting Advice Regarding Bush's Campaign Role. In an op-ed appearing in a special Washington Post (9/17, B1, 748K) Outlook section titled "The Advice Issue (REPUBLICAN EDITION)," MSNBC host and former Rep. Joe Scarborough writes, "I can't help but feel sorry for my old Republican friends in Congress who are fighting for their political lives. After all, it must be tough explaining to voters at their local Baptist church's Keep Congress Conservative Day that it was their party that took a $155 billion surplus and turned it into a record-setting $400 billion deficit. How exactly does one convince the teeming masses that Republicans deserve to stay in power despite botching a war, doubling the national debt, keeping company with Jack Abramoff, fumbling the response to Hurricane Katrina, expanding the government at record rates, raising cronyism to an art form, playing poker with Duke Cunningham, isolating America and repeatedly electing Tom DeLay as their House majority leader? How does a God-fearing Reagan Republican explain all that away? Easy. Blame George W. Bush."

In an another op-ed for the Post (9/17, B1), in the same section, Stuart Stevens, partner in the Stevens and Schriefer Group, "a Republican media firm that advised George W. Bush's presidential campaigns," writes, "Most Democrats and the vast majority of what passes for the intelligentsia in this country simply don't understand the appeal of President Bush, much the way Republicans never got that Clinton guy. So now that the president's public approval numbers have fallen from historic highs, there seems to be great salivating at the notion that the country is finally getting what has been so obvious to them for so long and that a national day of reckoning is nigh. This view of Bush transformed from Leader of the Free World into Election Jeremiah is so wrong that it should be laughable. Except that a lot of Republicans seem to believe it's true. They're certainly behaving that way on the campaign trail, acting as though they're sure that a spy camera photo of a candidate caught with the president will be a death sentence in November. And that's a problem -- not for the president but for the candidates and the GOP."

The Post (9/17, B5) also runs a collection of brief bits of advice for Republican candidates from Bill Kristol and Ann Coulter, among many others. Coulter writes, "Republican candidates should talk about the Democrats. The Democrats want to pull out of Iraq, shut down Guantanamo, open the nation's borders, abandon the Patriot Act and the NSA spying program and extend full constitutional protections to people like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the 9/11 attacks. … If this nation returns to the Democratic national security policy known in military circles as 'unconditional surrender,' two years of the Democrats could get us all killed."

Schwartz Claims "Quasi-Theocrats" Are "Infiltrating" The GOP's "Power Structure." In yet another op-ed for the Washington Post (9/17, B5, 748K), this one titled "Don't Lose Like Me," Rep. Joe Schwarz writes, "Even though more than half of all American voters consider themselves centrists, the Republican and Democratic parties are finding themselves controlled to an ever-greater extent by their more extreme elements. On the Republican side, the 'religious right,' the quasi-theocrats, are infiltrating the party power structure quite effectively. … It wasn't President Bush who proved to be the kiss of death to my candidacy for a second term in the House. The president's poll numbers may not be very good in many places, but he's still well-liked in my neck of the woods -- south-central Michigan. So when I geared up to run again this year, I was pleased to have his endorsement. My loss had nothing to do with his popularity, or national issues such as the war in Iraq. What did me in was voter apathy, and moral absolutist groups supported by a vitriolic negative-ad campaign funded by organizations on the far right."

Bush Said To Be Losing Support Among Southern Women. The AP (9/17, McCaffrey) reports President Bush's "once-solid relationship with Southern women is on the rocks. … In recent years, Southern women have been some of Bush's biggest fans, defying the traditional gender gap in which women have preferred Democrats to Republicans." However, "Now, anger over the Iraq war and frustration with the country's direction have taken a toll on the president's popularity and stirred dissatisfaction with the Republican-held Congress. Republicans on the ballot this November have reason to worry. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that three out of five Southern women plan to vote for a Democrat. With control of the Senate and House in the balance, such a seismic shift could have dire consequences for the GOP." The AP adds, "The movement of some Southern women away from the Republican Party tracks with national poll results showing that women have become more disillusioned with the war and were more likely than men to list the conflict as the important issue facing the country."

GOP Candidates Benefit From Bush's Improved Poll Numbers, 9/11 Anniversary. The Houston Chronicle (9/17, Roth, 535K) reports, "A bleak landscape for Republicans in the upcoming congressional elections appeared to brighten ever so slightly last week. The president's aggressive campaign to emphasize terrorism and tie it to the conflict in Iraq has helped nudge upward his still-low approval ratings. Experts say the ratings are an important gauge of how the president's party will fare in the congressional elections. The polls also showed a slight improvement in the public view of his handling of Iraq, an issue Democrats are hoping to use to make big gains. … Thomas Mann, a congressional expert at the liberal-leaning Brookings Institution, said he is skeptical Republicans could sustain momentum generated by the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11. 'My view is it will be a one-week phenomenon,' he said."

Presidential Candidates Expected To Opt Out Of Public Financing System In 2008. The AP (9/17, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Strategists from both parties estimate the White House race in 2008 could cost each nominee $500 million — far more than the Presidential Election Campaign Fund can afford. As a result, this next presidential campaign could mark the first time in 30 years that the Democratic and Republican nominees turn down the fund's millions in both the primary and the general elections. … If the major party candidates decline the general election funds in two years, they in effect would kill one of the chief post-Watergate overhauls in campaign law. The fund, which is expected to have about $200 million by the end of 2007, still would help pay for party presidential nominating conventions and assist primary candidates who do not raise large amounts of money."

Potential Gore-Clinton Primary Race Analyzed. The Houston Chronicle (9/17, Holland, 535K) reports, "Al Gore's statement that he wouldn't rule out running for president raises the possibility of a Democratic duel between the former vice president" and Sen. Hillary Clinton. Pollster John Zogby, "sees 'a battle royal shaping up.' … Gore is 'in a very second tier after Hillary, who is in a league by herself,' Zogby says. … On the other hand, Gore has 'two aces in the hole,' Zogby said. Unlike Clinton, he opposed the Iraq war from the start. And he is known as an expert on the environment."

Obama Seen As Hampered By Unusually High Expectations. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (9/17, McDermott, 300K) reports, "For a politician, is there such a thing as too much popularity? If there's any cloud over U.S. Sen. Barack Obama's seemingly charmed political life, it may be that one. With national political pundits now using words such as 'messiah' in connection with the Chicago Democrat - and one former campaign opponent calling on him to run for president - some say he could ultimately be rising so fast and high in the American consciousness that he may end up with nowhere to go but down. … One rule of thumb in politics is to keep expectations low so that any mistake the politician makes looks smaller while any accomplishment looks bigger. For Obama, sitting on a runaway train of gushing publicity, that kind of 'expectation control' has become impossible." Obama "(whose office reiterated last week that he isn't running for president in 2008) hardly needs his own startling popularity impressed upon him. He has quipped about it himself, joking to reporters at a dinner in Washington in March, for example: 'I want to thank you for all the generous advance coverage you've given me in anticipation of a successful career. When I actually do something, we'll let you know.'"

Obama Advised To Seek Presidency In 2008. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (9/17) writes, "Prominent Illinois Democrats are advising Sen. Barack Obama, now finishing his second year in the Senate, to consider making a run for the 2008 Presidential nomination. One such Democratic stalwart is telling the 45-year-old Obama to run only if prospective front-runner Sen. Hillary Clinton does not. But others are advising the popular freshman senator to go for it even if Clinton is a candidate. These boosters calculate that Obama, the son of a black father and a white mother, could break the Republican Presidential hold on the South by maximizing the African-American vote in states such as South Carolina, Georgia and Mississippi."

McCaskill Seeks "Phased Pullout" Of US Troops In Iraq. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (9/17, Shesgreen, 300K) reports, "Every which way they turn, Sen. Jim Talent and state Auditor Claire McCaskill face voters' unease and anger about the war in Iraq. … But Missourians looking for a dramatic new direction on Iraq from the two candidates competing for the U.S. Senate seat may not be happy with what either Talent or McCaskill has to say." Talent "was among the staunchest proponents of the war and remains unwavering, like many other Republicans, in his belief that setting any timetable for withdrawal would be a terrible mistake." McCaskill "says the war was a mistake and is now a quagmire that has compromised America's strength and bred terrorism in new corners of the world. But she has not bowed to the most fiery anti-war wing of her party…or even to some Democratic senators who have called for withdrawing all U.S. troops by the middle of next year. McCaskill advocates a two-year phased pullout, to begin this year, with American troops eventually replaced by a multinational force - time enough, she says, to allow the Iraqi government to achieve stability."

Lieberman Advocates Bipartisan Commitment To War On Terror. The Hartford Courant (9/17, Pazniokas, 195K) reports, "Using apocalyptic imagery of civilization lost, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman blamed politics Friday for undermining the war on terror and leaving the U.S. vulnerable to 'barbarians at our gates.' … His 25-minute address repeatedly called for bipartisanship in Washington, reinforcing the central theme of his re-election campaign as an independent since losing the Democratic primary in August to his main rival, Ned Lamont." Lieberman "faulted the Bush administration for alienating potential allies in the war on terror, though he gave no examples of an administration miscue. He never mentioned the war in Iraq, a topic he intends to address with another policy speech."

The New York Times (9/17, Medina, 1.21M) reports, "It was Mr. Lieberman's first major speech since he was defeated in the Democratic primary last month, and aides said it was intended to be a policy update rather than a political statement." Lieberman "criticized both major parties, highlighting his odd political position now. 'It is wrong for some on the right to imply that some Democrats don't care if the terrorists succeed, or that debating the merits of the president's policies on the war on terrorism emboldens our enemies,' Mr. Lieberman said. That kind of attack on people's motives 'divides and weakens us as a nation,' he said. But Mr. Lieberman, who is trying to strike a careful balance as he seeks Republican and unaffiliated votes in November, also criticized some of the president's detractors. 'It is wrong for some on the left who go beyond dissent and demonize the president and impugn the motives of all those who support him,' Mr. Lieberman said. 'Like it or not, we are in this war against terror, and we are in it together.'"

Dynamics Of Kean-Menendez Race Follow Familiar New Jersey Pattern. The New York Times' Peter Applebome(9/17) reports "all the major political newsletters" are "now calling the race between State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican, and Senator Robert Menendez, the Democrat, a toss-up. And, whether or not control of the Senate ends up hinging on the answer, it's clear that this is yet another toxic soufflé of New Jersey politics that will revolve around this question: Who seems scarier — the Republicans in Washington or the Democrats in New Jersey? … The betting for most is still that things eventually revert to form. New Jersey has not elected a Republican to the Senate since Clifford Case 34 years ago. Polls show the Iraq war wildly unpopular in New Jersey and President Bush getting a favorable approval rating from about a third of state voters. And in tough races, the Democrats almost always manage to turn out big enough numbers in North Jersey cities to push the sick and frail over the finish line."

Allen Likely To Benefit From Gay Marriage Ban On Virginia Ballot. The Washington Times (9/17, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Virginia's constitutional amendment on marriage will attract conservative voters who otherwise would have stayed home in frustration with national Republicans, grass-roots activists say. The bump in turnout in November likely will benefit U.S. Sen. George Allen, a Republican who until recently appeared a lock for re-election and poised for a 2008 White House bid." The Times notes Allen "favors amending the state constitution, but his challenger, Democrat James H. Webb Jr., opposes the constitutional change as broad and discriminatory. Democrats say Republicans should not be so confident that the measure will pass with a large margin. They say its placement on the ballot -- once considered a gift from Republican state legislators so Mr. Allen could get a landslide win -- is stirring opposition in the more liberal areas of the state. A recent Mason-Dixon poll showed the amendment winning but losing support."

Virginia Voters Urged To Reject Gay Marriage Ban Amendment. The Washington Post (9/17, B6, 748K) opines in an editorial, "Since 1998, 20 states have adopted constitutional amendments banning gay marriage. But not all of them have been drafted so expansively, and so carelessly, as the measure that will appear on Virginia's ballot in November, which would recognize no 'union, partnership or other legal status to which is assigned the rights, benefits, obligations, qualities or effects of marriage.'" According to the Post, "The amendment is muddle-headed and absurdly broad, duplicates what is already in state law and carries the germ of a thousand unintended consequences. Virginia voters should reject it."

Both Candidates Now Utilizing Sophisticated Blogging Efforts. The Washington Post (9/17, A1, Shear, Craig, 748K), in a front-page story, reports, "Virginia's U.S. Senate race has catapulted bloggers into the middle of electioneering and controversy as campaign supporters use their online forums to connect with voters, raise money and spread gossip. Liberal bloggers…fanned the flames last month after" Allen "aimed a derogatory remark at a young Webb volunteer. That hype has helped Webb close a double-digit Allen lead in public polls and was a blow to the Republican senator's possible presidential bid in 2008. The lack of an effective response from conservative bloggers has prompted Allen to hire a Virginia blogger as his 'new media coordinator' to goose GOP supporters into action. And four of Virginia's most popular conservative bloggers launched http://www.allens-a-team.com last week to counter what they call liberal attacks. Together, the Webb and Allen campaigns are transforming the image of the independent blogger, clicking away on his own dime from his basement. And they are pushing the boundaries of federal campaign finance laws as blogs that once were personal diaries have come to resemble full-blown campaign operations that don't have to be reported as expenses."

Chafee Primary Win Sets Back Democratic Hopes To Retake Senate. The Washington Times (9/17, Fagan, 88K) reports, "Senate Democrats last week lost a key chance in their battle to retake the Senate, when top Republicans helped one of their most liberal members, Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, defeat a more conservative challenger who both sides thought would lose to Democrats in November. … Democrats have to gain six seats in order to retake the Senate." According to the report, "Senate Democrats strongly disagree that Mr. Chafee's win was a setback for them. They argue that they can still win the seat because Mr. Chafee was weakened by the bitter primary and polls show a tight race between him and Democratic nominee Sheldon Whitehouse, a former state attorney general." However, according to the report, "The hill is now a bit steeper for Democrats than it would have been had the more conservative Stephen Laffey won the Republican primary in the Democratic state."

Former President Clinton Lends Fundraising Prowess To Democratic Senate Candidate. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/17, Marcotty, 398K) reports that in Minnesota, "Former President Bill Clinton, the Democrats' favorite Democrat, stood with U.S. Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar before a crowd of more than 1,400 people Saturday night to shed some of his rainmaking power on her and her political party. Clinton raised cheers at the fundraising dinner held at the RiverCentre in St. Paul when he said that Klobuchar 'may be the very best we have in the United States.'" According to the report, Clinton's "presence in Minnesota, and that of President Bush at a Republican fundraiser in August, illustrates the importance that both parties place on this Senate race. 'It's the most competitive race in the country,' said Mark Drake, communications director for the Republican Party in Minnesota." According the report, "Questions were raised about whether Bush would help or hurt Minnesota Republican candidates during his fundraising swing here. But that's not an issue for Clinton or the candidates he supports in Minnesota, experts said."

Religion Playing Larger Role In Contemporary Politics. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/17, O'toole, 241K) reports, "Bob Casey returned to his law school, Catholic University, last week, to deliver a message on how his faith informs his public life. This Wednesday, Dr. James Dobson, the popular and influential evangelical broadcaster, will appear at the Mellon Arena." According to the report, "Sen. Rick Santorum, whose reelection is being challenged by Mr. Casey, won't be there and won't be endorsed formally at the gathering, but the selection of Pittsburgh as a site for pre-election Stand for the Family rallies shows how highly the conservative Republican is valued by Dr. Dobson and his colleagues." The report adds, "The two events highlight the importance of religion in this race and in the broader national struggle between parties eager to appeal to 'the values voter,' that many analysts saw as a decisive factor in the 2004 presidential race. Since that election, Democrats nationally have struggled to find a natural voice on religious issues."

Franken Emerging As Fundraising "Powerhouse" In Minnesota. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/17, Hotakainen, 398K) reports, "A new Democratic powerhouse is emerging in Minnesota this campaign season: comedian Al Franken. His political-action committee, which is called Midwest Values, has raised more than $800,000 that he's spreading to Democratic candidates in Minnesota and across the country. … But Franken, a bestselling author and radio talk-show host who grew up in St. Louis Park, could be the ultimate beneficiary if he cashes in his chits and runs for the Senate in 2008 against Minnesota Republican Sen. Norm Coleman. Franken, who moved from New York to Minneapolis this year, said he might form an exploratory committee for that race early next year. He is raising campaign money from a variety of sources -- from the entertainment industry on both coasts, his stand-up comedy shows and elsewhere."

GOP Congressmen Come To Louisiana To Boost Party Hopeful Craig Romero. The Baton Rouge Advocate (9/17, Courreges) reports, "The Louisiana Republican Party's two hottest political acts traveled to Houma Saturday to declare their support for Republican Louisiana 3rd Congressional District challenger Craig Romero. U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, and U.S. Sen. David Vitter, R-Metairie, held a news conference with state Sen. Romero, R-New Iberia, in front of the Terrebonne Parish Courthouse where they praised Romero's values and work ethic." According to the report, "Romero is the best-known and best-funded of three challengers attempting to unseat first-term incumbent U.S. Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, in the Nov. 7 election. The other two are Franklin Libertarian James Lee Blake Jr. and LaPlace Democrat Olangee "OJ" Breech."

Muslim Candidate's Ties To CAIR Chief Questioned. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/17, Schmickle, 398K) reports that last week, Minnesota Republicans put terror support in the spotlight after Nihad

Awad flew to Minneapolis to attend a fundraiser for state Rep. Keith Ellison in August. According to the report, Awad is "a former Minnesotan and executive director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) in Washington, one of the nation's most prominent Muslim groups. … Many conservatives and Jewish groups say that CAIR is rooted in the Hamas movement and that its leaders also secretly support Hezbollah in Lebanon," groups considered to be terrorist organizations by the U.S. According to the report, "If he wins, Ellison will be the first Muslim elected to Congress. He called Awad an 'acquaintance,' saying he has known the CAIR leader for many years but not well enough to be able to 'account for everything he has ever done, everybody he knows or everything he has ever said.'" The report adds, however, "After Awad attended the Ellison fundraiser on Aug. 25, conservative blogs, some Jewish groups and some Democrats objected."

Patrick Has 21-Point Lead In Democrats' Massachusetts Gubernatorial Primary. The Boston Globe (9/17, Phillips, 425K) reports, "Heading into the final days of the campaign, Deval Patrick has opened up a commanding lead in the Democratic race for governor, far outpacing his closest challenger, Christopher Gabrieli, and leaving Thomas F. Reilly a distant third, according to a new poll conducted for The Boston Globe and CBS4-TV. Forty-six percent of those surveyed supported Patrick, 25 percent backed Gabrieli, and 18 percent were for Reilly in the poll of 523 likely voters in Tuesday's primary election. Only 6 percent said they were undecided, while 4 percent expressed support for other candidates in next Tuesday's election. The survey was taken Sept. 12-15 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percent."

Poll Shows Pawlenty And Hatch Tied At 42. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/17, Olson, 398K) reports Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty and Attorney General Mike Hatch "are entering the fall campaign facing an electorate evenly divided on their candidacies for governor, according to the latest Star Tribune Minnesota Poll. Among the 820 likely voters surveyed statewide Wednesday through Friday, just after the state's primary election, DFLer Hatch and Republican Pawlenty are in a dead heat, each with 42 percent support. Independence Party candidate Peter Hutchinson has the support of 7 percent. With less than two months before the Nov. 7 general election, Hatch and Pawlenty appear to have locked down their partisan bases and are battling for a smaller pool of independent and undecided voters."

Rendell Well Ahead Of Swan Despite Unfulfilled Campaign Pledges. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (9/17, Barnes, 241K) reports, "In his first four years in office, Gov. Ed Rendell pushed hard to increase the state income tax, signed the infamous legislative pay raise, failed to enact middle-class property tax relief and oversaw state budgets that regularly exceeded the inflation rate. So his bid for re-election has to be in trouble, right? Well, no. For months, the Democratic incumbent, who was mayor of Philadelphia in the 1990s, has led his Republican challenger, former Steeler Lynn Swann, by double digits in every poll. 'I call him 'Teflon Ed' because nothing bad seems to stick to him," said Clay Richards, director of the Quinnipiac Poll, which put Mr. Rendell up by 19 points recently."

Taylor And Perdue Offer Dueling Tax Cut Proposals. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (9/17, Galloway, 399K) reports, "Tax cuts became the language of the race for governor on Saturday, as Democratic nominee Mark Taylor vowed to eliminate the state property tax on more than 2.5 million Georgia homeowners. Lifting the .25 mills now assessed by the state would force a $76 million cut in the state's annual budget, and would average $30 a year per homeowner — the amount varying according to the value of each house. 'There's one tax-cutter running for governor, and you're looking at him. The big guy likes big tax cuts,' Taylor told several hundred screaming delegates attending the annual state Democratic Party convention in College Park. … Only days earlier, Republican incumbent Sonny Perdue, before a similar gathering of his own partisans, promised to eliminate the state income tax on retirement income — from pension funds and investments — for Georgians older than 65. Perdue's cut would cost the state $142 million a year, and apply to between 250,000 and 400,000 people."

Will Sees Democrats' Views On Social Issues As The Key To The Rise Of The GOP. In his column for the Washington Post (9/17, B7, 748K) George Will discusses "Building Red America: The New Conservative Coalition and the Drive for Permanent Power," a new book from the New Republic's Thomas Edsall. According to Will, Edsall "explains how Americans differ concerning what he calls 'freedom from the need to maintain the marital or procreative bond.'" Will then quotes from Edsall: "To social conservatives,' he writes, 'these developments have signaled an irretrievable and tragic loss. Their reaction has fueled, on the right, a powerful traditionalist movement and a groundswell of support for the Republican Party. To modernists, these developments constitute, at worst, the unfortunate costs of progress, and, at best -- and this is very much the view on the political left as well as of Democratic Party loyalists -- they constitute a triumph over unconscionable obstacles to the liberation and self-realization of much of the human race." Will concludes, "Looking for the real reason for the rise of 'Red America'? Read that paragraph again."

Ailing Automaker Ford Attempts A Turnaround In Bid To Revive Company. The Washington Times (9/17, Lengell, 88K) reports, "When he stepped down this month as Ford Motor Co.'s president and chief executive, Bill Ford Jr. acknowledged the ailing, 103-year-old automaker must reinvent itself to survive in an increasingly competitive industry. With the company announcing a deeper and accelerated restructuring plan Friday, it's obvious the auto giant's new chief executive, Alan Mulally, formerly executive vice president of Boeing, will lead a leaner, smaller and possibly more focused automaker. But will that be enough?" According to the report, J.D. Power and Associates automotive analyst Jeff Schuster says, "'Right now, with so many variables, I would have to say the jury's still out. I don't think Ford is going to disappear. ... But they will not recover that ground they've lost in the marketplace."

Former President Clinton Shares Memories Of Past Governor Ann Richards. The Dallas Morning News (9/17, Brooks, 500K) reports, "Former President Bill Clinton wiped away tears as he stood near his friend Ann Richards' flag-draped casket at the Texas Capitol on Saturday, describing a woman with 'big hair, big bright eyes, big blinding smile ... big heart and big dreams." According to the report, "A friend of Bill and Hillary Clinton for three decades, Ms. Richards, 73, died of esophageal cancer at her home in Austin on Wednesday. Mr. Clinton joined the Richards family Saturday in escorting the casket to the rotunda; Ms. Richards' body is lying in state there over the weekend."

The Washington Post/AP (9/17, A15, Castro) reports that at a memorial for former Texas Governor Ann Richards, former president Bill Clinton "delivered poignant and at times funny recollections of the woman he called "spontaneous, unedited, earthy, hilarious." According to the report, "During her one term as governor, from 1991 to 1995, she championed what she called the 'New Texas,' appointing more women and minorities to state posts than any of her predecessors. Clinton described the world that Richards wanted for her grandchildren as one 'where young girls grew up to be scientists, engineers, police officers and teachers … where the dreams and the spirit were as big as the sky in her beloved home.'"

Teachers Urged To Provide Open Forum For Ideas. In an op/ed in The New York Times Magazine (9/17), Pennsylvania State University's Michael Berube writes, "So far as I know, my department, like many university departments of English, consists of wall-to-wall Democrats. If my faculty colleagues have any good words to say about George Bush's fiscal or foreign policies, they're keeping them to themselves." Berube adds, "Every so often, someone on the academic left does Horowitz and company the favor of saying something foolish or simply outrageous about 9/11 or Iraq, and the grist meets the mill once again." According to Berube, "Every responsible teacher should think of the classroom as a relatively safe space, free of intimidation or coercion. But in return, every responsible student should realize that the classroom is only relatively safe, because arguing about ideas isn't risk-free."

Paulson Ask Other Countries To Limit Iranian Access To Banks. The New York Times (9/17, Weisman, 1.21M) reports, "The United States pressed the top finance officials of the world's leading industrial nations on Saturday to crack down on what Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. said was the exploitation of their banking systems by at least 30 Iranian front companies involved in illicit activities." He said "that the front companies were identified by American intelligence agencies as funneling money to terrororist groups using banks in Europe and elsewhere, many of them 'blue chip banks,'" adding "that many leading trading companies in Iran with legitimate business operations were also involved in the illicit activities, and that it behooved any legitimate bank to realize that it was risky to continue doing even legitimate business with the companies." These "comments appeared to reflect the emerging Bush administration strategy on Iran as efforts to impose sanctions by the United Nations Security Council have faltered." Additionally, "Last week, in what administration officials call a major escalation in the effort to squeeze Iran economically, the Treasury Department announced that Bank Saderat, a major bank in Iran, would no longer have even indirect access to the United States financial system."

The Washington Post (9/17, A23, Goodman, 748K) adds that Paulson "used his first meeting of world finance chiefs on Saturday as a venue to press the Bush administration's mission to isolate Iran and choke its nuclear aspirations." However, he "portrayed the initiative as 'an education job,' giving his counterparts the ability to act voluntarily," and, "In a statement issued after the meeting, the G-7 finance ministers lent general support."

The Wall Street Journal (9/17, Phillips, 2.03M) leads, "Frustrated in its efforts to secure U.N. sanctions on Iran, the Bush administration is trying to convince individual governments and banks to sever financial relationships that allegedly allow Tehran to finance its nuclear ambitions and foreign terrorist groups." Paulson told reporters "he has dispatched aides to Europe and the Persian Gulf in recent days, where he has instructed them to lay out the U.S. case that Iran has been using dozens of front companies to fool banks into facilitating illicit financial transactions."

Bloomberg (9/17, Carmichael) also covers this story.

US Said To Have Limited Options For Dealing With Iran. The New York Times (9/17, Cooper, Sciolino, 1.21M) reports, "After intense talks about Iran's nuclear program, the United States and other major world powers face two unappealing choices as the United Nations General Assembly opens this week: introduce a resolution in the Security Council for sanctions against Tehran that may not be tough enough to make a difference, or delay any punitive measures, rendering their diplomacy on Iran meaningless." Therefore "the Bush administration, along with Russia, China, France, Britain and Germany, have quietly shifted their strategy" and "offered a major concession. They are embarking on a two-track approach that allows the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, to conduct open-ended negotiations with Iran on the conditions for a suspension while the Security Council weighs punitive measures." This "is a fundamental shift and an admission of how few options President Bush and his European allies have."

In an analysis piece, the AP (9/17, Gearan) adds, "When President Bush addresses world leaders at the United Nations this week, he will have fewer options and lower expectations on almost every major foreign policy front than a year ago." While "Bush and his foreign policy advisers have tried with some success to dispel the caricature of Bush abroad as a Texas cowboy riding alone and herding the U.S. into an unpopular war in Iraq," that "war, now in its fourth year, devours resources and energy for other global objectives and feeds mistrust about U.S. intentions, experts say."

EU To Meet With Iran Without US. The AP (9/17, Riechmann) reports, "European diplomats are considering a meeting with Iran on the sidelines of next week's U.N. General Assembly in hopes of de-escalating the standoff over Tehran's nuclear program — but the United States won't be getting an invitation. The Bush administration, which is pushing for U.N. sanctions against Iran, has said it will join European-led negotiations with Iran only if it stops its uranium enrichment work first," and a US official said "The Bush administration has little confidence that 'Iran will come through to meet the conditions' of verifiably suspending its enrichment work."

Abbas To Meet With Rice, Bush On Sidelines Of UN. The New York Times/AP (9/17) reports, "Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, will meet with President Bush in New York on Wednesday, on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly," and "will be preceded by talks on Monday between Mr. Abbas and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." Palestinian official Saeb Erekat "said the discussion would touch on a wide range of issues, including the coalition government that Mr. Abbas is trying to form with the Hamas political movement and the fate of an Israeli soldier seized by Hamas-allied militants in Gaza in June." A separate AP (9/17, El Deeb) article adds that Abbas "will likely seek to promote his planned coalition with Hamas," but "the White House would not confirm the meeting and it was not clear whether Bush's final schedule in New York had been set."

Lebanon Conflict Spurred Israelis' Questioning Of Leaders. The Washington Post (9/17, A1, Wilson, 748K) reports, "Frustration over the outcome of the war in Lebanon has spurred many Israelis to question the abilities of a new class of political professionals who are stepping into roles long held by the men and women who founded the Jewish state" as "the uncertain aftermath of the first war to be managed by a prime minister from outside Israel's founding generation…has sharpened debate over whether the best of the new generation are entering public life." Ehud Olmert "and others of his political generation embody a leadership shift that highlights the Jewish state's changing values and demographics," as the "original socialist character has evolved into a more free-market economy and less centralized government." As a result, "Israel's mainstream political leadership now consists mostly of pragmatic men and women who have made politics their profession -- a sharp contrast to the ideological volunteers, shaped by persecution, who founded Israel nearly six decades ago." Now, "opinion polls show that a large majority of Israelis believe the previous leaders were better than the current ones, while one in five Israelis does not think any of the senior party leaders is suitable to be prime minister."

Nonaligned Movement Gathering Approved Anti-US, Israel Document. The AP (9/17, Rodriguez) reports, "Representatives of 118 Nonaligned Movement nations condemned Israel's attacks on Lebanon and supported a peaceful resolution to the U.S.-Iran nuclear" in a 92-page declaration that "also broadly condemned terrorism. But it said movements for self-determination and battles against foreign occupiers should not be considered terrorism." These "final statements, many of which contain veiled criticisms of the U.S., were approved by unanimous consent after another round of speeches Saturday night by leaders of the movement." At the meeting were "the leaders of Iran, Venezuela, North Korea, Zimbabwe among other leading U.S. adversaries. Raul joined them in saying a bellicose America had made the world more dangerous." The US "said it would have no comment on any of the proceedings."

Lebanese Government Struggles With Complexity Of Rebuilding. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Stack, 918K) reports that analysts say the rush to rebuild Lebanon "has gotten tangled up with a high-stakes sectarian competition, as Sunni Arab governments in the region race against Shiite-ruled Iran and its ally Hezbollah to prove political clout and capture grass-roots loyalty" in "a stark reminder of the panic that has gripped the region as the power of Iran has swelled." Now "Persian Gulf states, including Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, have come forward with immense donations" and "the Lebanese government, dominated by Sunnis and Christians, has struggled to counteract the perception that Hezbollah is chiefly responsible for the aid and reconstruction efforts." Meanwhile, "Hezbollah's political leaders dismiss government aid efforts as corruption-riddled traps that snare money long before it reaches the needy. They sometimes speak of the government as a foreign force."

Vatican Issues Statement Expressing Pope's Regrets That Remarks Were Found Offensive. The New York Times (9/17, Fisher, 1.21M) reports, "A top Vatican official said Saturday that Pope Benedict XVI 'deeply regretted' that a speech he made this week 'sounded offensive to the sensibility of Muslim believers.' … The Vatican statement stopped short of the direct personal apology from Benedict that many Muslims have been demanding. Still, the statement tried to tamp down rising anger among Muslims about the speech, in which Benedict quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor as calling Islam ;evil and inhuman.'"

The Washington Post/AP (9/17, A18, D'emilio) reports, "The new Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, said the pope's position on Islam is unmistakably in line with Vatican teaching that says the church 'esteems' Muslims. Benedict 'thus sincerely regrets that certain passages of his address could have sounded offensive to the sensitivities of the Muslim faithful and should have been interpreted in a manner that in no way corresponds to his intentions,'" The statement "failed to satisfy critics."

The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Wilkinson, 918K) reports, "Hostility to the pope's speech -- a dense lecture in which he quoted a medieval Byzantine emperor as saying, 'Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman' -- has plunged Benedict's 17-month-old papacy into its most difficult diplomatic crisis."

Five Churches Firebombed Over Pope's Remarks. McClatchy Newspapers (9/17, El Naggar) reports, "Gunmen firebombed five churches in the Palestinian territories Saturday over remarks by Pope Benedict XVI this week that outraged Muslims and prompted the Vatican to issue a mildly worded apology." McClatchy adds, "Palestinian gunmen targeted five churches in Gaza and the West Bank with firebombs, causing charred doors and bullet holes in walls, but no one was injured."

Sudanese President Rejects UN Intervention In Darfur. The AP (9/17, Rodriguez) reports that Sudanese president Omar al-Bashir "again rejected the deployment of U.N. peacekeeping troops in the war-torn Darfur region during a meeting with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan on Saturday." He said, "Justice is and remains our objective but through diplomatic, political and other means," which is "why we reject this position."

Sudanese VP Favors UN Intervention. The AP (9/17, Osman) reports that First Vice President Salva Kiir Mayardit, "one of two vice presidents in Sudan's power-sharing government, "said in remarks published Saturday that he would accept the deployment of U.N. peacekeepers in the country's war-torn Darfur region." He added that "the Sudanese government was incapable of protecting civilians in Darfur, and called on the U.N. to intervene." The AFP (9/17, Ali Saeed) leads that "Kiir said a UN peacekeeping force is vital for the protection of civilians in Darfur." Kiir's southern former rebel movement (SPLM) forms part of a national unity government as part of a January 2005 peace deal with Beshir's regime, and "the SPLM's stance on the presence of international troops could threaten the implementation of peace accords, an analyst said."

Reporter Remembers Visiting Colleague In Sudanese Jail. Craig Timberg, the Johannesburg bureau chief of the Washington Post, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (9/17, B3, 748K) describes his visits to Paul Salopek, a two-time Pulitzer Prize winner for the Chicago Tribune, who was detained in Sudan after entering without a visa. He was charged with the "visa violation…espionage and writing 'false news.'" Salopek had entered because he was "distraught over what could happen to civilians once all the outside witnesses left Darfur, as the government seemed determined to make happen." Timberg mentions Salopek's interactions with his guards and his resignation to serve time if he had to. He also mentions "the small contingent of U.S. diplomatic and military officials who had made it their mission to keep Salopek as safe and comfortable as possible."

North Korea's No 2 Leader Blames US For Lack Of Peace. The AP (9/17, Arrington) reports, "North Korea's No. 2 leader blamed the lack of world peace on the United States Saturday at the Nonaligned Summit, saying that because of its failure to respect the sovereignty of other nations, 'the international order is destroyed.'" Parliament leader Kim Yong Nam presented "the latest anti-American statement at a meeting that has brought together some of the staunchest U.S. foes, including the presidents of Iran, Venezuela and Zimbabwe." He "also defended the North's nuclear program amid concerns the communist country may be preparing to carry out an atomic weapons test," adding, "The DPRK will never go back to the talks under U.S. sanctions."

NAM Backs Iran On Nukes. The Washington Times (9/17, 88K) reports, "Developing countries yesterday wrapped up a multinational summit with North Korea charging that U.S. threats drove it to acquire deterrent atomic weapons and Iran winning solid support for its nuclear ambitions. Iran, Venezuela and Cuba joined North Korea in leading efforts to forge an anti-U.S. alliance. Summit leaders, in a statement on Iran, 'reaffirmed the basic and inalienable right of all states to develop research, production and use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes.'" Still, "governments with friendly ties to Washington, among them India, Pakistan, Chile, Peru and Colombia, sought to steer the summit away from confrontation and finger-pointing at the United States."

Group Airs Film Examining Life In North Korea. The Washington Times (9/17, Kim, 88K) reports, "Liberty in North Korea, a 2-year-old organization with a global reach, has found success drawing attention to human rights atrocities in the isolated communist state. Its latest effort featured an airing of the movie 'Seoul Train' at the American University in Northwest last week. The film opens with a small North Korean boy wandering around a market, searching the ground for bits of food to eat. … The 1995 documentary by filmmakers Jim Butterworth, Lisa Sleeth and Aaron Lubarsky depicts the life-and-death struggle faced by North Koreans who attempt to flee their homeland through China."

North Korean, South Korean Members Of Family Reunite Over Satellite. In the New York Times Magazine (9/17), Mary Chi-Whi Kim writes, "Last December, after 55 years, members of our South Korean family reunited with northern relatives for two hours via satellite. It was one of hundreds of such virtual reunions that the Red Cross has organized for families who have been separated since the 1953 armistice split the country in half."

As US Approves More Missions, UN Stretched By Peacekeeping. The Washington Post (9/17, A17, Lynch, 748K) reports, "The United Nations is set to field its largest peacekeeping enterprise in its 61-year history, with more than 100,000 troops and police to be deployed by year's end in missions around the world," but "The unprecedented growth in peacekeeping operations is placing strains on the United Nations' capacity to respond to emerging crises in various parts of the world and is draining the pool of available troops both for the world body and for NATO." This growth "marks the end of a retreat in funding for new missions by the United States," as, "Despite its initial reservations about the virtues of U.N. nation-building, the Bush administration has led efforts to reinforce existing operations and create new ones for Haiti, Liberia, Sudan and Lebanon. It has repeatedly approved operations in countries where it has few national interests." U.S. ambassador to the United Nations John R. Bolton "said that the Bush administration continues to have misgivings about the organization's fitness to effectively manage its peacekeeping operations but that a proliferation of crises has forced U.S. support."

Annan Said To Have Brought Relevance Back To UN. Author James Traub writes in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K) that Secretary-General of the UN, Kofi Annan has "restored the relevance of the U.N. The new U.N. head brought Washington back into the fold through a combination of unflagging solicitude and gentle prodding." Also, his "willingness to upbraid African leaders on behalf of Western principles…gave him the freedom to make demands of the West on issues of development." However, "a secretary-general, for all that we romanticize him, can do very little to alter the fundamental calculations of states. As the United Nations begins in earnest to choose a replacement for Annan, we must bear in mind that a secretary-general is, in the end, a creature of the geopolitical moment," and "the U.N., at least that part dealing with issues of peace and security, cannot be any more effective than its most powerful members want or permit it to be."

Author Argues That Despite UN's Flaws, There Is No Viable Alternative. Author David Rieff writes in the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), "In a world in which the so-called clash of civilizations is no longer an academic hypothesis but increasingly a reality, at least in the minds and hearts of enormous numbers of ordinary Muslims and Christians who each see the other as bent on all-out war…the limits of what Western militaries can accomplish politically has become obvious" and "unilateralism — and the reliance on 'coalitions of the willing' — which seemed so promising in the late-1990s, has turned out not to be a viable alternative to the U.N. system after all." It turns out "there is really no viable alternative to the U.N. … How else to explain U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton — a man who is on record as having said that if 10 stories were removed from the U.N. headquarters building no one would notice the difference — behaving these days like a U.N. booster?" Thus, "the U.N.'s future is perfectly viable because no one has a good alternative to propose."

Goldberg Argues For Confirming John Bolton. Jonah Goldberg writes in his column in he Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), "I speak now not so much in praise of John Bolton as in dispraise of Boltophobia." John "Bolton (like most Americans) thinks that the U.N. is the problem, while those infected with Boltophobia think that it's the solution -- and that the U.S. is the problem." Bolton did "a first-rate job as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations during his yearlong interim appointment," and "most Americans agree with Bolton that the U.N. is a cesspool of its own crapulence, stealing American tax dollars intended for global do-goodery while working against American interests." We can keep Boltophobia "from controlling our lives. And that means Bolton should be confirmed."

Author Urges Senate To Reject Bolton. Stephen Schlesinger, author or "Act of Creation," on the founding of the United Nations, writes in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (9/17, 918K), "Bolton has had 12 months to show his stuff. And frankly, there is still no evidence to suggest that he deserves a full-time posting. Bolton has never been a diplomat — which, among his supporters, is regarded as a mark of honor." He "has for a long time been an excessive and unrestrained critic of the U.N.," and "His record since taking over as ambassador in August 2005 has shown that his adversarial stance toward the institution has not softened." Bolton also "has, on occasion, reportedly sneaked around his own nominal boss, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to Vice President Dick Cheney." Additionally, "he doesn't get along well with our allies. His bristling nature has left many bruised feelings among his colleagues. His accomplishments are marginal at best." For "harmonize differing viewpoints and work out compromises to further U.S. national security interests," it is "a serious error…appointing a Jacobin to work inside a collegial global body." Bolton as our Ambassador to the UN is "a blemish on our nation. His nomination should be rejected again by the Senate."

Cambodia Welcomes Chinese Investments. The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Lee, 918K) reports, "For centuries, the Kingdom of Cambodia has tried to fend off greater powers such as Thailand, Vietnam and France. But today Phnom Penh is welcoming the Chinese with open arms, praising Beijing as a government that offers its largess unconditionally." The Times adds, "Some Western diplomats see China's growing influence here as a threat to American political interests in the region "

China's Baidu Search Engine Prospers Under Government Censorship. The New York Times (9/17, Barboza, 1.21M) profiles Chinese search engine Baidu. The Times writes, "But Baidu's evolution…offer[s] textbook examples of the payoffs and perils of doing business in China and suggest that Baidu may prove to be far more resilient than some analysts believe. … In exchange for letting censors oversee its Web site, Baidu has sealed its dominance with support from the Chinese government, which regularly blocks Google here and imposes strict rules and censorship on other foreign Internet companies. In addition, analysts say, entrepreneurs in China have a knack for pummeling American Internet giants."

India, Pakistan Agree To Resume Peace Talks. The New York Times/AP (9/17) reports, "Pakistan and India agreed Saturday to restart peace talks" after the Pakistani president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, and the Indian prime minister, Manmohan Singh, working "out the details Saturday morning on the sidelines of the Nonaligned Movement summit meeting in Havana," agreeing "on cabinet-level talks." Both called "their meeting as a breakthrough for peace," and "Mr. Singh also said he had accepted an invitation to travel to Pakistan to further the process." A fuller version of the AP (9/17, Arrington) story adds, "Their joint statement said they had a 'cordial, frank exchange of views on all aspects of India and Pakistan relations' and they 'strongly condemn all acts of terrorism.'" The AFP (9/17, Moser) notes, "India had earlier indicated a condemnation of terrorism was key to reaching an agreement on the resumption of negotiations over Kashmir." Indian foreign secretary designate Shivshankar Menon noted "the agreement on terrorism 'has made it possible for us to clear resumption of the dialogue.'"

Russian Regulator's Murder Demonstrates Upper Class's Vulnerability. he New York Times (9/17, Chivers, 1.21M) reports, "Violent deaths continuously punctuate the civic discourse in Russia. The list of victims and motives is grim and long: contract hits on rivals, bombs to settle business disputes, racist attacks on laborers from the Caucasus or Central Asia and students from Africa or South America, and the almost regular killings of police officers in Russian republics where ethnic and religious tensions are inflamed. … But the murder last week of Andrei Kozlov, one of Russia's top bank regulators, served as a reminder that even the upper strata of society here are not immune from the vicious rules of the Russian street."

Hoagland Says Democracy Not "Totally Dead" In Russia. In his column in the Washington Post (9/17, B7, 748K), Jim Hoagland writes, "That frustrating zigzag pattern is at work today in Russia as President Vladimir Putin deepens an authoritarian transformation underwritten by surging oil and gas revenue that buys him public calm. But the political and economic centralization he manages may carry the seeds of its own demise. This transformation of Russia -- as dispiriting as it has seemed recently to many in the West and here -- is not carved in stone. The deep concern that the Kremlin's rulers show for the opinion of their relatively well-educated public is one sign that not even they believe democracy is totally dead here."

Chavez Recommends Books. The New York Times (9/17, Romero, 1.21M) reports that often, when Venezuelan

President Hugo Chávez "drops the names of books he is reading or has grown to love, giving insight into the various intellectual and literary influences on his thinking," including an "anti-Bush staples": "Dude, Where's My Country?" by filmmaker Michael Moore. This practice "reflects what seems a wider strategy on his part: he seems determined to articulate and spread a national ideology."

Obrador Vows To Set Up Own Mexican Government. The New York Times (9/17, McKinley, 1.21M) reports, "More than 150,000 supporters of" losing presidential candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador "flooded into the capital's historic square on Saturday and declared him 'the legitimate president' of Mexico." At a "massive rally" that "seemed intended to keep Mr. López Obrador and his political agenda from fading out of the national debate, the crowd "unanimously denied Mr. Calderón had won. They declared Mr. López Obrador president, asked him to form a cabinet and supported a constitutional convention." Obrador "vowed to set up his own government and to fight against 'a band of white-collar crooks and corrupt politicians' who he has said stole the election from him."

The AP (9/17, Adams) adds, "Lopez Obrador said he hoped to mass as many as 1 million people for the event. However, the Zocalo is only accommodates fewer than 200,000 people, according to local news media and an architects association." The AFP (9/17, Peyrille) notes, "Although Obrador lost the election by a narrow margin, his protest campaign has drawn dwindling support among the wider public. A poll released last week showed some 74 percent accept the decision of the electoral court declaring Calderon the winner."

The Los Angeles Times (9/17, Enriquez, 918K) is more sympathetic to Obrador, noting that "Although it was unclear how Lopez Obrador would establish a parallel government, or whether the vote was merely a political threat, the rally was a strong rebuke of National Action Party candidate Felipe Calderon." In contrast to the AFP's poll numbers, the Times refrences Obrador's "party's growing political clout."

Election Could Bring Political Trouble For Merkel. The Kansas City Star (9/17, Graham, 278K) reports, "Elections in a northeastern German state this weekend could prove a breakthrough for a far-right party and bring more woe for Chancellor Angela Merkel. Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania, a depressed state of isolated hamlets and tree-lined lakes in former East Germany, elects a new legislature on Sunday, as does the capital Berlin. Polls indicate the Social Democrat governors of both areas should hold on to power in coalition with the former communist Left Party. But the extreme-right National Democratic Party is expected to make significant gains in Mecklenburg, clearing the 5-percent vote hurdle to enter the state's parliament for the first time."

Algeria Turns to Reconciliation Program To End Violence. The Washington Post (9/17, A17, Whitlock, 748K) reports, "[I]n an effort to bring a final end to violence that began in 1992, the Algerian government is pinning its hopes on an ambitious national reconciliation program, which grants official forgiveness to combatants if they set aside their weapons. Under terms of the reconciliation, which expired Aug. 31 but might be extended, about 2,500 prisoners convicted or accused of terrorism have gone free. Also covered by the amnesty are members of the Algerian security services, blamed for the disappearance of 8,000 civilians and accused of systematic torture. The only people not eligible: rapists and those responsible for mass murder or planting bombs in public places."

Kristof Highlights Maternal Mortality Rate In Africa. In a column in the New York Times (9/17, 1.21M), Nicholas Kristof writes that "it should be an international scandal that the number of women dying in pregnancy worldwide has been stuck at a half-million for a quarter-century. Indeed, here in Cameroon the maternal mortality rate has risen since 1998, and over all an African woman now has one chance in 20 of dying in pregnancy. In much of the world, the most dangerous thing a woman can do is to become pregnant." Kristof adds, "These women die because they are poor and female and rural -- the most overlooked and disposable people throughout the developing world. Politics also complicates Western efforts to help. The United Nations Population Fund has helped lead the effort to reduce maternal deaths -- yet the Bush administration has cut off all U.S. funding for the agency because of (false) accusations that it supports abortions in China."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Digs In Heels Over Detainee Bill (AP)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

President Bush is standing firm in his battle to get Congress to approve the White House plan for detaining, interrogating and prosecuting suspected terrorists. The Senate, though, isn't backing away from its plan either.

The president's standoff with lawmakers is over legislation authorizing military tribunals and harsh interrogations of terror suspects.

In his radio address Saturday, Bush said his proposal provides clear rules for U.S. personnel involved in detaining and questioning alleged terrorists held by the CIA.

"The information the Central Intelligence Agency has obtained by questioning men like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed (the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks) has helped disrupt terrorist plots, including planned strikes inside the United States and on a U.S. Marine base in East Africa, an American consulate in Pakistan and Britain's Heathrow Airport," Bush said.

"This CIA program has saved American lives, and the lives of people in other countries," he said.

The Senate Armed Services Committee defied Bush on Thursday and approved legislation the president has vowed to block.

The president's measure would go further than the Senate measure, allowing classified evidence to be withheld from defendants in terror trials and using coerced testimony. The legislation approved by the Senate panel also would change the law that interprets the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions — the treaty that sets the standard for treatment of war prisoners — so that harsh interrogations of detainees would not be questioned in court.

Republican Sens. John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina oppose the legislation drafted by the White House because they say barring a defendant from access to evidence — even if it's done under rare circumstances — would undermine the credibility of the court.

"Weakening the Geneva protections is not only unnecessary, but would set an example to other countries, with less respect for basic human rights, that they could issue their own legislative 'reinterpretations,'" McCain said in a statement released Friday. "This puts our military personnel and others directly at risk in this and future wars."

McCain said there is nothing in the Senate bill that would require the administration to close its CIA detainee program. He said it protects CIA interrogators from unfair exposure to criminal and civil liability and keeps intact international obligations that protect the rights of U.S. personnel.

"To do any less risks our reputation, our moral standing and the lives of those Americans who risk everything to defend our country," McCain said.

Graham, likewise, remained insistent on the Senate approach, saying his legislation accomplishes the necessary goals of protecting CIA personnel from legal liability "without destroying Geneva Convention protections."

"What is being billed as clarifying our treaty obligations will be seen as withdrawing from the treaty obligations," Graham said in a statement. "It will set precedent which could come back to haunt us."

Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, supports a House bill that takes the administration's position to move the process along, but he said he will attempt to amend the measure next week to look more like the McCain-Warner-Graham measure. He said the Senate bill would be less likely to be challenged by the Supreme Court as unlawful and violating the nation's treaty obligations.

"I don't want to give any terrorist a free pass or get-out-of-jail-free card," Skelton said.

Bush Urges Congress To Act On His National Security Measures (BLOOM)

By Catherine Dodge

Bloomberg, September 17, 2006

Sept. 16 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush, facing resistance from his own party over part of his national-security plan, urged Congress to pass two measures he called essential to winning the war on terrorism.

``By passing these critical bills, we will bring terrorists to justice, continue collecting vital intelligence from captured terrorists in a lawful way and monitor terrorist communications," Bush said in his weekly radio broadcast.

The president in a news conference yesterday said CIA intelligence-gathering that has thwarted terrorist attacks would stop unless Congress passes his proposed rules for the treatment of suspected terrorists.

Members of his own Republican Party are objecting to parts of Bush's proposal. The Senate Armed Services Committee this week approved a measure that would give more legal protection to suspected terrorists than the administration wants.

Republicans are focusing on security issues as they try to retain their majorities in the House and Senate in the November midterm elections. The intra-party squabble over the treatment of suspected terrorists has disrupted Republican plans to highlight their differences with Democrats over national security before the elections.

``There is debate about the specific proposals in this bill, and my administration will work with Congress to find common ground," Bush said.

The legislation is needed to restart war-crimes tribunals Bush set up at the U.S. Navy Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The Supreme Court invalidated those tribunals in June, ruling that they fail to incorporate the 1949 Geneva Conventions on the treatment of war prisoners.

The second measure, which would authorize Bush's domestic eavesdropping program to monitor calls between al-Qaeda operatives overseas and suspected confederates in the U.S. without court warrants, was passed by a separate Senate committee this week.

Frist Expects A Deal On Detainee Bill (AP)

By Jim Davenport, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Saturday he has to do more to get Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., in line with other Republicans and the White House on how terrorist suspects should be prosecuted.

Graham and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., helped Democrats push a bill through the Armed Services Committee that Frist said doesn't come close to what the White House wants or what is needed to let CIA officials interrogate suspected terrorists without fear of lawsuits.

Getting his GOP members in line "is a fundamental challenge from a leadership standpoint," said Frist, a potential candidate for president in 2008. He said he expects a compromise to emerge in the next two weeks, even though McCain and Graham haven't budged.

Frist spoke about Graham at a fundraiser Saturday for Lt. Gov. Andre Bauer's re-election bid. The event raised more than $30,000 and Frist's Volunteer PAC donated $3,500 to the campaign.

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) — Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney also talked Saturday about the need for legislation to help CIA officials question suspected terrorists.

"I'm foursquare behind the president on this," Romney said. "We need to provide to the interrogators the definitive rules that they need" so that they are "not be subject to lawsuits" that might come from their work.

"The people we are facing are individuals who have no interest in the Geneva Convention," Romney said. "They slit the throats of our servicemen. They target civilian populations for terror and destruction."

Romney, a potential GOP presidential candidate in 2008, was in Columbia to speak to the state Republican Party's leadership.

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Sen. Joe Lieberman on Saturday launched his second radio ad since losing Connecticut's Democratic primary last month, touting his record and ability to work with both Democrats and Republicans.

The 60-second ad, which is running statewide for a week, casts the three-term incumbent as a principled leader who has helped keep Americans safe from terrorism, stood up to big oil companies and worked to lower gas prices. His campaign is spending $70,000 on the spot.

"I'm sticking with Joe because he stands up for what he believes in," a supporter says in the ad.

"He works with both parties. He works for the people," says another.

Lieberman is running as an independent after losing the primary to Greenwich businessman Ned Lamont. The Senate race is seen as a referendum on President Bush's policies and the Iraq war.

Lieberman, the Democrats' nominee for vice president in 2000, has long been a maverick in his own party, but his support of the war helped fuel Lamont's victory. Lamont spent more than $4 million of his own money in attacking Lieberman's support of the war and his perceived closeness to Bush.

Lamont launched a new 30-second spot Saturday that evokes the storied rivalry between the New York Yankees and the Boston Red Sox, two teams that split Connecticut's baseball loyalties. In the ad, a Yankees fan and a Red Sox fan agree that "Lieberman's gotta go."

Lamont spokeswoman Liz Dupont-Diehl said Saturday that the amount being spent on the ad was not available.

How 3 G.O.P. Veterans Stalled Bush Detainee Bill (NYT)

By Carl Hulse, Kate Zernike And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 16 — Senators John McCain and Lindsey Graham cornered their partner, Senator John W. Warner, on the Senate floor late Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. Warner, the courtly Virginian who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, had been trying for weeks to quietly work out the three Republicans' differences with the Bush administration's proposal to bring terrorism suspects to trial. But Senators McCain, of Arizona, and Graham, of South Carolina, who are on the committee with Mr. Warner, convinced him that the time for negotiation was over.

The three senators, all military veterans, marched off to an impromptu news conference to lay out their deep objections to the Bush legislation. Mr. Warner then personally broke the news to Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, and the next day the Armed Services Committee voted to approve a firm legislative rebuke to the president's plan to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions.

It was a stinging defeat for the White House, not least because the views of Mr. Warner, a former Navy secretary, carry particular weight. With a long history of ties to the military, Mr. Warner, 79, has a reputation as an accurate gauge to views that senior officers are reluctant to express in public. Notably, in breaking ranks with the White House, Mr. Warner was joined by Colin L. Powell, the former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in a rare public breach with the administration he served as secretary of state.

As Mr. Warner left his Senate office on Friday afternoon, he carried a briefcase of material to prepare for a potential legislative showdown in the coming days. At stake, he said, was more than the fate of "these 20-odd individuals," a reference to the high-level terrorism suspects awaiting possible trial at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

"It's how America's going to be perceived in the world, how we're going to continue the war against terror," Mr. Warner said.

Then he showed off the motto on his necktie: "Democracy is not a spectator sport." Ronald Reagan had a similar tie, Mr. Warner said, and had given him a copy.

Democrats and Republicans alike had assumed that Mr. Warner, a smooth negotiator not given to public confrontation, would relent to the administration, especially considering the importance Republicans had placed on passing the legislation as midterm elections approached.

The thinking was that Mr. McCain, who was tortured as a Vietnam prisoner of war, would not budge, nor would Mr. Graham, a military lawyer and zealous guardian of military standards. That left Mr. Warner as the best potential target for the White House. But as he considered the consequences of the proposal, the chairman decided to stick to his guns, saying he believed the nation's reputation was at stake.

"He is a man of the Senate," said Mr. Graham, arguing that Mr. Warner's stance spoke volumes because it went against his nature to have so visible a conflict. "He is also a military man and has thought long and hard about this."

Mr. Bush seems equally determined to win provisions he says are needed to interrogate and prosecute terrorism suspects. He and his allies are ratcheting up pressure on Senate Republicans who support alternate rules adopted this week by the Armed Services Committee. Mr. Warner, like his two colleagues, has a network of high-ranking current and retired military officers who provide regular guidance and support. While he has been consulting them privately, some are expected to weigh in publicly in the days ahead. One aide said on Saturday that the number of Senate Republicans behind the three senators was widening beyond the 8 or 10 they had anticipated, with lawmakers — heavily influenced by Mr. Powell's stance — preparing to soon go public with their views.

In interviews, two senior Bush administration officials acknowledged that the White House had underestimated the depth of opposition Mr. Bush's proposal would provoke. They also said they had focused mostly on gaining Mr. Graham's support and mistakenly believed they had it, based on statements he made about the Geneva Conventions in Senate hearings. A Republican senator separately described the clash between the White House and Mr. Warner's group as "a train wreck."

The administration officials and the Republican senator were granted anonymity because they would not openly discuss negotiations between the White House and Congress.

Mr. Warner's convictions about how military trials should proceed appear to stem largely from his personal experience, beginning with his Navy service in World War II. Hanging with the photographs on his office wall is a worn, small placard that his mother displayed on the door of their Washington home from 1944 to 1946: "There's a Man from this family in the Navy."

"I'm a man that's been through a lot," Mr. Warner said, recounting his days as secretary of the Navy in the early 1970's when he was personally confronted with issues of military prisoners. "I mean, I've been through this before."

Mr. Graham has similarly drawn on his legal and military background in challenging the White House. "The Geneva Convention means more to me than the average person," he said. He said "some people" considered the conventions "a waste of time, but I know they have been helpful."

Mr. Graham acknowledged that the political battle was bruising, but said he could not tolerate a change in the American interpretation of the conventions if it meant short-term benefits at long-term costs.

"President Bush is very sincere in wanting the tools he needs to fight the war on terror," Mr. Graham said in an interview. "I don't want the tools they are given to become clubs to be used against our people."

In a letter sent Friday to Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, Mr. Graham also took issue with a provision of the administration's approach that would allow the use of secret evidence in trials of terrorism suspects.

"Where in American jurisprudence do you find support for the concept that a person accused can be tried and convicted on evidence which that person has no opportunity to see, confront or rebut?" Mr. Graham wrote. The bonds between Mr. Warner, Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham were forged in difficult times. Mr. Warner and Mr. McCain first met when Mr. Warner was the Navy secretary and Mr. McCain was returning to his Navy career after his captivity. Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham became close during the 2000 primaries in South Carolina, when Mr. McCain came under attack from Bush Republicans. They teamed up last year in forcing the White House to accept a ban on torture.

After the Supreme Court struck down the administration's earlier plan for military tribunals in June, they joined with top military lawyers to form the chief bulwark against what they said were efforts to undermine military law and the 60-year-old protections of the Geneva Conventions.

"It's not a question of defiance or intransigence, it's the way we've worked," Mr. Warner said. "We've continued to indicate a willingness to look at situations — is there a bridge that we can build between certain provisions? And our core principles are very rooted in the three of us."

Mr. Graham added, "There are three branches of government, not one."

Mr. Warner sought to serve as a counterbalance to the occasionally combative Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham during a turbulent week that fractured the Republican majority on its signature issue, national security. It saw Mr. Powell enlisting with the three Republicans against Mr. Bush, and left Mr. Graham chewing out General Michael V. Hayden, the C.I.A director, in a closed meeting.

In the Senate, Mr. Warner is known for hearing out colleagues and trying to find consensus.

"John Warner is always very gracious," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, who is also on the Armed Services Committee and sided with Senators Warner, McCain and Graham. "He is patient and he is thoughtful. And people sometimes mistake that for uncertainty about his position."

Administration officials said they had focused on Mr. Warner as the key to overcoming Republican opposition in the Senate. When he raised a question with General Hayden about the State Department's view on the matter, Mr. Warner received a phone call within hours from Ms. Rice.

Ms. Rice followed up with a letter to Mr. Warner, which administration officials distributed on Capitol Hill on Thursday to counter the letter from Mr. Powell, which had objected to the administration's plan to redefine Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

But once it became clear that Mr. Warner was dug in, the administration began setting its sights on other senators, inviting them to the White House. On Friday afternoon, Mr. Frist's office arranged a conference call between staff members for Senate Republicans and Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, to emphasize talking points for making the administration's case on Capitol Hill.

As the fight swirled around him last week, Mr. Warner got a call from his grandson, Nicholas, a boarding school student who was an intern in his office this summer, asking what all the fuss on television was about.

"I took the time to try to explain it to him," Mr. Warner said. "That's one of the jobs we have to do, explain to the American people." He added: "Neither McCain nor Graham nor I nor anybody wants to tie the hands of the intelligence community."

Tribunal Dispute Could Ruin GOP Strategy (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Bush-McCain Standoff Over Terrorism Trials Overshadows Electoral Battle

Congressional Republicans had carefully orchestrated the finale of the legislative year to be a showdown with Democrats over which party is best equipped to keep the country safe, a handpicked fight on traditional Republican turf.

But the high-stakes standoff between President Bush and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) over military tribunals could ruin that legislative strategy, political analysts and strategists say. Instead of fighting Democrats, Republicans find themselves in the middle of an intraparty struggle between an embattled president and two of the most respected figures in their party, McCain and his ally on the issue, former secretary of state Colin L. Powell.

"Purely from a strategic point of view, this is another mess," said Stuart Rothenberg, a political analyst and editor of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report. "Every time Republicans think they have an issue to unite them and divide the Democrats, the Republicans end up spending most of the time fighting among themselves."

Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio agreed: "If the goal of this process was to show stark differences between Republicans and Democrats, what is being portrayed is stark differences between George Bush and some Republicans. From that standpoint, you aren't hitting the message mark."

When Congress returned from its August recess, GOP leaders understood that they had four weeks to regain political momentum or face the real prospect of losing control of one or both chambers of Congress. Two court decisions seemed to give them an opening: the Supreme Court's ruling that Bush's military tribunals are unconstitutional and a Detroit federal judge's opinion that the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program is also illegal.

By codifying the president's military commissions and ratifying what they called his "terrorist surveillance program," Republican leaders had hoped to dare Democrats to vote against programs framed as insurance policies against terrorism.

It has not worked out that way. Three Republican senators -- McCain, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (Va.) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) -- have stood in the way of Bush's tribunal plan, saying it violates basic principles of American fairness and would endanger U.S. troops. A rebellion of civil-liberties-oriented Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee has stymied legislation that would allow warrantless wiretapping to continue. At a closed-door pep rally with Republicans on Thursday, Bush received pointed questions on both policy initiatives, according to participants.

"Congress needs to give this the intensity of consideration necessary," said Rep. Daniel E. Lungren (R-Calif.), a supporter of both programs. "We are not going to be led around by the nose."

DOJ_NMG_0064613

But Boehner and other Republicans remain confident that they are on the right track. Republicans point to recent polls showing a slight uptick in the president's popularity and say that the focus on national security issues is working. A spate of new polling also indicates that the race between Republicans and Democrats for control of Congress has tightened slightly, although Democrats still maintain a lead.

Indeed, Charlie Cook, a nonpartisan congressional analyst, said any day the media is not focused on Iraq is a good day for Republicans. For most voters, he said, the tribunal flap will be seen as politicians fighting with politicians -- "not exactly man bites dog," but a good diversion from troubling war news.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) noted that the unfavorable political landscape leaves GOP leaders little choice but to fight it out on defense and terrorism.

"People aren't paying attention to the economy. We've given up on immigration. We need to send people home with some significant accomplishments, and we have no other choice," LaHood said. "We have no other issue."

But misgivings over the agenda set out by the president and GOP leaders are growing. Rep. Steve Buyer (R-Ind.) said he told Bush on Thursday that he should heed the military's top uniformed lawyers, who have opposed some provisions of the president's tribunal plan. Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.), one of several moderate Northeasterners in tough reelection campaigns, said he has no problem with Bush's bills. He is likely to vote against them.

The problem, Lungren said, is that the complexity of the tribunal and wiretapping issues do not lend themselves to the quick action Bush wants.

"This is a big deal to drop in our laps," he added. "There is some discomfort with the time period we've been given."

Then there's McCain, a decorated Vietnam War veteran who spent years as a captive of the North Vietnamese.

"If Americans know anything about John McCain, it's the guy was tortured. People listen to him on this issue," said John J. Pitney Jr., a professor of politics at Claremont McKenna College who studies House Republicans.

Last week, House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) did his best to ignore McCain's position on the tribunals and to blame Democrats for the stalemate. But Democrats are using McCain and his allies as a shield.

"Instead of picking fights with Colin Powell, John McCain and other military experts, President Bush should change course," Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said Friday.

Fabrizio and other analysts said that argument is smart politics.

"It appears John McCain has given Democrats body armor against Republican attacks," Pitney said.

Moreover, the showdown between Bush and McCain is grabbing the spotlight from Republican initiatives that were supposed to undergird their case that they are the stronger party on national and homeland security. Just Thursday, the House passed legislation that would authorize the construction of 700 miles of double-layered fencing on the U.S.-Mexico border, while the Senate approved a long-promised port security bill. Both actions were buried by media coverage of the tribunal battle.

And the intraparty fights over tribunals and wiretapping are likely to dominate Congress until the lawmakers adjourn for their campaigns at month's end. That could swamp any uptick that Bush and the GOP enjoyed before the fights broke out.

"Even the best start with a bad finish doesn't help," Fabrizio said.

CIA In Middle Of Election-year Battle (AP)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

The CIA believed it was operating lawfully in detaining and interrogating 96 suspected terrorists at locations from Thailand to Europe, until the Supreme Court this summer demolished that legal foundation.

The CIA is now squarely in the middle of election-year politics as Congress tries to write new definitions that could reshape the intelligence agency's program.

"At the end of the day, the director — any director — of the CIA must be confident that what he has asked an agency officer to do under this program is lawful," CIA Director Michael Hayden wrote employees on Thursday.

President Bush was more blunt: "They don't want to be tried as war criminals," he said at a news conference Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0064614

The high court's ruling in June, in a case involving Salim Ahmed Hamdan, essentially said that the Geneva Conventions on the rights of wartime prisoners should apply to the suspected terrorists in CIA custody.

That meant that for the first time since the interrogation program was born in 2002, the Justice Department could not give the CIA a written opinion on whether its techniques still were legal.

Spy agencies rely on such opinions to justify activities that get little, if any, public scrutiny.

To Bush, the CIA and their allies, the law urgently needs to be changed to protect the interrogation program, which they consider one of the most important ways to deter attacks against the United States.

"The Hamdan decision in effect calls a time-out in the war on terror," said Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

But the program's detractors say a fix is needed to prevent further damage to the U.S. image abroad and to reduce risks to U.S. military personnel who may be caught by enemies.

"The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," retired Gen. Colin Powell, the former secretary of state, wrote Sen. John McCain. The Arizona Republican is resisting Bush's call for more lenient rules on interrogations.

The CIA's practices raised concerns almost from the day that the agency began questioning detainees suspected of terrorist links.

Early in the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan in 2001, senior military officers were so concerned about the CIA's practices that they took steps to ensure that military personnel were not in the room during CIA interrogations, said a government official familiar with both military and intelligence operations. The official and others in government and on Capitol Hill spoke recently about the sensitive CIA activities on the condition they not be identified.

But Gary Berntsen, the commander of a CIA team in Afghanistan in the fall of 2001, said CIA personnel initially did not have time for interrogations — a term from the military and intelligence world that implies the use of specific techniques to coerce information from prisoners.

Instead, he said, intelligence officers conducted cursory interviews of newly captured fighters to see if they had information they wanted to share.

"We were seizing one city after the next," Berntsen said. "There were hundreds of people" in custody.

He credits a British team in Afghanistan with finding a tipster in December 2001 who knew the details of a Singapore plot to use 21 tons of explosives to try to blow up the U.S., British, Israeli and Australian embassies in a follow-up attack to the Sept. 11 strikes. "We were desperate to find the next attack," Berntsen said.

Not long after the March 2002 capture of top al-Qaida operative Abu Zubaydah, the CIA's practices became more formal. Agency operatives knew Zubaydah had a wealth of information because of his role as a recruiter and his close ties to al-Qaida's senior leadership, but he was not cooperative.

The CIA decided it would need to hold high-value terrorists such as Zubaydah for an extended periods in an effort to extract information. They also began using some "enhanced interrogation techniques" with success.

One senior U.S. official said "only a fraction" of the agency's 96 high-value detainees have experienced those techniques because "the least obtrusive means are used."

Yet by mid-2004, the CIA's inspector general had completed a report on the treatment of detainees after the possible involvement of CIA personnel in the deaths of at least four prisoners. The review covered interrogation tactics.

Current and former U.S. officials say some techniques are well-known: exposing prisoners to cold, disorienting them or depriving them of sleep. The most controversial is waterboarding, when a detainee is strapped to a board and has water run over him to simulate drowning.

Bush administration officials say the Justice Department has deemed the CIA's practices lawful. In addition, the senior U.S. official said the House and Senate Intelligence committees have now been told everything about the CIA's overseas prisons and interrogation program, except the countries where the prisons were.

But a congressional aide disputed that. The aide said briefings for the Senate committee took place only recently and that the administration has denied the committee access to materials it needs to fulfill its oversight role of the CIA. For example, the committee's top Democrat, West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller, has not been able to see the Justice Department's legal opinions.

The Supreme Court's decision froze the interrogations and led the administration to turn over the last 14 prisoners in CIA custody to the military officials running a prison for detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The next step is up to Congress. Lawmakers are struggling over how to write legislation creating rules for how to try suspected terrorists and how to specify the lengths that authorities can go in questioning these detainees.

A bill favored by McCain and two other influential Republican senators would prevent CIA personnel involved in the detention program from being sued or prosecuted for their actions. The CIA wants the Congress to go one step further and bless its actions.

In his memo last week to CIA personnel, Hayden also said he wants Congress to define in U.S. law terms of the Geneva Conventions that bar "humiliating and degrading treatment" and "outrages upon personal dignity."

Human rights groups see the effort as an end run and contend established military rules could be applied to all government agencies, including the CIA.

Said Tom Malinowski, Washington director for Human Rights Watch: "The only point in having a CIA program is to use techniques that go well beyond what is permitted by the Army Field Manual."

The Battle For Guantánamo (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

1. A Warning From Shaker Aamer

Col. Mike Bumgarner took over as the warden of Guantánamo Bay in April 2005. He had been hoping to be sent to Iraq; among senior officers of the Army's military police corps, the job of commanding guards at the American detention camp in Cuba was considered not particularly challenging and somewhat risky to a career. He figured it would mean spending at least a year away from his family, managing the petty insurgencies of hundreds of angry, accused terrorists.

"Is this what I went to bed at night thinking about?" he would ask nearly a year later, as he whacked at mosquitoes on a muggy Cuban night. "No."

Bumgarner, then 45, received his marching orders from the overall commander of the military's joint task force at Guantánamo, Maj. Gen. Jay W. Hood. A few weeks earlier, General Hood dispatched the previous head of his guard operation and two other senior officers for fraternizing with female subordinates. He was known as a flinty, detail-oriented boss with low tolerance for bad judgment, and his instructions to the colonel were brief: He should keep the detainees and his guards safe, Bumgarner says Hood told him. He should prevent any escapes. He should also study the Third Geneva Convention, on the treatment of prisoners of war, and begin thinking about how to move Guantánamo more into line with its rules.

It had been three years since President Bush declared that the United States would not be bound by any part of the Geneva treaties in dealing with prisoners in the fight against terrorism. He ordered that American forces treat captives in ways "consistent" with the conventions but hadn't explained what that meant. Now, Bumgarner thought, the mandate seemed to be shifting a little. He was being asked to get more specific.

In the cramped bungalow headquarters of his Joint Detention Operations Group at Guantánamo, Bumgarner had his operations officer look up the conventions on the Internet and print out a copy. After nearly 24 years as a military police officer, Bumgarner knew the document well. He thought it obvious that many of the rights would never apply to Guantánamo detainees. No one was going to allow the distribution of "musical instruments" to suspected terrorists, as the 1940's-era conventions stipulated for the captured soldiers of another army. No one was going to pay the detainees a stipend to spend at a base canteen.

But the assignment was more complicated than just cutting and pasting where he could. On some level, Bumgarner thought, he was being asked to weigh how far the military should go to improve the lives of prisoners whom the president and his aides had labeled some of the most dangerous terrorists alive. Or, as the colonel put it to me during our first conversation at Guantánamo in March: "How do you deal with an individual whom the president of the United States and the secretary of defense have called the worst of the worst?"

At that point, in the spring of 2005, he had little time to consider an answer. Tensions in the camp were surging, as the detainees tested a fresh rotation of Army and Navy guards. Of the 530 prisoners then being held at Guantánamo, most were classified as "noncompliant." The two segregation blocks, which held prisoners who had assaulted guards, were full. So were two other blocks where detainees were sent for lesser infractions. "People were in a waiting pattern to get in and serve their time there," Bumgarner said.

In older parts of the camp, the detainees would sometimes bang for hours on the steel mesh of their cells, smashing out a beat that rattled up over the razor wire into the thick, tropical air. Occasionally they would swipe at the guards with metal foot pads ripped from their squat-style toilets, declassified military reports say. The detainees rarely tried to fashion the sort of shanks or knives made by violent prisoners in the United States. But they did manage to unnerve and incite the young guards, often by splattering them with mixtures of bodily excretions known on the blocks as "cocktails."

By the time Bumgarner took command at Guantánamo, information had emerged to suggest that many of the detainees were not, in fact, the hardened terrorists whom Pentagon officials had claimed to be holding there. Bumgarner did not doubt that his new prisoners were dangerous, but neither was he wary of getting to know them better. As he walked the blocks in Camp Delta, the fenced-in core of the prison, he soon began trying to engage some of the more influential detainees.

Military and C.I.A. analysts had been studying the Guantánamo population since the camp opened in January 2002. They observed that there were detainee spokesmen, who tended to speak English, and religious leaders, or "sheiks," who issued opinions on questions of Islamic law. There was also a more hidden cadre, whose leadership the analysts defined as "political" or, when they could direct the protests of others, "military." Nonetheless, there was much debate over who the most important leaders were, intelligence officials later told me. Like most guard officers before him, Bumgarner gravitated toward those who spoke English.

His ambitions were modest. "I was looking for a way, with what General Hood was wanting, just to have a peaceful camp," he recalled recently. He said his initial message to the detainees was "Look, I'm willing to give you things, to make life better for ya, if y'all will reciprocate." What he asked in return was "Just do not attack my guards."

Bumgarner considered himself a take-charge, solve-the-problem kind of commander. A big, balding, garrulous man who speaks with a faint Carolina drawl and carries his 250 pounds easily on a 6-foot-2-inch frame, he grew up the son of a career Army sergeant in a family where military service was proudly taken for granted. In high school in Kings Mountain, N.C., a small town in the Blue Ridge foothills, he played quarterback for the football team and applied to West Point at his father's urging. He quit the academy after only a few months but joined the R.O.T.C. to help pay his way through Western Carolina University. At Guantánamo, he was one of those officers who seemed to relish calling out, "Honor bound!" (shorthand for the camp motto, "Honor bound to defend freedom"), when a soldier saluted. Saying goodbye, he favored "Hoo-rah" over "See you later."

But that image could be deceiving. Before deploying to Cuba, Bumgarner oversaw the development of detention doctrine at the Army's Military Police School at Fort Leonard Wood, Mo. Like many military police officers, he had been deeply embarrassed when the Abu Ghraib scandal erupted in May 2004 and was determined to see its legacy undone. "We were not going to let that happen to us," he said.

At Guantánamo, Bumgarner moved quickly to try to reduce tensions in the camp. If the detainees wanted clocks on the cellblock walls, he saw no reason they shouldn't have them. In response to endless complaints from the detainees about their tap water, he persuaded Hood to approve the distribution of bottled water at mealtimes. The only stocks available were the soldiers' own, bottled with a stars-and-stripes label under the vanity brands Patriot's Choice and Freedom Springs. To avoid any problems, guards were ordered to peel off the labels before they passed out the bottles.

The detainees did not respond as the military authorities hoped. In late June 2005, two months after Bumgarner took command, some prisoners went on a hunger strike, calling for better living conditions, more respectful treatment of the Koran by guards and — most important — fair trials or freedom. Although it was hardly the first such protest, the camp's medical staff worried about the unusually large number of prisoners involved.

Soon after the strike began, Bumgarner was alerted to a disturbance in Camp Echo, an area of more isolated cells on the eastern edge of the detention center. The problem was with a 38-year-old Saudi named Shaker Aamer. The colonel had not previously encountered Aamer, but he was already familiar with the legend of detainee No. 239 — the one his guards called the

Professor. They marveled at his English, which was eloquent, and his presence, which was formidable. Some intelligence officials said they believed he had been an important Qaeda operative in London, where he lived and married before moving to Afghanistan in the summer of 2001. (Aamer has denied having anything to do with Al Qaeda or terrorism.)

The colonel's immediate concern was that Aamer was giving his guards fits, pressing one of the sporadic civil disobedience campaigns for which he was famous. "I finally said: 'That's it! I'm gonna go down to talk to him myself.'" As Bumgarner remembers it, he burst into the small, hospital-white room as Aamer sat on his bunk, fuming behind the painted mesh that caged him into one corner. "You're either gonna start complying with the rules," Bumgarner recalls warning him, "or life's gonna get really rough." The colonel said he did not mean to threaten physical force, only to emphasize strongly that Aamer's few privileges — like, say, his use of a toothbrush — hung in the balance.

Aamer, who wore a thick black beard and had his hair pulled back in a ponytail, was unimpressed. The prisoner, who was not wearing his glasses, squinted for a moment, trying to read the officer's insignia. "Colonel," he finally said, "don't come in here giving me that."

As Bumgarner settled into a white plastic chair, Aamer crossed his legs on the bunk and began to talk about his life. He spoke about his family, his travel to Afghanistan, his feelings about the United States. He told of working as an interpreter for American troops in Saudi Arabia during the first gulf war, and of later working at a coffee shop outside Atlanta.

"I got the impression that he was hanging around in clubs, drinking," Bumgarner told me. "He loved women. But he said he had realized the error of his ways." Aamer had a revelation, he told the colonel, "that this life of running around with women and boozing it up was the wrong path."

"It was part of his charisma, that drawing me in," Bumgarner said later. "He became a person."

Much of the conversation centered on Aamer's thoughts on the detention operation and what could be done to improve it. The Saudi's ideas, it seemed, were perhaps not so far from Hood's. "His implication was that if you applied the Geneva Conventions fully, everything would be just fine in the camps," Bumgarner recalled.

After almost five hours, Aamer asked the colonel if he had made someone very angry. "Otherwise, you wouldn't be in Guantánamo.

"Nobody survives Guantánamo," he added. "You won't survive, either."

II. A Permanent Place

As part of the military's standard tour of Guantánamo, visitors are driven to the end of a two-lane road that winds up to the northeast corner of the naval base on which the prison sits. They pause there on a small hill overlooking a locked gate that leads into Fidel Castro's part of the island. The tour guide, usually a young Marine corporal with a black Beretta pistol strapped to his thigh, then recounts a brief history of Communist efforts to drive the American forces away.

At one point, the corporal says, the Cubans tried to cut off the Americans' water supply. They trained floodlights on an American guardhouse to keep the soldiers inside from getting any sleep. But such annoyances were merely that. The United States never surrendered an inch of the 45 square miles it has occupied under a disputed lease since 1903, following the Spanish-American War. "We're not as big a presence as we once were," one tour guide, Cpl. Denis R. Espinoza, who is 22, said earlier this year. "But we're still here, and we're going to stay."

In the Land of Unsubtle Metaphors that is Guantánamo Bay, the message of the tour is transparent: the United States fought a dangerous, implacable enemy here once before, in another war that seemed without end. Had we not held our ground then, the argument goes, the world might now be a darker place.

Despite the intense criticism it has drawn, the detention camp at Guantánamo has proved one of the more resilient institutions of the Bush administration's fight against terror. It has weathered a 2004 Supreme Court decision that allows prisoners to challenge their detention in the federal courts. Scandals over the abuse of the detainees have come and gone, but Guantánamo has endured.

When President Bush announced broad changes in policies for the detention and prosecution of terror suspects on Sept. 6, he said the government "will move toward the day when we can eventually close the detention facility at Guantánamo Bay." But by sending 14 important C.I.A. captives there and pushing to try prisoners before reconstituted military tribunals, he appeared to be extending the life of the detention center for the foreseeable future. Even if many more detainees are sent home and dozens are tried, administration officials acknowledged, the United States could easily end up with 150 or 200 others whom it would want to hold indefinitely and without charge. As to how the military should treat such men, Washington offered only the most general guidance.

What impact the C.I.A.'s prisoners might have on the camp's operations is unclear. Already, though, Guantánamo has been the scene of an extraordinary struggle between the detainees and their guards. Only a few episodes of this conflict have come to light, like the suicides of three prisoners in June. But what has hardly been glimpsed is the dynamic that developed as military officers tried to deal more closely with the detainees, easing the harsh conditions in which they have been held and asking for compliance in return.

This article presents a view inside the prison based on interviews with more than 100 military and intelligence officials, guards, former detainees and others. It shows that as pressure built among the prisoners and some threatened even to kill themselves in protest, Bumgarner and other guard officers — acting as much on instinct as policy — took surprising steps to contain the upheaval.

That experiment illuminates the challenge the United States faces in continuing to detain indefinitely some 460 men at Guantánamo, only 10 of whom have been formally charged with crimes. Perhaps not surprisingly, the military has sought to keep what has taken place there under wraps. Asked recently about his dealings with the detainees and those of his staff officers, General Hood would respond only through an Army spokesman, saying, "Operational security precludes any public discussions that could potentially jeopardize the lives of detainees or the security force at Guantánamo."

Rather than making Guantánamo go away, the administration has tried to make it smaller and less objectionable. The ruins of Camp X-Ray, the provisional facility where the first prisoners were held in cages, are slowly being swallowed by the jungle. Tour guides display them as proof of Guantánamo's progress. Inside the existing camp, a barricaded precinct of the quaint, 50's-era naval base where off-duty soldiers play softball and stop to eat at McDonald's, the guides point out Camp 6, a new $30 million facility modeled after a county jail in southern Michigan.

But the detainees have long memories, and the portraits drawn by those who have been released — sometimes horrific, often impossible to verify — have shaped global perceptions in ways that the Bush administration has been unable to overcome. Their stories have been set down in books, films, plays and raps, most of which depict an Orwellian world that is by turns brutal, calculated and inept.

"Every country has its own way of torturing people," Rustam Akhmiarov, a 26-year-old Russian who was arrested in Pakistan and ended up in Guantánamo, told me after his release. "In Russia, they beat you up; they break you straightaway. But the Americans had their own way, which is to make you go mad over a period of time. Every day they thought of new ways to make you feel worse."

Over the last two years, human rights groups and the International Red Cross have noted some improvements. Hood said that the use of more extreme interrogation methods was curtailed within months of his taking command, around the time that the Abu Ghraib scandal became public. Yet the larger questions that indefinite detention at Guantánamo raises — how to forestall the radicalization of the detainees; how to control men who have only the slimmest hope of freedom — have never been resolved by senior policy makers. They have been left to military officers on the ground.

III. Out of the Dark Ages

As Colonel Bumgarner landed at Guantánamo in April 2005, he sensed that the military was in the midst of what he called "sort of an effort to normalize things." The Pentagon wanted to streamline the guard operation as part of a push toward a more modern, less labor-intensive detention facility. It also wanted to present a more humane face to the world. Both goals required lowering the level of conflict within the camp.

After his first briefing from Hood, Bumgarner put the printout of the Geneva Conventions on his desk and left it there. "I had my staff look at it," he said. "For me, it was the only black-and-white piece of something that I could reach out and grab for guidance."

At that point, White House officials were still opposed to adopting even the most basic Geneva standard for the treatment of prisoners, a provision that bans "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment." Bumgarner considered such issues above his pay grade. He tried to deal with the detainees man to man. "Human beings are human beings," he said in one of a series of conversations. "I always think that I can deal with anybody. I feel like dialogue can't hurt."

Weeks before he would meet the Saudi prisoner Shaker Aamer, Bumgarner came across a tall, wild-eyed detainee who was screaming at the guards in British-accented English. It wasn't clear what his problem was, but when the colonel asked, the man quickly calmed down. "You are creating these problems by the way you are treating us," the prisoner said.

A day or two later, Bumgarner had guards deliver the man to Juliet block, a small, fenced-in courtyard beside his command center where Red Cross representatives meet with detainees at aluminum picnic tables. He asked a guard to uncuff the prisoner's hands. "It puts them in a much better mood to talk to you," the colonel explained.

Prisoner No. 590, Ahmed Errachidi, was a handsome 39-year-old Moroccan who spent 17 years in London. He worked as a chef at a string of restaurants, including the Hard Rock Cafe, before traveling to Afghanistan after the United States began bombing the country in October 2001. The military authorities accused him of belonging to a radical Moroccan Islamist group and training at a Qaeda camp in Afghanistan, charges that his lawyers have disputed. Intelligence officials told me they did not consider him a high-value detainee and noted that he had been hospitalized for manic depression. But the guards, impressed by his influence and sense of self-importance, had nicknamed him the General.

Errachidi seemed rather surprised to be sitting down with the commander of the detention group, Bumgarner told me. But in that meeting on June 6 and a second, longer one two days later, Errachidi seized the chance to inventory the prisoners' grievances: The water was foul, he said, and the food terrible. The detainees were angry about the guards' habit of walking loudly through the cellblocks at prayer times and even angrier that "The Star-Spangled Banner" sometimes played over distant naval-base loudspeakers during or right after the evening call to prayer.

The General "kept talking about 'the dark ages,'" Bumgarner would later recall. The prisoner complained, for example, that the guards often referred to the detainees in demeaning ways, calling out when they were moving a prisoner that they had "a package" ready.

"We are not 'packages,'" Errachidi told the colonel. "We are human beings."

After the first meeting, Bumgarner received a piece of paper from a guard. It was a drawing by Errachidi, a sort of map. In one corner, it showed a shaded area labeled "the Dark Ages." From there, a path wound through a thicket of obstacles. They had labels like "No 'packages,'" "Better food" and "Turn the lights down." At the end of the path, Errachidi had drawn what looked like an oasis, with water and palm trees.

Back at Bumgarner's command center, some of his staff officers wondered about the wisdom of trying to solve such complaints. They were used to their commanders walking the blocks and occasionally speaking to prisoners; they were not accustomed to sit-downs. Nor did they see why they should be the ones to pick through the Geneva provisions and suggest whether the detainees might be entitled to elect their own representatives or attend educational programs.

"We're the guys on the ground," the detention group's former operations officer, Maj. Joseph M. Angelo, told me not long ago. "So why was I making recommendations on what portions of the Geneva Conventions we should implement? That just struck me as kind of weird."

Still, the unease of Bumgarner's staff did not compare with the reaction he got from the intelligence side of the Guantánamo task force. There had long been tension between the two military units, but this time members of the Joint Intelligence Group "were furious," one staff officer recalled. There were few privileges to give out at Guantánamo, this officer and others said, and interrogators felt they should be the ones to dispense them — in return for cooperation from the detainees.

Before he deployed to Cuba, Bumgarner's military police superiors had been emphatic that he should stick to his responsibilities and leave his counterparts in military intelligence to their interrogations and analysis. Bumgarner wasn't worried about stepping out of his lane. "I run the camps," he said.

Bumgarner set about trying to solve the problems he saw. He instructed members of the guard force to stop referring to the detainees as "packages." On compliant blocks, he had guards start turning down the lights between 10 p.m. and 4 a.m. and stop moving prisoners during those hours to allow the detainees to sleep. To avoid disturbing their prayers, he ordered guards to place yellow traffic cones spray-painted with a "P" in the cellblock halls at prayer times. He asked his aides to see that "The Star-Spangled Banner" recording would be played at least three minutes before the call to prayer.

Another of Bumgarner's senior staff officers, Maj. Timothy O'Reilly, a reservist who is a lawyer in civilian life, began to recognize some of what he was seeing from jails and prisons in the United States. "The ultimate nirvana for anybody in law enforcement or corrections is compliance," he said earlier this year. "In order to run an effective prison, you need to have people comply with your orders, and that's no different from the smallest jail to the biggest high-security prison."

But Guantánamo was clearly unlike other prisons in one important respect: The detainees found much less incentive to obey the rules. To some, exile to the discipline or segregation blocks was a source of status and pride, military intelligence officials said. And the punishments were limited. Striking or spraying urine on a guard brought 30 days' segregation, the maximum length of any punishment under Geneva rules. There was no such thing as getting a few more years tacked on to your sentence.

In an American prison, O'Reilly and others noted, an inmate could be a sworn enemy of the prison authorities, respected among other prisoners, and still try to "run a good program" — avoiding trouble in an effort to reduce his time behind bars. At Guantánamo, compliance with the rules brought only prayer beads, packets of hot sauce, a slightly thicker mattress. It would not bring early parole.

Former detainees I met insisted that their defiance was provoked not only by their despair over their uncertain futures but also by unnecessarily harsh and arbitrary treatment from the guards. "If people's basic human rights were respected, I don't think they would have had any of these problems," said Abdul Salam Zaeef, a former Taliban cabinet minister and ambassador to Pakistan who was the pre-eminent leader of Afghan prisoners at Guantánamo before his release in the late summer of 2005. "There were no rules and no law. Any guard could do whatever they wanted to do."

Like other small, insular groups that live at the mercy of a more powerful force, the detainees have woven intricate, conspiratorial theories about their fate. In a closed world where prayer gives structure to daily life and the Koran is the one possession guards are never supposed to take away, prisoners were acutely sensitive to any perceived disrespect for their faith. But there were many other grievances. Some former detainees told me that early on, they were injected at Guantánamo with psychotropic drugs, a claim that military officials denied. Later, detainees continued to suspect hidden agents of social control in everything from the cloudy tap water to the configuration of their cells.

"Those blocks are designed so that you will not rest," says Mohammed al-Daihani, a government accountant from Kuwait who was sent home last November. "There is metal everywhere. If anyone drops anything, you hear it. If anyone shouts or talks loudly, it disturbs everyone. If there is a problem at the other end of the block, you cannot possibly rest. After two or three weeks, you think you will lose your mind."

Although the detainees came from diverse backgrounds and more than three dozen countries, there was only one real prison gang at Guantánamo. The authorities were convinced it was controlled by Al Qaeda members. An August 2002 study by the C.I.A. asserted that Qaeda detainees at Guantánamo had quickly begun "establishing cellblock leaders and dividing responsibility among deputies for greeting new arrivals, assessing interrogations, monitoring the guard force and providing moral support to fellow detainees, among other tasks." (The study was posted in July on the Web site The Smoking Gun; two officials confirmed its authenticity to me.)

Such conclusions may have been drawn from the actions of detainees like Shaker Aamer, the man with whom Bumgarner spoke for hours at the end of June. Abdullah al-Noaimi, a Bahraini student who was released from Guantánamo last November, described in interviews at his home in Bahrain in June how Aamer initially organized their cellblock through sheer force of personality. "He's always laughing and talking, very extroverted," al-Noaimi said. "He was born to be a leader."

Soon after his own arrival in Cuba, al-Noaimi recalled, Aamer rallied the detainees on the block to refuse to be weighed by the medical staff — a largely meaningless protest, he said, but one that infuriated the guards and thrilled the detainees. Eventually, he added, Aamer organized the 48-cell block into four groups of 12, with representatives for each unit and a spokesman for the block. "It's the same thing John McCain did in Vietnam," said Lieut. Col. Kevin Burk, who commanded the army's first military police battalion at Guantánamo. "You continue your resistance."

Some parts of the camp were easier to manage than others. The guards looked on the roughly 110 Afghans then at Guantánamo as relatively cooperative. They filled much of Camp 4, the newer wing where Level 1, or "highly compliant," prisoners were allowed to live in communal barracks, serving their own food and moving freely in and out of small recreation yards. Most of the rest of the Afghans were in Camp 1, for Level 2, or "compliant," detainees. Only a handful were held in Camp 5, the maximum-security area. Yet as more prisoners were released, the remainder were becoming a more cohesive group, military officials and former detainees said. They were also overwhelmingly Arab, and more likely to have endured more extreme interrogation techniques like sleep deprivation, sexual humiliation and threats.

Several former detainees insisted that it was not Al Qaeda that bound them at Guantánamo but a common adversary. In standard prison fashion, they developed ingenious ways to organize and communicate. They attached messages to long threads from their clothing with wads of hardened toothpaste and then cast them into neighboring cells. They shouted into the plumbing to talk between floors in the maximum-security unit. And as their frustration grew, their ability to organize was brought to bear in new ways.

IV. Aamer the Hero

The hunger strike that confronted Colonel Bumgarner in mid-June 2005 escalated quickly. Of the many strikes since early 2002, few had gone far enough to prompt doctors to force-feed the detainees through stomach tubes. This time, however, there were not a handful of hunger-strikers but dozens.

As they often had before, military spokesmen dismissed the protest as a publicity bid typical of Al Qaeda-trained terrorists. Officers at Guantánamo had tabulated hundreds of incidents of what they termed "manipulative, self-injurious behavior." Privately, though, they began to discuss how to respond to a potential suicide. At the Pentagon, officials dusted off contingency plans for dealing with a body that would need prompt burial under Islamic law.

Senior members of the Guantánamo staff began to meet regularly with General Hood to monitor the strike. The chief medical officer, Navy Capt. John S. Edmondson, M.D., worried about the prospect of having to force-feed large numbers of detainees. The medical risk was relatively low, but there were other considerations. "Anytime you're doing a procedure that the patient doesn't want, it's not a place you want to be," he would tell me later. "What takes precedence? The patient's rights, or their life? It's not an easy question."

Bumgarner soon turned to Aamer, who had been on strike since around the time of their first meeting in Camp Echo. During that first encounter, he said, the prisoner had been "trying to convince me, in a very subtle way, that he could help control things in the camp." He decided to consider the proposal.

Over a couple of more conversations with Aamer, Bumgarner made his case: He wanted the detention camp to run more smoothly, to make things easier for detainees who obeyed the rules. He was prepared to move closer to the standards of the Geneva Conventions in some parts of the operation, including discipline. What did Aamer think it would take, the colonel wanted to know, for the hunger strike to end?

Aamer summarized his discussions with Bumgarner in a statement he dated Aug. 11, 2005, and later gave to his lawyer, Clive Stafford Smith. In it, he said the hunger-strikers demanded ending "the secret abuse project of Camp 5" (which he did not explain) and either bringing the detainees to trial or sending them home. Meanwhile, they wanted better medical and living conditions. Aamer wrote that the colonel promised him "that justice would come to Guantánamo at last." The prisoner, his lawyer said later, had "decided that this was a man who he could trust."

Bumgarner said he tried always to bring the talks back to what he could deliver: modest improvements in the detainees' living conditions. He said Aamer told him: "'If you can get me to go around the camps, I can turn this off.'"

There were no precedents for chaperoned consultations among detainees. But by July 26, 2005, the number of detainees refusing to eat was at 56, and doctors were becoming concerned about the health of several of them. Bumgarner decided to act. "I saw the chance to end it, and I just did it," he said.

The colonel went to see Aamer at a small hospital inside the detention camp. He was sitting on a bed, one ankle chained to the frame, surrounded by some of the other more determined hunger-strikers. According to Bumgarner, Aamer told him that several of the detainees had had a "vision," in which three of them had to die for the rest to be freed. Still, he agreed to try to persuade them to drop the protest.

Aamer agreed to suspend his own strike on July 26, his lawyer said, but was unsuccessful in persuading others. That evening or the next, Bumgarner said, he had guards retrieve Aamer from the hospital and meet him at Camp 5, the imposing maximum-security unit. Once inside the heavy doors, they went through the cellblocks one by one, as Aamer spoke with a handful of the most influential detainees.

Aamer went first to see Saber Lahmar, an Algerian-born Islamic scholar who was arrested in Bosnia in a supposed conspiracy to bomb the American Embassy in Sarajevo. (Lahmar denied any involvement in such a plot.) Trailed by the colonel and a military interpreter, Aamer continued through the tiers, crouching down to speak to a handful of others through the slots by which they received their food. His last stop was the cell of Ghassan al-Sharbi, a 30-year-old Saudi who studied electrical engineering in Prescott, Ariz. Al-Sharbi, who was later charged in the military tribunals with joining in an Al Qaeda conspiracy to manufacture bombs for attacks in Afghanistan, was reluctant to give up the strike. When he finally agreed, the others went along, two military officials said.

As they prepared to leave Camp 5, Bumgarner says, he asked Aamer if he needed to speak with some of the other hunger-strikers there as well. "No," Aamer answered matter-of-factly. "The others will put the word out."

The colonel and his prisoner drove to Camps 2 and 3. As they entered some of the blocks — Bumgarner in his camouflage fatigues, Aamer handcuffed to a chain around his waist — the cells erupted with applause.

"He was treated like a rock star, some of the places we would go in," Bumgarner recalls. "I have never seen grown men — with beards, hardened men — crying at the sight of another man." He paused, searching for an analogy. "It was like I was with Bon Jovi or something," he said.

Former detainees who witnessed the visits recounted to me that Aamer, speaking in Arabic, proposed to end the hunger strike and explained that other detainees in Camp 5 were in agreement. In return, he said, the military authorities promised to try to resolve problems the prisoners faced and to observe parts of the Geneva Conventions.

The colonel's subordinates had grown accustomed to his hands-on style of leadership. But they worried more openly about his meetings with Aamer. The Saudi, one officer pointedly said, "has an almost hypnotic power over some people." Two others referred to Aamer as "Svengali."

Bumgarner himself struggled with Aamer's frequent demands. One morning, as Aamer was being sent off with other officers to brief detainees, he had a new one for the colonel: Now he wanted to move around without the leg shackles that were standard for detainees being transported outside their cellblocks.

"Look, Shaker, don't make a big deal out of this," Bumgarner recalled telling him. "Let's get on to the bigger thing here. I can't take you out of those shackles."

"I'm not going unless you just handcuff me," the prisoner responded.

"Shaker, don't do this to me," the colonel said. "It's just going to make it harder."

"No," he quoted Aamer as saying. "I'm not doing any of this."

Bumgarner ordered the shackles removed. The handcuffs stayed on. Aamer finally went ahead with his briefings to the other prisoners. "It was clearly a risk — not in terms of putting anybody in danger, but in terms of perception," Bumgarner told me later. "But I thought that in the end, in order to keep things going, I was going to have to do it."

Mullah Zaeef, the former Taliban ambassador, had just finished his prayers in Camp 4 when a sergeant came to his dormitory. "There is someone who wants to see you," the sergeant said. Zaeef had never had an unannounced visitor at Guantánamo before.

He found Aamer waiting. The two men had known each other in Camp 1, where they were briefly neighbors. Zaeef, who spoke Arabic, noted that many of the Arabs respected the Saudi's leadership. Aamer told Zaeef about his conversations with the colonel.

"We thought maybe they were becoming softer in their policies," Zaeef recalls. "Or we thought maybe they were trying to trick us. But we thought that we should see which one it was."

When I met him in Afghanistan almost a year later, Zaeef still seemed a bit uncertain about what had taken place. He is an elegant, professorial man who wears wire-rimmed glasses and the black silk turban favored by the Taliban. He described the episode during two long interviews in the well-guarded government guest house on the dusty outskirts of Kabul, where he has lived since returning home last September.

According to Zaeef, Aamer described a scheme of representation for the detainees that he had worked out with Bumgarner — one that vaguely echoed the Third Geneva Convention's rules for a prisoner-of-war camp. Detainees in Camp 4 were to choose two inmates to represent them, one for the Afghans and another for the rest. With guards by his side, Zaeef said he then went from one block to the next, explaining the situation. After some discussion, he was chosen by acclamation to represent all of the Camp 4 detainees. Still, Zaeef recalled, "people were very skeptical."

Nonetheless, most of the hunger-strikers suspended their protests by July 28. Disciplinary problems on the blocks eased. The mood in the camps swelled palpably, some military officials told me. Later Bumgarner would refer to this interlude as "the Period of Peace."

The colonel then turned to some of the issues the detainees had raised during their strike. He and Aamer were sitting at one of the picnic tables near his office, debating the camp food, when Aamer insisted that the detainees' meals were being poisoned.

"That's asinine!" Bumgarner said.

"I don't see you eating the stuff," he said Aamer shot back.

Over a dinner of fish sticks and fries, they began working out a solution. Not long after, Aamer sat down with the head of the mess hall, the base nutritionist and a logistics officer on the military staff. According to one officer briefed on the meeting, Aamer unfolded a piece of paper on which he had drawn up an elaborate two-week meal plan with daily suggestions for four different diets: a standard menu, a vegetarian menu, a vegetarian-with-fish option and a bland diet for older prisoners and those with intestinal problems. Two officials said Aamer's proposal eventually became the basis for a new meal plan that raised the amount of food offered to detainees each day from 2,800 calories to 4,200 calories.

After weeks of discussion with his aides, Bumgarner also instituted a new program to simplify the discipline in the camp. Under the previous four-level system, misdeeds were punished with the loss of various "comfort items" like prayer beads and books, or stints in the discipline or segregation blocks. The system was so complicated, military officials said, that its application often seemed arbitrary.

The new plan called for all or nothing. Every detainee was restored to compliant status and issued all of the comfort items generally available, including prayer beads and bigger bars of soap. Those who broke the rules would be busted down to "basic issue," or B.I., with nothing in between. To symbolize the new order, all detainees in punishment-orange uniforms would be reoutfitted in tan.

The change might have made a dent in the prisoners' abiding sense of humiliation. The problem, some officers said, was that the plan was set in motion before enough tan clothing could be requisitioned to outfit all the detainees. Some of those left in orange complained loudly.

"We did not think that through like we were playing chess," Major Angelo said. "We thought like we were playing checkers. And that didn't work."

V. The End of Peace

A couple of days after Aamer visited Zaeef to explain the new plan for prisoner representation, a guard approached Zaeef with a cryptic message. "At 6 o'clock you are going to go somewhere," he said. At the appointed hour, Zaeef was led out of the camp and put on the rumble seat of one of the small John Deere utility vehicles used to transport detainees around the detention center and driven to Camp 1.

The guards led him to the small, fenced-in exercise yard for Alpha block, where two picnic tables had been placed. Ala Muhammad Salim, an influential Egyptian religious leader in the camp who was known as Sheik Ala, was already there. The two prisoners sat down and began quizzing each other about what was going on. Four others trickled in. They included Aamer and two of the men he met with in Camp 5: Saber Lahmar, the Algerian scholar, and Ghassan al-Sharbi, the Saudi engineer. The sixth was Adel Fattoh Algazzar, a former Egyptian Army officer with a master's degree in economics. Bumgarner did not attend the meeting, but when all of the detainees were seated, his deputy arrived with two other officers. Al-Sharbi acted as the Arabic interpreter.

According to other officers I spoke with, the deputy delivered a simple message: The six were being asked to provide their input on how to improve conditions in the camp. Each of the detainees responded in turn.

"Do not mistreat us anymore," Zaeef recalled saying. "Be respectful of our religion and our Koran. Respect us as human beings, because we are human beings. If we are criminals, take us to court. But if we are innocent, let us go."

News of the meeting buzzed through the camp. Right away, several former detainees said, the prisoners began to debate what was taking place. "We had never talked to the colonels before," Abdulaziz al-Shammari, a Kuwaiti teacher, said. "But this Bumgarner came around all the time, wanting to negotiate with us."

The younger detainees pressed Aamer to push past the matter of living conditions and focus on their demands for trial or release. "The shabab said to him, 'We must not go only for the small things; we should go to the core issues,'" al-Shammari said, using the Arabic word for "young people" or "youth."

Mohammed al-Daihani, the Kuwaiti accountant, now released, said that soon after the colonel and Aamer visited his cellblock, Ahmed Errachidi, the Moroccan known as the General, challenged others there to analyze the possible motives of their captors. "He said: 'Why is a colonel from the most powerful country in the world coming to negotiate with the detainees? They must be under some kind of pressure.'"

The skeptics on Bumgarner's side were also growing more vocal. "I was one of the few who thought we should let the leaders come talk to us," the colonel acknowledged. Hood was clearly uneasy with the negotiations, other officers said. He told aides not to refer to the six as "the council," as the detainees did. Still, several officers emphasized, the talks would never have gone forward if Hood had not approved them.

On the evening of Saturday, Aug. 6, shortly after the council's first meeting, the colonel convened the six again, officers said. This time, he sat with the group himself. Aamer had insisted that they should not be handcuffed or shackled. "These are leaders," he told the colonel.

Bumgarner agreed, and the handcuffs were removed. Guards armed with pepper spray stood by, while an immediate-reaction team waited just out of sight. The colonel later summarized his introduction thusly: "You're here. I'm here. You've got my attention. Tell me what the grievances are, and we'll work through them." He added, "This place ain't going away, so we might as well make the best of it."

As Zaeef recalled the encounter, Bumgarner made several promises: He would allow the circulation of religious books among the detainees and try to resolve problems that arose with the guards. He would assure that the prisoners' food was "adequate." Zaeef said the most important thing the colonel pledged was to send another official who would be able to speak with the detainees about their "future." Bumgarner said he promised only that guards would act "in the spirit of the Geneva Conventions" and that he would see that Guantánamo's discipline was consistent with its terms.

On the following Monday, the officers said, the six detainees were allowed to meet alone in the fenced-in yard. A pair of military interpreters were positioned nearby to monitor their conversation, officers said. According to both Zaeef and military officials, the detainees began using pens and paper they had been given to write notes. An officer observing the meeting interrupted them: they were not to pass notes, he said. When they insisted on confidentiality, he stepped forward again. But as the officer moved to confiscate the notes, some of the detainees popped them into their mouths and began chewing.

Hood pronounced the experiment over. "'This group is not meeting anymore,'" the colonel recounts him saying. "'And you are not going to be meeting with them anymore.'"

The "period of peace" came to an abrupt end. According to various sources — military officials, former detainees and Aamer's lawyer, Clive Stafford Smith — the detainees were also angered by a few incidents that had taken place over the weekend before the second council meeting. In one case, a prisoner had been forcibly extracted from his cell, only to sit waiting for hours to be interrogated. In another, the questioning of a slight Tunisian detainee by a much larger criminal investigator ended in a violent scuffle involving a cut nose, the possible hurling of a mini-refrigerator and the investigator's being ordered off the island.

A couple of days after the negotiations were shut down, officials said, a riot broke out in Camps 2 and 3. Dozens of detainees tore up their cells, wrenching foot pegs from their toilets and using them to try to pry loose the mesh that separated them. Guards were pulled from the tiers and deployed to surround the perimeter of the blocks. Water and electricity were shut off, and Bumgarner finally got on a bullhorn with an Arabic interpreter to persuade the detainees to be escorted from their ruined cells. The repairs took weeks.

The guard officers were unsure what the detainee leaders had been up to. According to military and intelligence officials, there were indications that Aamer and al-Sharbi had been at odds. Al-Sharbi, the accused Al Qaeda bomb maker, once told a military review panel it was his "honor" to be classified as an enemy combatant, declaring, "May God help me to fight the infidels!" Paradoxically, he was believed to be the more pragmatic negotiator, urging that the detainees try to improve conditions in the camp. But Aamer, who had denied any involvement in militant activities, took a different position. According to the officials, he argued more directly that the detainees should use the talks to pressure the military into either trying them fairly or setting them free.

Aamer told his lawyer the military had "sadly betrayed its word on every occasion a promise has been made." He blamed the colonel personally. At the time, Bumgarner said, he felt similarly betrayed. But when he recounted the story months later, he sounded merely disappointed. "We almost liked each other," he said of the two Saudis, Aamer and al-Sharbi. "I shouldn't say we liked each other, but when we spoke together, there was no animosity."

By mid-August, the hunger strike that military commanders thought they had resolved was picking up strength. Complaints about living conditions were de-emphasized, military officials and lawyers for the detainees told me. Instead, the prisoners focused on their future legal status. The renewed protest hit a peak just after Sept. 11 of last year, with 131 prisoners refusing meals for at least three straight days, officials said.

Many of the officers doubted that the protesters were willing to take their own lives. Islamic law strongly forbids suicide. Abdulaziz al-Shammari, the Kuwaiti teacher who was one of the most frequent hunger-strikers, said he never considered taking his own life. "We saw that they would not let us die," he said of the military doctors. "This was merely the most extreme side of the protests."

Al-Shammari, who has a university degree in Islamic law, was one of a half-dozen more learned detainees to whom others turned for religious rulings on countless problems of their captivity. He said he knew of no relevant exceptions to the prohibition against suicide.

Two officials familiar with intelligence reporting from Guantánamo said that sometime in the late summer of 2005, Saber Lahmar, the Algerian religious leader who served on the six-man council, told other detainees of a fatwa that said it was lawful to take your own life in order to protect state secrets or to defend the common good. Other detainees spoke about the prophetic dream that Shaker Aamer mentioned to Bumgarner, in which three prisoners had to die for the rest to be free, the officials said.

As doctors began to tube-feed the more recalcitrant hunger-strikers, the strike consumed the medical staff. Specialists were flown in from naval hospitals in Florida. Most of the detainees maintained their weight at above or near 80 percent of their so-called ideal body weight. But as the strike dragged on, several slipped below 75 or even 70 percent of that measure, doctors said.

For detainees who obeyed the rules, the military offered new perks. Exercise time was extended once more. On Hood's instructions, Gatorade and energy bars were given out during recreation periods. Wednesday became pizza night. Guard officers suggested soccer and volleyball tournaments to the compliant detainees in Camp 4. The detainees came back asking that a prize — two-liter bottles of Pepsi — be awarded to the winners. (The detainees disdained Coca-Cola, guards said.) Before the games could begin, however, the detainees changed their minds, the officers said. They had concluded that the contest was a scheme by the military to divide them.

While increasing the incentives for compliance, the colonel also tried to clamp down on disruptive behavior. The segregation and discipline blocks were overhauled. The rules became stricter, the guards tougher. When detainees in segregation tried to shout to one another through the walls, the guards were to turn on large, noisy fans to drown them out.

Worried about Shaker Aamer's influence, Bumgarner also took an unusual step. In September, he had Aamer moved to Camp Echo, where he would be even more isolated than he would be on the segregation blocks. But Bumgarner did not cut off contacts with the detainee leaders entirely. He approached Zaeef to assure him that he wanted to continue to improve things for compliant detainees. He also developed a rapport with Ghassan al-Sharbi.

Al-Sharbi was described by people who know him as an intelligent, almost ethereal man from a wealthy Saudi family. (In an appearance before a military tribunal, he sat placidly with his hands folded at the defense table and told the presiding officer in plain English: "I'm going to make it easy for you guys. I fought against the United States.") The colonel said he found al-Sharbi a useful interlocutor and met with him repeatedly. After August, he never spoke with Aamer again.

The guard officers saw some indications that the tougher approach was working. The number of detainees in the discipline and segregation blocks fell substantially. Only later did the officers begin to suspect that the more combative detainees were so focused on the hunger strike that they had little energy for other protests.

VI. The Suicides

To some of Colonel Bumgarner's officers, it seemed that the latest group of hunger-strikers were being allowed to get too comfortable. They had hospital beds, air-conditioning, attentive nurses and a choice of throat lozenges to ease the pain of their feeding tubes. The arrangement also allowed some of the hospitalized detainees to communicate relatively easily.

By late November, while many of the strikers were maintaining their weight, four or five of them were becoming dangerously malnourished, Dr. Edmondson said. By sucking on their feeding tubes, they had figured out how to siphon out the contents of their stomachs. Others simply vomited after they had been fed.

On Dec. 5, the guard force ordered five "restraint chairs" from a small manufacturer in Iowa. If obdurate detainees could be strapped down during and after their feedings, the guard officers hoped, it might ensure that they digested what they were fed.

Days later, a Navy forensic psychiatrist arrived at Guantánamo, followed by three experts from a Bureau of Prisons medical center in Missouri. Bumgarner said the visitors agreed with him that the strike was a "discipline issue": "If you don't eat, it's the same as an attempted suicide. It's a violation of camp rules." In addition to feeding prisoners in the chair, some of the more influential hunger-strikers were sent off to Camp Echo with the hope of weakening the others' resolve. The number of strikers, which was at 84 in early January, soon fell to a handful.

Lawyers for the detainees were appalled. The lawyers quoted their clients as saying detainees had been strapped into the chairs for several hours at a time, even as they defecated or urinated on themselves. The doctors told me later that they had run out of options. "I would have preferred to have waited," said Dr. Edmondson, the chief base physician, who other officials said opposed the restraint chairs. But he added, "I seriously believed that we were going to lose one of those guys if we didn't do something different."

In the spring of 2006, General Hood and Colonel Bumgarner were suggesting that the mood at Guantánamo had turned. A handful of hunger-strikers were still at it — a few young Saudis and Yemenites, and Ghassan al-Sharbi. But the officers saw them as zealots whose threat to the smooth operation of the camp could be controlled. Otherwise, disciplinary infractions and attacks on the guards were down, they said, and many of the detainees were responding positively to new incentives for good behavior.

In an interview in late March, Hood said he believed that many young Arab detainees — sheltered, passionate young men who had gone to Afghanistan to fight what they thought would be a noble jihad — were beginning to see the light. They hadn't been radicalized at Guantánamo, he insisted. Rather, as conditions at the camp had improved, their preconceptions about Americans had worn away. "They discover, 'You guys aren't so bad.'"

"I think the hard-core people have lost ground over the last four years," Hood said. "They are clearly losing ground."

As he prepared to turn over his command in April to Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., Hood was upbeat about the future. "We are going to establish the most world-class detention facilities, and we are going to show the world that we're doing this right," he said. "Every provision of the Geneva Conventions related to the safe custody of the detainees is being adhered to. Today at Guantánamo — and, in fact, for a long time — the American people would be proud of the discipline that is demonstrated here."

Six weeks later, as guards in Camp 1 patrolled one of the blocks, they came upon a detainee comatose in his cell and frothing at the mouth — symptoms of an apparent overdose. "Snowball" — the guards' radio code for a suicide attempt — was called out over and over. In all, five detainees were found to have ingested medication that they and others had hoarded, and guard officers concluded that at least three were making serious suicide attempts. (Military spokesmen said that only two had really tried to kill themselves.)

Later that afternoon, May 18, a riot broke out among the "highly compliant" detainees in Camp 4 as guards moved to search their dormitories — and their Korans — for pills and other contraband, officials said. Detainees in one block of the camp set on guards who stormed their barracks after another guard saw a staged hanging and mistakenly called out "blizzard," the code for multiple suicide attempts. The guards' quick-reaction force fired rounds of rubber bullets and voluminous blasts of pepper spray to contain the disturbance.

Doctors later determined that the detainees had ingested sleeping pills, antianxiety medication and antipsychotics — whatever they could get their hands on. Since none of the men had been prescribed the medicines they took, it was evident that other detainees had colluded in the plan. (A cache of about 20 more pills was later found in one prisoner's prosthetic leg.) Still, the military authorities seemed uncertain how to respond.

Some officials recalled the detainees' premonition about three of them having to die. The medical staff tried to more closely monitor detainees with mental-health problems. But that screening apparently did not factor in the possibility that the men might have been determined to kill themselves for other reasons — like loyalty to a cause.

Sometime before midnight on June 9, three young Arab men, who were being held near one another in a single block of Camp 1, moved quietly to the backs of their small cells and began to string up nooses that had been elaborately made from torn linens and clothing. The bright lights had been turned down for the night. Still, the prisoners had to work quickly: guards were supposed to walk the block every three minutes.

After anchoring the nooses in the steel mesh walls of their cells, the three — Mani al-Utaybi, and Yasser Talal al-Zahrani, both Saudis, and Ali Abdullah Ahmed, of Yemen — piled clothing under their bedsheets to make it appear that they were asleep. They stuffed wads of fabric into their mouths, either to muffle their cries or perhaps to help themselves suffocate. At least one of the men also bound his legs, military officials said, apparently so he would not be able to kick as he died.

With the nooses pulled over their heads, the prisoners slipped behind blankets they had hung over the back corners of their cells and stepped onto their small, stainless-steel sinks. The drop was short — only about 18 inches — but adequate. By the time they were discovered, doctors surmised, the men had been asphyxiated for at least 20 minutes and probably longer. Military and intelligence officials said it appeared that the other 20-odd prisoners on the block knew that the suicides were being prepared. Some may have prayed with the men, the officials said, and a few may have assisted in carrying out the plan. What is certain is that in contrast to most previous suicide attempts at the camp, none of the detainees made any effort to alert the guards.

When doctors reviewed their files on the three men, they found that none of them had shown signs of depression or other psychological problems. All three had been on hunger strikes — one of them since the previous August — and at least two of them had been evaluated when they abandoned their protests. One doctor recalled one of the men telling him brightly: "I'm sleeping well. I feel well. No problems."

What the men hoped to communicate by their deaths may have been contained in brief notes they left behind in Arabic. The notes have not been made public, and a Navy investigation into the suicides continues. But military leaders at Guantánamo were not waiting on its outcome. They concluded immediately that the suicides were a blitzkrieg in the detainees' long campaign of protest. At a news conference hours after the suicides, the new Guantánamo commander, Admiral Harry Harris, described them as an act of "asymmetric warfare."

VII. Tightening Up

I sat down with Colonel Bumgarner one blazing afternoon in late June, as he was preparing to give up command. He looked tired and stressed, and slumped into a chair in his small, cluttered office. As Shaker Aamer did the previous summer, Bumgarner used words like "trust" and "betrayal." Bumgarner, at the time we spoke, was briefly suspended from duty while the military investigated whether he improperly disclosed classified information to a North Carolina newspaper reporter who, around the time the suicides occurred, had been in Bumgarner's headquarters reporting a feature article on the colonel from Kings Mountain. (He was absolved of any wrongdoing.) But he seemed more worried by something else: Had he completely misunderstood the prisoners he was trying to reach?

"We tried to improve their lives to the extent that we can — to the point that we may have gone overboard, not recognizing the real nature of who we're dealing with," he said. "I thought they had proven themselves. I'm ashamed to admit it, but I did not think that they would kill themselves."

Bumgarner said he could not discuss the suicides because of the Navy's continuing investigation. But several officials said that the three detainees had taken advantage of some of the colonel's quality-of-life reforms, including the nighttime dimming of lights and the availability of extra clothing. There were also indications that Ghassan al-Sharbi, the colonel's onetime interlocutor, had helped plan the suicides, two of the officials said.

Looking back, Col. Kevin Burk, the commander of the military police battalion, said: "With any population like this, you're going to have a battle. It wasn't like we were all going to 'Kumbaya' together. But we were trying to find that middle ground, where the tension in the camp would even out. As far as we could see, no one had really tried to find that equilibrium before."

It is unclear if or when the military might try again. By most appearances, Guantánamo has been tightening up. Since the May riot and the suicides, the military has increased security to prevent further disturbances or deaths. In its ruling on the military tribunals in June, the Supreme Court left the government no choice but to abide by the minimum standards of treatment contained in the Geneva Conventions. But what other privileges and freedoms the detainees are allowed may come even more into question as the Guantánamo population is winnowed down to a harder core and joined by the most notorious terror suspects captured by the C.I.A.

One hint of Guantánamo's future may lie in the retrofitting of Camp 6, the brand-new medium-security facility that was to have opened this summer. Until this spring, the new camp was to embody the sort of conditions Colonel Bumgarner and other officials had hoped to institutionalize, with spaces for communal meals and larger recreation areas where compliant detainees could play soccer and other sports. After the riot and the suicides, the camp was substantially remade. When it eventually opens, military officials said, it will look somewhat more like Camp 5, the maximum-security unit down the road.

Don't Jettison Geneva Conventions, Ex-POWs Say (FLSUNSEN)

By Howard Goodman

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 17, 2006

Morton Brooks was only 19 when captured by German soldiers in World War II.

The Germans herded him up with 80 other American soldiers who were Jewish, like Brooks -- and another 270 who looked Jewish or were otherwise "undesirable," the Germans thought.

They were shipped by cattle car to a satellite of the notorious Buchenwald death camp called Berga. They were put to work as slave laborers: mining tunnels for a planned underground factory.

"When we brought up the Geneva Conventions," says Brooks, "they laughed in our faces."

It was a chapter of the war that lay buried for years, a story of soldiers who were treated more like Holocaust victims than captured combatants.

They were denied their rights as prisoners of war. Starved. Brutalized.

Down to 140 men, weakened from lack of food, they were sent on a death march as the Allies closed in on Germany, Brooks said. Their ordeal ended only with liberation.

Brooks had been imprisoned four months, and he weighed no more than 75 pounds. But he was alive.

"Forty percent of our group died," Brooks says.

A retired psychologist, he now lives in Boynton Beach.

Larry Treff, also of Boynton Beach, was only 20 years old when he was put in charge of 42 men during the Allied push into Germany.

Treff was leading his platoon up a hill when machine-gunned, hit twice in the leg and captured by Germans. Behind their lines, he was nearly killed in a U.S. artillery bombardment that was "the most horrible 10 minutes of my life."

Mel Pollack, of Delray Beach, spent almost six years in captivity after his fighter jet was shot down in 1967.

He was held at the notorious "Hanoi Hilton" prison, where the beds were concrete and the captors were vicious.

He was a cellmate of the future senator, John McCain, a man he admires immensely.

"He fought the North Vietnamese with his crutches," Pollack said.

On Friday, the three bowed their heads in memory of men who didn't make it. They saluted as they said the Pledge of Allegiance and never hesitated to say "under God." They shook hands with their thinning ranks of fellows.

It was National POW/MIA Recognition Day, and about 35 people gathered in the chapel of the VA Medical Center in West Palm Beach.

DOJ_NMG_0064629

Fifteen had been prisoners of war in the Second World War. Two were held during the Vietnam War. Along with the white hair and polo shirts, there were erect postures in that room.

And a lot of courage.

"Through their strength and perseverance," Pamela McFrederick, a VA social-services supervisor, said in apt remarks of tribute, "They give the rest of us hope."

We live in a complicated time, when the Bush White House is pressing for permission to loosen time-honored rules regarding our treatment of war captives.

There's some logic to this. As Bill Acuri, a Vietnam POW, noted, the Geneva Conventions make sense in terms of opposing armies. "And the terrorists don't have an army."

But Treff, who felt lucky to spend only 17 days as a captive in an impoverished German hospital before the war ended, says the United States must treat prisoners of war "with dignity and not abuse them."

Prisoners "must be interrogated toughly," Treff said, but never tortured. Brooks, who suffered so greatly at Nazi hands, concurred.

"The experts say that when you torture, you don't get adequate information anyway," he said.

And Pollack, who knows first-hand the brutal realities of war, says the United States must resist the calls to jettison the Geneva Convention on the humane treatment of war prisoners.

"If we abandon it," Pollack says, "then everybody is going to do it against us."

Call me crazy, but I trust ex-POWs on this more than a president and vice president who never were imprisoned and never went to war.

Who, Exactly, Is A POW? Museum Exhibit Asks Visitors To Think On It (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 17, 2006

Andersonville — His captors branded him a war criminal, but for the more than seven years Bill Robinson spent in North Vietnamese prison camps, he knew exactly what he was: a prisoner of war.

"When you wear the uniform of your country and are held by a foreign government, you are in a POW status," said Robinson, a retired Air Force captain from Madisonville, Tenn., who frequently comes to the National POW Museum here to talk to visitors about his experiences.

The question of who was a POW, and who was not, once seemed to have a relatively easy answer.

But the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have made that answer less clear. The only two service members unaccounted for since the Persian Gulf War, Navy Capt. Scott Speicher and Army Staff Sgt. Matt Maupin, are referred to by their own government as "missing/captured," not as POWs.

On Friday, National POW/MIA Recognition Day, officials at the infamous Civil War prison camp here opened a new exhibit posing the question: "Who is a POW?"

Fred Boyles, superintendent of the Andersonville National Historic Site, said the exhibit is an expansion of a portion of the POW Museum.

"What this exhibit seeks to do is to ask our 150,000 annual visitors to ponder this question, which is often difficult to answer," Boyles said.

The confusion over who is a POW and who is not dates back to the Revolutionary War, Boyles said, when Americans captured while fighting the British were considered war criminals and not legitimate prisoners.

It remains an issue of debate as the U.S. government struggles with its definition of those captured in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the Americans still unaccounted for there.

The fact that the U.S. government has virtually abandoned the designation POW has raised the ire of some former POWs and activists who are keeping alive the issue of missing Americans from all wars.

"It diminishes the focus on the issue of prisoners of war and missing in action. It makes it sound like those people are not missing or unaccounted for," said JoAnne Shirley of Dalton, chairman of the board of the National League of POW/MIA Families.

Shirley, whose brother, Air Force Maj. Bobby Jones, is unaccounted for in Vietnam, said more than 1,800 service members are still missing in Southeast Asia, some of whom were known to be alive when captured.

Larry Greer, spokesman for the Pentagon's POW/MIA office, said the terminology "prisoner of war" was one used by the Geneva Conventions and other nations, not the Pentagon.

"The distinction is that missing/captured is a Department of Defense term," Greer said. "To the layman, it means the same."

Not so, said Lynn O'Shea, director of research for the National Alliance of Families, a POW/MIA activist group.

"When you don't give [a prisoner] the designation that the international community under the Geneva Conventions gives, we're just diminishing the value of our captured personnel if we can't say the words 'prisoner of war,' " she said.

O'Shea said there are literally tens of thousands of pages of Pentagon documents from the Vietnam War that frequently refer to America's POWs. And, as recently as the 2003 invasion of Iraq, the Pentagon referred to captured Americans, including Pfc. Jessica Lynch, as POWs.

"We've been trying to get the Defense Department to acknowledge the reality that when the enemy parades a battered serviceman or woman on TV, it is an insult to call him or her missing/captured and not a prisoner of war," O'Shea said.

Speicher, a Navy pilot, was shot down the first day of the Gulf War in 1991. Originally listed as Killed in Action/Body Not Recovered, his status was changed late last year to missing/captured when accumulated evidence indicated he may have survived the shootdown and been taken prisoner by Iraqi forces.

"There were intelligence reports that seemed to give enough credence to doubts for the secretary of navy that he was killed in action," Greer said of the reason for the change.

"We still have people on the ground investigating where he might be," he added.

Maupin, an Army Reservist, was captured by insurgents in April 2004 when his convoy was ambushed near Baghdad.

A few weeks later the Arabic television network Al-Jazeera showed a video of Maupin in captivity. Later, another video was aired in which a group calling itself "The Sharp Sword Against the Enemies of God and His Prophet" claimed to have executed Maupin.

Greer said there are also teams in Iraq still looking for Maupin, but declined to provide any information about their progress.

"In the case of Matt Maupin, it's a different environment. It's not a nation-state holding him, so we use the term missing/captured," Greer said.

While Article 4 of the Geneva Conventions has an extensive list of those who should be considered a POW, there is no mention of the status missing/captured.

"This missing in action/captured is very impersonal," O'Shea said. "You don't have to explain prisoner of war to anybody. But if you say missing in action/captured, what does that mean?"

Retired Army Col. Ben Purcell of Clarkesville, who spent more than five years in North Vietnamese prison camps, said he never considered himself anything other than a POW, despite the best efforts of his interrogators to convince him otherwise.

Eventually, Purcell said, "I became a prisoner at war. I argued with my interrogators, I went on hunger strikes and I tried to escape."

But, he said, he found strength in knowing he was a POW and should have been treated according to the articles of the Geneva Conventions.

Boyles said the new $80,000 exhibit might explode a few myths and start a few arguments over the definition of POWs.

For example, of the 52 Americans held hostage at the U.S. embassy in Tehran in 1979, only 13, the uniformed Marine security guards, were considered POWs.

And Francis Gary Powers, the U-2 pilot shot down and imprisoned in the Soviet Union in 1960, initially was not considered a POW because he was working for the CIA. Later, when it was discovered he also had an Air Force mission, his designation was changed.

The issue of who is a POW, Boyles said, "is something I've been scratching my head over for a long time."

Bush Fails To Recapture The Nation's Post-9/11 Unity (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

It's a truism that the world of Sept. 10, 2001, is gone, vaporized in the attacks of the next day.

But the world of Sept. 12 is gone too.

In the aftermath of Sept. 11, Americans came together in shock and sorrow and resolve. Members of Congress, from both parties, symbolized that powerful connection when they stood on the Capitol steps and sang "God Bless America" hours after the attacks.

Last week, on the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11, they tried that again. Not that many legislators showed up. The ones who did couldn't decide whether they wanted to hold hands. The whole thing fizzled out.

The symbolism couldn't be much plainer. The national unity that emerged from the rubble of New York's twin towers is gone too. Even President Bush's nationally televised speech commemorating the attacks, a surprisingly pointed defense of his decision to invade Iraq, drew angry criticism from Democrats who said he politicized the anniversary.

Across the range of national security issues, the two parties now agree on virtually nothing. The war in Iraq is dividing Congress and the country more than any military commitment since Vietnam. Full-scale confrontations between the White House and most Democrats joined by some Republicans are gathering over the rules for the warrantless National Security Agency wiretapping Bush authorized in 2001 and the procedures for bringing to trial detainees in the war on terrorism.

These conflicts hardly seem remarkable in an era when the two parties wage political war about almost everything. And yet from other angles, the degree of division over national security five years after Sept. 11 is extraordinary.

The struggle against Islamic radicalism is not like the Vietnam War, when a meaningful share of Americans questioned our stake in the outcome. Virtually all Americans recognize the nihilism symbolized by Osama bin Laden as a threat to our values and interests. In that specific sense, the fight against Islamic extremism is much more like World War II, when almost all Americans condemned the goals, methods and beliefs of our fascist enemies.

Given that starting point, it was not inevitable that America would divide so sharply over the strategy for combating that enemy. Looking back, there's plenty of blame to go around. Bush's decision to invade Iraq amid ambivalence at home and widespread resistance abroad was obviously a critical fork in the road.

Looking forward, there's no question that Bush has the greatest opportunity to bridge today's divisions. The president sets the tone for America's debates, especially on foreign policy. Except for the period immediately after Sept. 11, Bush simply hasn't placed a high priority on establishing consensus for his national security strategy.

It's easy to understand why he felt a sense of urgency and mission about constructing a comprehensive response to the threats that crystallized on that late-summer's day five years ago. But by pursuing a course that concedes so little to contrasting views, Bush has dissipated one of any democracy's greatest assets: a united sense of purpose. He has also virtually ensured that America will reopen almost all of his decisions as soon as he leaves office. A narrow consensus is rarely a lasting one.

In his various remarks last week remembering the Sept. 11 attacks, Bush — as he has before — invoked Presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman. But Bush still shows no indication of having learned from their approach to building domestic support for foreign policy.

As America moved into World War II, Roosevelt named Republican Henry Stimson, President Hoover's secretary of State, as his secretary of war. He also tapped Frank Knox, the Republican vice presidential nominee in 1936, as his secretary of the Navy. And FDR sent Wendell Willkie, his GOP opponent in 1940, on a global goodwill mission.

After the war, Truman built bipartisan support in Congress by consulting exhaustively, and compromising regularly, with Republican Sen. Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan over every aspect of America's emerging strategy for the Cold War. They built a consensus broad enough to endure: Truman's strategy of containment guided American policy for more than 40 years.

Neither Roosevelt nor Truman was a saint. Both sought to squeeze political advantage from their role as commander in chief. But they set boundaries on the mingling of war and politics. When Edward J. Flynn, the Democratic National Committee chairman, suggested in 1942 that a Republican takeover of the House might hurt the war effort, Roosevelt publicly rebuked him .

Bush has set a very different tone. He has provided Democrats and even skeptical Republicans little voice in shaping his national security strategy. Bush has also shown himself to be willing, even eager, to frame national security debates in ways that maximize their political impact. In 2002, Congress spent the last weeks before the midterm election arguing over guidelines for the Department of Homeland Security and authorization for the use of force in Iraq. Now the White House is pressing Congress to act on the NSA surveillance and the detainee trials just weeks before another critical election.

Let's be clear. Debate is good. Argument is healthy. In a democracy, dissent is not only a right, but an obligation, especially during wartime. It's pointless to deny the presence of genuine disagreements. But after all the arguments have been raised, all the dissent and disagreements aired, and all the debates conducted, political leaders' responsibility is to build a consensus most of their citizens can accept.

Both parties have failed that test too often since Sept. 11. But the president has the greatest opportunity to create that consensus and so he bears the greatest responsibility for its absence. The hole in the skyline of Lower Manhattan, and in the hearts of many Americans, is now matched by the tear in the sense of common purpose that inspired so much of the country five years ago.

How The Presidency Regained Its Balance (NYT)

By John Yoo

Berkeley, Calif.

FIVE years after 9/11, President Bush has taken his counterterrorism case to the American people. That's because he has had to. This summer, a plurality of the Supreme Court found, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, that Congress must explicitly approve military commissions to try suspected terrorists. So Mr. Bush has proposed legislation seeking to place the tribunals, and other aggressive antiterrorism measures, on a sounder footing.

But the president has broader goals than even fighting terrorism — he has long intended to make reinvigorating the presidency a priority. Vice President Dick Cheney has rightly deplored the "erosion of the powers and the ability of the president of the United States to do his job" and noted that "we are weaker today as an institution because of the unwise compromises that have been made over the last 30 to 35 years."

Thus the administration has gone to war to pre-empt foreign threats. It has data-mined communications in the United States to root out terrorism. It has detained terrorists without formal charges, interrogating some harshly. And it has formed military tribunals modeled on those of past wars, as when we tried and executed a group of Nazi saboteurs found in the United States.

To his critics, Mr. Bush is a "King George" bent on an "imperial presidency." But the inescapable fact is that war shifts power to the branch most responsible for its waging: the executive. Harry Truman sent troops to fight in Korea without Congressional authority. George H. W. Bush did not have the consent of Congress when he invaded Panama to apprehend Manuel Noriega. Nor did Bill Clinton when he initiated NATO's air war over Kosovo.

The Bush administration's decisions to terminate the 1972 antiballistic missile treaty and to withdraw from the International Criminal Court and the Kyoto accords on global warming rested on constitutional precedents going all the way back to Abraham Lincoln.

The administration has also been energetic on the domestic front. It has re-classified national security information made public in earlier administrations and declined, citing executive privilege, to disclose information to Congress or the courts about its energy policy task force. The White House has declared that the Constitution allows the president to sidestep laws that invade his executive authority. That is why Mr. Bush has issued hundreds of signing statements — more than any previous president — reserving his right not to enforce unconstitutional laws.

A reinvigorated presidency enrages President Bush's critics, who seem to believe that the Constitution created a system of judicial or congressional supremacy. Perhaps this is to be expected of the generation of legislators that views the presidency through the lens of Vietnam and Watergate. But the founders intended that wrongheaded or obsolete legislation and judicial decisions would be checked by presidential action, just as executive overreaching is to be checked by the courts and Congress.

The changes of the 1970's occurred largely because we had no serious national security threats to United States soil, but plenty of paranoia in the wake of Richard Nixon's use of national security agencies to spy on political opponents. Congress enacted the War Powers Resolution, which purports to cut off presidential uses of force abroad after 60 days. It passed the Budget and Impoundment Act to eliminate the modest presidential power to rein in wasteful spending. The Foreign Intelligence and Surveillance Act required the government to get a warrant from a special court to conduct wiretapping for national security reasons.

These statutes have produced little but dysfunction, from flouting of the war powers law, to ever-higher pork barrel spending, to the wall between intelligence and law enforcement that contributed to our failure to stop the 9/11 attacks.

The 1970's shifted power from the president to Congress, and the latter proved a far more accommodating boss to federal agencies looking for budget dollars — a fragmented legislature is obviously much easier to game than a chief executive. But 535 members of Congress cannot manage day-to-day policy. A legislature's function is to draft the laws of the land, set broad goals and spend taxpayer revenues in the national interest, not to micromanage.

The judiciary, too, has been increasingly assertive over the last three decades. It has shown far less deference to the executive in this war than in past conflicts. This energetic judiciary is partly a response to Congress's bulked-up power; the courts have had to step in to try to repair the problems created by vague laws that try to do too much, that state grandiose goals, while avoiding hard policy choices.

Congress's vague legal mandates are handed off to the states or the agencies or the courts to sort out. Our legislators rarely turn their attention to the problems created by laws that are old and obsolete, or of dubious relevance to new issues. (This is why the Hamdan decision was less a rebuke of the presidency than a sign of frustration with Congress's failure to update our laws to deal with the terrorist menace.)

Unfortunately, much of the public misunderstands the true role of the executive branch — in large part because today's culture transforms presidents into celebrities. On TV, a president's every move seems central to the universe, so he has the image of power that far exceeds the reality. But as the presidential scholar Richard Neustadt, a liberal icon, argued, the presidency is inherently weak, while mythic things are expected of and attributed to it — like maintaining national security and economic growth.

Today many pundits and political scientists seem to want the president's power to be the sum of his communication and political skills, his organizational ability, his cognitive style and emotional intelligence. It is almost as if any president who uses the constitutional powers allocated to his office to effect policy has failed, not succeeded.

But the presidency, unlike Congress, is the only office elected by and accountable to the nation as a whole. The president has better access to expertise from the unified executive branch — including its top secret data — than the more ad hoc information Congress develops through hearings and investigations.

That is why, while jealous of its prerogatives, Congress usually goes along with a president's policy decisions. A strong executive can accept responsibility for difficult choices that Congress wants to avoid. The Republican Congress, for instance, wanted to give President Bill Clinton a line-item veto, only to be blocked by the Supreme Court. Despite hearings and criticism of the energetic executive, Congress has yet to pass laws reining in Mr. Bush very much.

Congress has for years been avoiding its duty to revamp or repeal outmoded parts of bygone laws in the light of contemporary threats. We have needed energy in the executive branch to fill in that gap. Congress now must act to guide our counterterror policy, but it should not try to micromanage the executive branch, particularly in war, where flexibility of action is paramount.

Bush Untethered (NYT)

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

Watching the president on Friday in the Rose Garden as he threatened to quit interrogating terrorists if Congress did not approve his detainee bill, we were struck by how often he acts as though there were not two sides to a debate. We have lost count of the number of times he has said Americans have to choose between protecting the nation precisely the way he wants, and not protecting it at all.

On Friday, President Bush posed a choice between ignoring the law on wiretaps, and simply not keeping tabs on terrorists. Then he said the United States could rewrite the Geneva Conventions, or just stop questioning terrorists. To some degree, he is following a script for the elections: terrify Americans into voting Republican. But behind that seems to be a deeply seated conviction that under his leadership, America is right and does not need the discipline of rules. He does not seem to understand that the rules are what makes this nation as good as it can be.

The debate over prisoners is not about whether some field agent can dunk Osama bin Laden's head to learn the location of the ticking bomb, as one senator suggested last week. It is about whether the United States can confront terrorism without shredding our democratic heritage. This nation is built on the notion that the rules restrain our behavior, because we know we're fallible. Just look at the hundreds of men in Guantánamo Bay, many guilty of nothing, facing unending detention because Mr. Bush did not want to follow the rules after 9/11.

Now Mr. Bush insists that in cleaning up his mess, Congress should exempt C.I.A. interrogators from the Geneva Conventions. "The bottom line is simple: If Congress passes a law that does not clarify the rules — if they do not do that — the program's not going forward," Mr. Bush said. But clarity is not the issue. The Geneva Conventions are clear and provide ample room for interrogating terrorists. Similarly, in the debate over eavesdropping on terrorists' conversations, Mr. Bush says that if he has to get a warrant, he can't do it at all. Actually, he has ample authority to eavesdrop on terrorists, under the very law he is breaking, the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat who is on the Senate Intelligence Committee, says that after being briefed on the wiretapping, she concluded that "this surveillance can be done, without sacrifice to our national security," within the law. She has introduced a bill to affirm FISA's control over all wiretapping. It would also give the authorities far more flexibility to listen first and get a warrant later when it's really urgent. But the only bill Mr. Bush wants is a co-production of Vice President Dick Cheney and Arlen Specter, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, that gives the president more room to ignore FISA and chokes off any court challenges.

The best thing Congress could do for America right now is to drop this issue and let the courts decide the matter. Mr. Bush can't claim urgency; it's not as though he has stopped the wiretapping.

Legislation is needed on the prisoner issue, although not as urgently as Mr. Bush says. Three Republican senators, John McCain, John Warner, and Lindsey Graham, have a bill that is far better than the White House version but it, too, has some huge flaws that will take time to fix. It will be hard in an election year, but if the Republicans stand firm, and Democrats insist on the needed changes, they might just require Mr. Bush to recognize that he is subject to the same restraints that applied to every other president of this nation of laws.

A License To Abuse (WP)

Mr. Bush says he has "one question" for Congress. The right answer to it is "no."

PRESIDENT BUSH made crystal clear Friday that he has one overriding concern about the legislation on foreign detainees before Congress. His "one test," he said, was whether Congress would authorize what he repeatedly called "the program" -- that is, the CIA's network of secret prisons and its brutal treatment of the people in them. "Congress has got a decision to make," Mr. Bush declared during a news conference. "Do you want the program to go forward or not?"

That is indeed the most important question before Congress and the nation. So allow us to elaborate, again, exactly what Mr. Bush means by "the program." He's talking about the practice of sequestering terrorist suspects indefinitely and without charge in secret foreign locations and holding them incommunicado even from the International Red Cross. Until recently, such "disappearances" were the signature of Third World dictatorships. U.S. adoption of them has roiled relations with our closest European allies and impeded collaboration with foreign police and intelligence services.

Mr. Bush also wants the CIA to be able to treat its detainees to such practices as "cold cell," or induced hypothermia, in which detainees are held naked in near-freezing temperatures and repeatedly doused with water; "long standing," in which prisoners are handcuffed in an uncomfortable standing position and forced to remain there for up to 40 hours; and prolonged sleep deprivation.

Throughout the world and for decades, such practices have been called torture. That's what the United States called them when they were used by the Soviet KGB. As the president himself tacitly acknowledges, they violate Geneva and other international conventions as well as current U.S. law. News that the United States has used these techniques -- as well as waterboarding, an ancient torture technique that simulates drowning -- has gravely damaged U.S. standing in the world and the fight against terrorism. It increases the danger that captured U.S. servicemen will be exposed to similar treatment by nations that might otherwise feel obliged to respect the Geneva standards.

When Mr. Bush was asked Friday whether he wasn't in effect seeking sanction for torture, he responded with an evasion. He claimed that the Geneva Conventions' Common Article 3 is "very vague" and that his proposal would provide "clarity" for CIA professionals. In fact, the opposite is true.

Common Article 3, which prohibits cruel treatment and humiliation, is an inflexible standard. The U.S. military, which lived with it comfortably for decades before the Bush administration, just reembraced it after a prolonged battle with the White House. The Army issued a thick manual this month that tells interrogators exactly what they can and cannot do in complying with the standard. The nation's most respected military leaders have said that they need and want nothing more to accomplish the mission of detaining and interrogating enemy prisoners -- and that harsher methods would be counterproductive.

Mr. Bush wants to replace these clear rules with a flexible and subjective standard -- one that would legalize any method that does not "shock the conscience." What shocks the conscience? According to Mr. Bush's Justice Department, the torture techniques described above -- and at least in the past, waterboarding -- do not, "in certain circumstances." So Mr. Bush's real objection to Common Article 3 is not that it is vague. It is that it will not permit abusive practices that he isn't willing publicly to discuss or defend.

Rather than admit that he wants to legalize disappearances and torture, Mr. Bush ominously warns that "the program" won't continue unless Congress passes his bill. He says "time's running out," even though it's not. There are no detainees in the CIA prisons at the moment, according to the president, and the only clock running out is that measuring the midterm election campaign. There is no need for Congress to act in the next two weeks. But if it does, the clear answer to Mr. Bush's question, endorsed by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), former secretary of state Colin L. Powell and a host of other responsible Republican and military leaders, is "no." For both moral and practical reasons, the country should reject this fundamental violation of its principles.

No Rubber Stamp For Bush (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

The president deserves even more resistance to his method of waging war on terror.

PRESIDENT BUSH MADE FULL USE of the 9/11 anniversary last week. In his speeches and remarks, he reminded the nation of the stakes involved in what he calls the war on terror, and he conveyed a renewed sense of urgency to prevent attacks and bring those responsible for 9/11 to justice. Yet if his goal was also to pressure Congress into acting as a rubber stamp for the administration's questionable legal tactics in conducting this war, it was a disappointing week for the president — and a heartening one for anyone outside the White House.

On the treatment of detainees, the president has been especially disingenuous. He has never been a fan of international law, so it's absurd for him to pretend to want to "clarify" the Geneva Convention. What he clearly wants to do is gut the treaty's humanitarian protections for wartime detainees, with an eye toward retroactively legitimizing abusive CIA interrogation tactics used on terrorism suspects.

In what has to be considered one of the high points of this so-called war on terror — if one considers democracy and the rule of law among the prime targets of "terror"— last week prominent Republicans blocked the White House's cynical move.

Backed by Colin L. Powell, former secretary of State and former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, four Republican senators — John McCain of Arizona, Susan Collins of Maine, John W. Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina — joined the 11 Democrats on the Senate Armed Services Committee in rejecting the White House's proposal to weaken detainees' protections in the judicial process. Legislation authorizing military tribunals to try terror suspects was mandated by June's Supreme Court ruling invalidating the White House's attempts to create the tribunals, and their rules, on its own.

The committee transcended partisanship to protect not only constitutional norms but the interests of U.S. troops who may be detained overseas in the course of active duty. How would you like to be a prisoner of war in a world in which the U.S. government is encouraging others to "clarify" the Geneva Convention to serve their own purposes?

At issue is the Convention's Common Article 3, drafted in 1949, barring "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment." The administration considers this language inconveniently vague and would like to tinker with it to legalize an "alternative set of procedures" employed by CIA operatives in secret facilities.

The bill passed by the Senate committee doesn't reinterpret the Convention, and it preserves some important procedural guarantees that the White House would deny its military commissions — including the right of defendants to confront the evidence against them. Bush was flustered that Senate Republicans hadn't fallen into line. In his news conference Friday morning, the president said: "The intelligence community must be able to tell me that the bill Congress sends to my desk will allow this vital program to continue. That's what I'm going to ask."

On another front in the nation's war on terror and the administration's war to expand executive powers, the Senate Judiciary Committee took up the issue of how to bring the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping of Americans under legal control. And on this matter, like small children at a birthday party, everyone was a winner last week.

The committee approved a bill by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) that would essentially legalize what the Bush administration has been doing outside the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. But the committee also approved two other bills — one by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) that would allow a secret court to rule on the constitutionality of what Bush calls the Terrorist Surveillance Program, and another by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) that would reiterate that FISA governs all domestic electronic surveillance while making it easier for the NSA to act without a court order in a terrorist emergency.

Instead of hedging its bets, the committee should have approved the Feinstein bill and discarded the others.

Some defenders of the spying program have hinted that it cannot be pursued under FISA because its courts deal with permission to listen in on the conversations of individuals, as opposed to "data mining" of telephone and e-mail records that might throw up hundreds or thousands of exchanges or e-mail addresses. It is also argued that the FISA approval process is too sluggish — something that can be remedied by more permissive procedures for emergencies. The Bush administration has only itself to blame if there is confusion about what exactly the NSA is doing and why it cannot be squared with FISA. Feinstein, who as a member of the Intelligence Committee is privy to details about the NSA program that are denied the rest of us, is confident that it can continue to operate under a modification of the FISA scheme. If she is wrong, the administration has not made the case.

All three bills that emerged from the Senate Judiciary Committee acknowledge what the administration is loath to admit: that Congress was improperly excluded from the design and implementation of this spying program. But the Specter bill gives too much to the president and limits the role of the FISA court to a "program-wide" determination of the program's constitutionality. The DeWine bill, while providing for congressional oversight, is also too deferential to the president.

Whether the issue is NSA spying or the application of the Geneva Convention to the interrogation of suspected terrorists, the administration makes the same argument: "Trust us." This is not healthy.

As Powell wrote in a letter to McCain, speaking in support of the Geneva Convention, "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." No matter how grave the challenges the nation faces, those doubts spread every day that Bush refuses to accept that there are checks and balances on his power.

The View From Guantánamo (NYT)

By Abu Bakker Qassim

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

Tirana, Albania

I HAVE been greatly saddened to hear that the Congress of the United States, a country I deeply admire, is considering new laws that would deny prisoners at Guantánamo Bay the right to challenge their detentions in federal court.

I learned my respect for American institutions the hard way. When I was growing up as a Uighur in China, there were no independent courts to review the imprisonment and oppression of people who, like me, peacefully opposed the Communists. But I learned my hardest lesson from the United States: I spent four long years behind the razor wire of its prison in Cuba.

I was locked up and mistreated for being in the wrong place at the wrong time during America's war in Afghanistan. Like hundreds of Guantánamo detainees, I was never a terrorist or a soldier. I was never even on a battlefield. Pakistani bounty hunters sold me and 17 other Uighurs to the United States military like animals for $5,000 a head. The Americans made a terrible mistake.

It was only the country's centuries-old commitment to allowing habeas corpus challenges that put that mistake right — or began to. In May, on the eve of a court hearing in my case, the military relented, and I was sent to Albania along with four other Uighurs. But 12 of my Uighur brothers remain in Guantánamo today. Will they be stranded there forever?

Without my American lawyers and habeas corpus, my situation and that of the other Uighurs would still be a secret. I would be sitting in a metal cage today. Habeas corpus helped me to tell the world that Uighurs are not a threat to the United States or the West, but an ally. Habeas corpus cleared my name — and most important, it let my family know that I was still alive.

Like my fellow Uighurs, I am a great admirer of the American legal and political systems. I have the utmost respect for the United States Congress. So I respectfully ask American lawmakers to protect habeas corpus and let justice prevail. Continuing to permit habeas rights to the detainees in Guantánamo will not set the guilty free. It will prove to the world that American democracy is safe and well.

I am from East Turkestan on the northwest edge of China. Communist China cynically calls my homeland "Xinjiang," which means "new dominion" or "new frontier." My people want only to be treated with respect and dignity. But China uses the American war on terrorism as a pretext to punish those who peacefully dissent from its oppressive policies. They brand as "terrorism" all political opposition from the Uighurs.

Amnesty International reports that East Turkistan is the only province in China where people may face the death penalty for political offenses. Chinese leaders brag about the number of Uighur political prisoners shot in the head. I was punished for speaking against China's unjust policies, and I left because of the threat to my life. My search for work and refuge took me from Kyrgyzstan to Afghanistan and Pakistan.

I heard about the Sept. 11 attacks for the first time in Guantánamo. I was not aware of their magnitude until after my release, when a reporter showed me images online at an Internet cafe in Tirana. It was a terrible thing. But I too was its victim. I would never have experienced the ordeal and humiliation of Guantánamo if this horrific event had not taken place.

I feel great sadness for the families who lost their loved ones on that horrible day five years ago. And I would be sadder still to see the freedom-loving American people walk away from their respect for the rule of law. I want America to be a strong and respected nation in the world. Only then can it continue to be the source of hope for the hopeless — like my people.

Yemen Arrests Militants Accused In Plot (AP)

By Donna Abu-nasr

AP, September 17, 2006

Four suspected al-Qaida members who were plotting attacks for Yemen's capital were arrested Saturday, a day after security forces foiled near-simultaneous attempts to blow up two oil installations, authorities said.

Interior Minister Rashad Rashad al-Eleimi said the suspects had links to the four suicide bombers who tried to strike the oil installations Friday but were killed during the attacks.

Security forces confiscated 12 bags each containing about 88 to 110 pounds of highly explosive material Saturday as well as masks and women's clothing, which militants sometimes use to disguise themselves, al-Eleimi said.

He said the four arrested men planned to stage attacks on Yemeni and foreign targets in San`a but did not provide any details.

The arrests were made Saturday morning after an hours-long standoff that began Friday night when security forces surrounded the militants. The interior minister said the alleged militants opened fire but no one was hurt.

"We are certain that this cell has links with the al-Qaida network and with those who carried out the attacks in Mareb and Hadarmut," al-Eleimi told reporters, referring to the areas targeted Friday.

The violence coincided with an election campaign in which President Ali Abdullah Saleh, facing his first real challenge since he became head of state in 1978, has been reaching out to the country's fundamentalist Islamic movement.

Saleh offered a $26,000 reward Saturday for information leading to the arrest of terrorists in Yemen. He said the money would go to anyone "who gives information about or arrests a wanted terrorist," according to the official SABA news agency.

On Friday, four suicide bombers tried to attack a refinery in Mareb and an oil storage facility in Hadarmut but failed. They were killed when their cars blew up in an exchange of fire with security forces.

Al-Eleimi said the vehicles that blew up were loaded with up to 10 gas canisters each as well as explosives.

He said the attacks Friday and the alleged militants arrested Saturday were linked to a videotape aired Monday of al-Qaida's No. 2 leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, threatening attacks in the Persian Gulf region and on facilities he accused of stealing Muslim oil.

"There is no doubt that there are sleepers cells" in Yemen, al-Eleimi said.

Al-Qaida has an active presence in Yemen, the ancestral home of Osama bin Laden, despite government efforts to fight the network. The group was blamed for the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole in Aden that killed 17 American sailors and the attack on a French oil tanker that killed one person two years later.

There have been fears of an al-Qaida attack in Yemen since 23 members of the terror network tunneled out of a Yemeni jail in February with help from prison guards. Fourteen prisoners remain at large.

After the Cole bombing and the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, the West began pressuring Yemen to join the war against terror groups. Saleh has launched several crackdowns against extremists, winning praise from the United States.

Tribesmen Use Captives To Pressure Yemen (AP)

By Donna Abu-nasr

AP, September 17, 2006

When a French hostage mentioned to Yemeni kidnappers this week that he needed his blood pressure medication, they retrieved it for him.

The word "hostage" these days conjures images of gaunt men and women pleading for their lives, but captives in Yemen get hospitality.

While militants in places like Iraq hold and sometimes murder prisoners, Yemini tribes take hostages to pressure the government for relatively simple demands, such as freeing clan members from jail or improving roads, hospitals and schools.

The tribes have been doing it for years, and they believe the traditions of Arab hospitality dictate that their hostages be treated well.

"The four French hostages are honored guests, and we try to make sure they lack for nothing," said Almulla Zabara, a leader in the Al-Abdullah tribe that seized the four men and their Yemeni translator a week ago.

The abductors are demanding the release of some fellow tribesmen imprisoned by the government of this nation on the southwestern corner of the Saudi Arabian peninsula.

Although there aren't any recent figures, according to government officials and media reports, as many as 325 people were kidnapped in Yemen between 1991 and 2001. They included 91 French, 80 Germans, 37 Britons, 23 Americans and 22 Dutch.

Until 1998, all the captives were released unharmed. But late that year, four tourists grabbed in the first kidnapping by a Muslim extremist group rather than a tribe died during a botched rescue attempt by Yemeni security forces.

Zabara's assertion that tribal hostages are treated well is supported by the accounts of former detainees, who tell of sightseeing trips, parting gifts of pendants, incense or traditional curved daggers, wine served with dinner despite a ban on liquor and afternoons spent shooting — a popular sport among tribesmen.

In one case, the captors of American diplomat Haynes Mahoney were so concerned his captivity be comfortable that they tailed him to a supermarket to find out his food preferences and bought the items he had shopped for before kidnapping him in 1993.

Jean-Jack Abassin, a retired French nuclear engineer who was snatched in 1996, described the conditions of the four days he spent as a hostage as "very nice" and said he sent copies of pictures he took during captivity to his kidnappers.

Abassin and his wife, Monique, were on the final day of a two-week group tour when their group of 17 French citizens was taken hostage by 15 tribesmen armed with Kalashnikov assault rifles.

"It was the month of Ramadan, so they weren't eating themselves, but they prepared typical meals from the region — rice and chicken — for us," Abassin told The Associated Press from his home in Beviers, France. "At first we had to eat with our fingers, like they do, but later they gave us spoons."

He said the tribesmen also took the group sightseeing, showing them archaeological sites and ruins that the Frenchman believes had "never before been seen by Westerners."

Patrizia Rossi, one of four Italians kidnapped last January, told AP that when the group was snatched, "We got into a panic with those machine guns pointed at us."

"The kidnappers did not speak any language we knew so we couldn't communicate," she said, speaking from her home in Basiglio, Italy.

But they felt more at ease over the days as the tribesmen repeatedly reassured them that they would be released, she added. The kidnappers were trying to secure the freedom of jailed members of the al-Zaydi tribe, they told the Italians.

The hostages were given bread, rice, lamb and tea, and were even offered khat, a leaf that is a mild stimulant chewed by many Yemenis every afternoon, Rossi recalled. She said one kidnapper gave her a pendant as a gift.

Although hostages have been treated well, some were terrified to be held in remote hideouts filled with weapons.

Fabian Chrobog, who works at an investment firm in London, was kidnapped along with his family in December and held for four days.

In an account he wrote for AP, Chrobog, the son of former German Deputy Foreign Minister Juergen Chrobog, said the tribesmen demanded the release of five jailed members of their clan.

"These men weren't terrorists — they were goat herders and honey producers," he wrote. "But even when they treat you nicely, when you're in an environment with that many guns and 12-year-olds who carry Kalashnikovs, you're not safe."

When the Chrobogs were released, the captors expected their five fellow tribesmen to be freed. But they weren't, and the tribesmen who kidnapped the four French tourists Sept. 10 are seeking the release of the same prisoners.

Zabara insisted the Frenchmen were safe and said his tribesmen would protect them if the government tried to use force to free them.

Interior Minister Rashad al-Eleimi said at a news conference Saturday that the hostages were "in excellent health" and that the government would use peaceful means to secure their release.

Defining Today's Moderate Muslim (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Who is a moderate Muslim?

Is it Maher Hathout, the Los Angeles Muslim leader who has promoted interfaith relations and women's equality but denounced Israel as a brutal apartheid regime?

Is it Tashbih Sayyed, a journalist based in Alta Loma, Calif., who praises Israel's behavior toward Palestinians as tolerant and criticizes Muslims for corrupting Islam?

The question has come under intense debate since 9/11 as the public struggles to distinguish peaceful Muslims from Al Qaeda terrorists, and is at the heart of two Southern California skirmishes over who represents moderate Islam.

In a dinner scheduled for tonight, the American Jewish Congress plans to honor Sayyed and four others for what it sees as their friendly attitudes toward Israel and courageous efforts to reform Islam.

Gary Ratner, executive director of the Congress' Western region office in Los Angeles, said the tribute is part of the organization's global efforts to reach out to moderate Muslims in Pakistan, Indonesia, Albania and elsewhere, including sponsoring a dinner in New York last year for Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf.

"Israel is going to be a fixture in the Mideast," Ratner said. "If there is ever going to be peace, there has to be accommodation with Muslims."

The organization's choice of honorees, however, has offended some Muslims, in part because three of them no longer practice the faith.

In contrast, a different award has offended some Jewish sensibilities: the decision by the Los Angeles County Human Relations Commission to honor Hathout as a model of harmonious interfaith relations.

Hathout's critics argue that his controversial statements supporting Hezbollah and denouncing Israel have exposed him as an extremist. The Egyptian native and retired cardiologist, saying his opponents have twisted his record, asserts that he has long condemned terrorism, launched interfaith dialogues and promoted an American Islamic identity that celebrates pluralism, democracy and women's rights.

The commission is to vote Monday on whether to reaffirm or rescind the award.

Despite the dissent, Muslims, Christians and Jews named similar attributes when asked to define religious moderation. They included problem-solving without violence, affirmation of human rights, religious freedom and other Western values, and respectful attitudes toward women.

But on one key issue, there was sharp disagreement: attitudes toward Israel.

Ratner said his group believes support for Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state is central to the definition of a moderate because it speaks to the larger qualities of tolerance and acceptance.

Others, however, reject that as a litmus test.

"It's un-American," said John Esposito, Georgetown University professor of religion and international affairs. "Your principal and only obligation in terms of loyalty as an American is to America. You can have a variety of positions regarding foreign policy."

Still others say labels and litmus tests aren't terribly useful for either side.

"The question is … can we find points of agreement, a place from which to build trust and move forward?" asked Rob Eshman, editor of the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles. "I deal with Jews every day whom I don't consider moderate, but I don't write them off. And we can't afford to write off Muslims."

Since 9/11, Esposito and others said, the quest for moderate Muslims has become widespread as policymakers, journalists, terrorism experts and religious leaders seek to understand Islam and assess who is "safe" and who is extremist.

Often, those seeking moderate Muslims are looking for people to affirm their own values, said Reuven Firestone, a professor of medieval Jewish and Islamic studies at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in Los Angeles.

"When we say we want moderate Muslims, what we are really saying is that we want Westernized Muslims who have the same kinds of sensibilities we have," Firestone said. "But that's not realistic. It's a false but human assumption that moderates must agree with us on most issues."

To Firestone, moderates are those committed to settling disputes without violence and willing to hear and consider other points of view, especially those contrary to their own.

Others said that whatever yardstick is chosen must be consistently applied. If Muslims who condemn Israeli treatment of Palestinians are extremists, all Christians, Jews and atheists who feel likewise must be similarly described, said Khaled Abou El Fadl, a UCLA Islamic law professor and author of "The Great Theft: Wrestling Islam from the Extremists."

Many said a key criterion for Muslim moderates is that they in fact be Muslim.

Among the Jewish Congress honorees are Indian-born British author Salman Rushdie, a self-described atheist, and two women who say they left the faith years ago, Wafa Sultan and Nonie Darwish.

Darwish is a Southern California writer and founder of Arabs for Israel. Sultan is a Corona psychiatrist, writer and activist who has said she is particularly concerned about women's status in Islam.

"By honoring Muslims who are not practicing Muslims, the given message, even if unintentional, is that these people are good because they left the faith," said Firestone, who recently returned from a six-month sabbatical in Cairo. "But there are hundreds of millions of moral, deeply believing Muslims."

Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, said Jewish groups have long tried to promote alternative Islamic leaders who may be friendly to Israel but in fact have little following among Muslims. "It's a slap in the face," he said.

But Ratner defended the selections.

"To me it's a phonetic debate," he said, referring to whether the awardees were practicing Muslims or not. "It's about the reform of Islam so that the Muslim world and the West can live in peace and tolerance with each other's values and beliefs."

Two of the honorees say they are practicing Muslims deeply concerned about their tradition's future and are unafraid to speak about it. Both Salim Mansur, a Calcutta native and Canadian political science professor, and Sayyed, the newspaper editor, said the Muslim world must stop blaming the West for its own ailments, including poverty, illiteracy, injustice or extremism.

Sayyed, 64, immigrated to the United States in 1981 to escape what he described as an increasingly radical practice of Islam in Pakistan. He said Muslims must reinvigorate their tradition with open debate even on sensitive questions. That includes, he said, whether Islam was spread by the sword or ideas, whether shariah is an outdated legal system for Muslims and whether the Prophet Muhammad's actions were all divinely inspired.

But when he wrote an article last year calling for Islam's reinterpretation, Sayyed said, he was widely condemned and threatened by fellow Muslims.

Mansur, too, said he was ostracized after writing columns for the Toronto Sun five years ago condemning the Taliban's destruction of ancient Buddhist statues in Afghanistan and comparing it to the murderous Khmer Rouge of Cambodia. The backlash prompted him to stop going to his local mosque.

Both men, however, said they have no intention of falling silent.

"Because I love my faith, I have to raise my voice and challenge it from within," Sayyed said.

Spy Agencies Outsourcing To Fill Key Jobs (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Contractors, many of them former employees, are doing sensitive work, such as handling agents. A review of the practice has been ordered.

WASHINGTON — At the National Counterterrorism Center — the agency created two years ago to prevent another attack like Sept. 11 — more than half of the employees are not U.S. government analysts or terrorism experts. Instead, they are outside contractors.

At CIA headquarters in Langley, Va., senior officials say it is routine for career officers to look around the table during meetings on secret operations and be surrounded by so-called green-badgers — nonagency employees who carry special-colored IDs.

Some of the work being outsourced is extremely sensitive. Abraxas Corp., a private company in McLean, Va., founded by a group of CIA veterans, devises "covers," or false identities, for an elite group of overseas case officers, according to current and former U.S. intelligence officials familiar with the arrangement.

Contractors also are turning up in increasing numbers in clandestine facilities around the world. At the CIA station in Islamabad, Pakistan, as many as three-quarters of those on hand since the Sept. 11 attacks have been contractors. In Baghdad, site of the agency's largest overseas presence, contractors have at times outnumbered full-time CIA employees, according to officials who have held senior positions in the station.

The post-9/11 period has brought sweeping changes to the U.S. intelligence community. Spy budgets have swelled by more than $10 billion a year, and agencies have seen their roles and authorities altered by legislation.

Largely because of the demands of the war on terrorism and the drawn-out conflict in Iraq, U.S. spy agencies have turned to unprecedented numbers of outside contractors to perform jobs once the domain of government-employed analysts and secret agents.

The proliferation of contractors has outstripped the intelligence community's ability to keep track of them.

Former intelligence officials said most U.S. spy agencies did not have even approximate counts of the numbers of contractors they were employing — although several officials said the number at the CIA had nearly doubled in the last five years and now surpassed the full-time workforce of about 17,500. Often, the contract employees had previous ties to the agencies.

Concerned by the lack of data and direction, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte this year ordered a comprehensive study of the use of contractors.

Ronald Sanders, a senior intelligence official in charge of the examination, said that all 16 U.S. intelligence agencies had been instructed to turn over records on contractors, and that one focus of the study would be whether outsourcing highly sensitive jobs was appropriate.

"We have to come to some conclusion about what our core intelligence mission is and how many [full-time employees] it's going to take to accomplish that mission," Sanders said, adding that the growth in contracting over the last five years had been driven by necessity and was extremely haphazard.

"I wish I could tell you it's by design," he said. "But I think it's been by default."

Senior U.S. intelligence officials said that the reliance on contractors was so deep that agencies couldn't function without them.

"If you took away the contractor support, they'd have to put yellow tape around the building and close it down," said a former senior CIA official who was responsible for overseeing contracts before leaving the agency earlier this year.

This former official and more than a dozen other current and former U.S. intelligence officials interviewed for this story spoke on condition of anonymity because of the classified nature of intelligence contracting work.

The use of outside firms has enabled spy agencies to tap a deep reservoir of talent during a period of unprecedented demand. Many of those hired have been retired case officers and analysts who were eager to contribute to the response to the Sept. 11 attacks and who have more expertise and operational experience than agency insiders. In fact, the CIA has created its own roster of retired case officers — known as the "cadre" — who are eligible to be hired as independent contractors for temporary assignments.

Even so, the trend has alarmed some intelligence professionals, who are concerned that using contractors to do spying work carries security risks and higher costs. They point to soaring profits being made by contracting firms, and a parade of veteran officers who have left intelligence agencies only to return with green badges and higher salaries.

Even those quick to praise the contributions of contractors express discomfort with the mercenary aspect of modern intelligence work.

"There's a commercial side to it that I frankly don't like," said James L. Pavitt, who retired in 2004 as head of the CIA's clandestine service. "I would much prefer to see staff case officers who are in the chain of command and making a day-in and day-out conscious decision as civil servants in the intelligence business."

The CIA declined to comment on specific contracts but defended the use of contractors for intelligence work.

"Contractors give the agency enormous flexibility and are an important part of our workforce," said Paul Gimigliano, a spokesman for the CIA. "As partners, they help us build or enhance specific capabilities we need for a finite period."

U.S. intelligence agencies have used contractors for decades. Corporate giants such as Lockheed Martin Corp. have long competed for classified contracts to build spy planes and satellites. Spy services routinely use private companies to handle support functions, such as providing security or building classified computer networks.

In fact, two-thirds of the contractors at the counter-terrorism center are information technology workers who manage computer systems. And independent contractors have at times played significant roles in overseas operations, including pilots who flew clandestine supply runs for the CIA in Vietnam.

But current and former officials said spy agencies now depended on contractors to a greater extent than ever envisioned to carry out their basic spying missions.

The trend is particularly pronounced at the CIA. Whereas other intelligence agencies can take advantage of employees detailed to them from branches of the military, the CIA is more dependent on a civilian workforce.

The CIA has been hiring at a record pace in recent years. But it takes years to train new case officers, let alone to develop seasoned operatives capable of delicate missions in global hot spots. The agency has also turned to contractors to plug deep holes left by staff cuts and hiring freezes in the 1990s.

Meanwhile, new intelligence entities created to fix Sept. 11-related failures — including the intelligence director's office and centers tracking terrorism and weapons proliferation — have created thousands of new positions and cannibalized the ranks of the CIA and other agencies.

One former senior CIA official said the agency had outsourced an array of core jobs in its own counter-terrorism center, including the task of posting names of new terrorism suspects to immigration and law enforcement watch lists.

And despite restrictions that bar contractors from holding positions of authority over agency personnel, current and former U.S. intelligence officials said that contractors functioned as de facto team leaders in numerous stations around the world, and routinely handled clandestine meetings with CIA sources.

In Baghdad, contractors "do everything, especially 'ops' work," a former CIA officer who has served extensively in Iraq said of the operations functions. "They're recruiting [informants], managing the major relationships we have with the military, handling agents in support of frontline combat units. The guys doing that work are contractors. They're not staff officers."

Contractors have played similarly significant roles in Afghanistan. Gary C. Schroen, who was among the first CIA employees to enter the country after the Sept. 11 attacks, continued to travel to Pakistan and Afghanistan after retiring and going to work as a CIA contractor. Among his assignments was to monitor relationships with regional warlords as well as the head of the Afghan government's intelligence service.

There are other restrictions on contract employees. At the CIA, contractors cannot disburse money or handle personnel matters such as filling out employee evaluation forms. For high-ranking officials who leave, there are other restrictions, including a required "cool down" period of one year during which they are barred from returning to the agency to solicit business.

But former CIA leaders are in high demand and frequently serve as officers in companies that have contracts with their former agencies.

John Brennan, for example, retired last year as head of the National Counterterrorism Center and is now chief executive of the Analysis Corp., which supplies contract analysts to the center. In an interview, Brennan said that any contracts with the counter-terrorism center predated his arrival at the Analysis Corp.

Contractors are subject to the same background checks and security clearance requirements as full-time employees, officials said. But some of that clearance work itself has been outsourced, officials said, and even the screening done by the CIA hasn't been infallible.

In one well-known case, David A. Passaro was hired as a contractor with the CIA's paramilitary service even though he had a record of abusive behavior and had been fired by a Connecticut police department. Passaro was convicted of felony assault earlier this year in federal court in North Carolina for his role in the beating of a detainee who died in Afghanistan in 2003.

U.S. intelligence officials said that Passaro's case was an aberration and that security problems had not been more frequent among contractors than among career officers.

In another high-profile case, the CIA inspector general is investigating whether the agency's former No. 3 official, Kyle Dustin "Dusty" Foggo, improperly accepted expensive vacations and other rewards for awarding CIA contracts to a lifelong friend who is linked to the bribery scandal surrounding ex-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

Some officials fear that the growth in contracting is fueling a so-called spy drain, in which talented officers are being lured to the private sector by firms offering pay increases of 50% or more.

At the CIA, poaching became such a problem that former Director Porter J. Goss had to warn several firms to stop recruiting employees in the agency cafeteria, according to former officials familiar with the matter. One recently retired case officer said he had been approached twice while in line for coffee.

"It's like sharks in the water," said the officer, an overseas veteran who has handled assignments in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East. "As soon as the word went around that I was leaving, my e-mail in-box was pinging. People were calling me at home."

Sanders, the official in Negroponte's office, said it was unclear whether the spy drain problem was real. Anecdotal evidence suggests that some officers are leaving early, he said, but attrition rates have not risen in recent years.

Another worry is that the reliance on contractors is eroding agency budgets. Sanders said a recent personnel study by the Senate Intelligence Committee found that contractors were typically paid 50% to 100% more than staff officers to perform comparable work — a disparity that can create internal tensions.

"It's a serious morale problem when you've got a guy in the field making $80,000 and a contractor making $150,000," said the former case officer who served in Iraq. "And the [staff employee] is supposed to supervise the guy making twice the money."

The spike in the use of contractors is likely to diminish as the bumper crop of recruits at the CIA and other agencies rises through the ranks. However, officials said that was a process that would take years.

A Bold Upstart With CIA Roots (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Fast-growing Abraxas Corp. was founded after 9/11 by agency veterans. But some fear security risks in such work.

WASHINGTON — In the burgeoning field of intelligence contractors, an especially aggressive upstart is Abraxas Corp., a privately held company that has assembled a deep roster of CIA veterans to handle a wide range of clandestine assignments — including secret work for an elite team of overseas case officers.

The company was founded by a group of former high-ranking agency employees, led by Richard "Hollis" Helms, a longtime overseas officer in the Middle East and onetime head of the CIA's European division, and Richard Calder, who was the agency's deputy director for administration.

In a radio interview last year, Calder said the firm was launched shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks by a group of retirees who felt spurned that the agency had not called to enlist their help. "We were all eager to do whatever we could do," Calder said. But, he said, "the phone never rang." Company officials did not respond to repeated requests for comment.

The company occupies an unmarked, third-floor office suite in McLean, Va., two miles from CIA headquarters. It has mainly specialized in providing veteran operatives and reports officers for positions in overseas stations and at CIA headquarters.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, "they went and signed up all these retired, Arabic-speaking officers and sold them back to the agency on contract," said a former CIA official familiar with the company, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "That's how Abraxas was born."

But Abraxas has also been tapped for unusual assignments. Several former CIA officials said Abraxas had been given a highly classified contract to craft "covers" — false identities and front companies — for the agency's nonofficial cover program.

The NOC program is one of the most sensitive and carefully guarded operations in the CIA. Most overseas case officers work under diplomatic cover, meaning they pose as State Department officials working at U.S. embassies and missions. If they are caught spying, they are typically protected from prosecution by diplomatic immunity.

Officers in the NOC program have no such protections, and therefore operate under substantially greater risk. Major corporations traditionally have cooperated with the CIA to allow case officers to hold positions in overseas branches. But since the Sept. 11 attacks, the CIA has been under increased pressure to devise more imaginative cover arrangements that might give operatives closer access to terrorist networks.

Former CIA officials said that Abraxas had played a leading role in this effort to craft new covers and that the firm had assembled a group of employees with experience in such work. Among them is Fred Turco, former head of the external operations and cover unit, which oversees the NOC program inside the agency.

Several former officials questioned the arrangement, saying that whatever talent Abraxas had assembled, outsourcing any work in such a sensitive program posed an inherent security risk. But others were more sanguine, saying that the CIA's failures to penetrate Al Qaeda and other terrorist groups underscored the need for fresh ideas and a more experimental approach.

"They're going where the expertise lies," said a former senior CIA official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "It's a good example of them doing what they should be doing."

Abraxas declined to comment. Approached by a reporter outside the company's office, Helms said that speaking publicly about such matters "doesn't serve the public at all and damages the country."

Abraxas is part of a new breed of companies known in intelligence circles as "body shops" because — unlike firms that provide manufacturing, engineering or technical services — they are mainly in the business of supplying bodies for analysis centers, headquarters positions and overseas assignments.

A recent posting on Abraxas' website lists openings for computer programmers and intelligence analysts "for a broad spectrum of clients in and outside the national security arena."

In his radio interview, Calder said Abraxas got as much as 90% of its revenue from government contracts, though it has sought more business from the private sector through new products including computer software.

Office parks in suburban Virginia are increasingly cluttered with companies like Abraxas, as upstarts such as SpecTal move into territory long dominated by behemoths including Booz Allen Hamilton Inc. and Science Applications International Corp.

But few companies have taken advantage of the surge in contractor spending as adroitly as Abraxas. The company does not publicly report its financial results. But it was recognized last year by the Deloitte & Touche accounting firm as one of the nation's fastest growing young companies, posting revenue growth of 714% over three years.

This year, accounting firm Ernst & Young named Helms its Washington-area entrepreneur of the year.

American Intelligence -- Still Stupid (LAT)

By Amy Zegart, Amy Zegart Is Associate Professor Of Public Policy At Ucla And The Author Of A Forthcoming Book Abou

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

We haven't been attacked since 2001, but don't thank the country's cumbersome, redundant intelligence bureaucracy.

FIVE YEARS AFTER the most devastating terrorist attack in U.S. history, all our worst intelligence deficiencies remain. Intelligence is spread across 16 agencies that operate as warring tribes more than a team. The CIA is in disarray. And the FBI's information technology is stuck in the dark ages.

There are more intelligence agencies to coordinate than ever but still no one in firm charge of them all. In 2004, Congress established the post of director of national intelligence. Rather than integrating intelligence, however, the job's creation has triggered huge turf wars. For the last two years, while the office of the intelligence director has been fighting over who briefs the president and who staffs assignments, the Pentagon has quietly expanded its intelligence activities at home and abroad.

This is bad. Pentagon units now duplicate such intelligence activities as conducting secret counter-terrorism operations, collecting information abroad and monitoring Americans inside the U.S. without warrants, presidential authorizations or meaningful supervision by the director of national intelligence and Congress.

One little-known Pentagon unit, the Counterintelligence Field Activity, began in 2002 to protect U.S. forces from terrorist attacks, but has since grown into a sprawling counter-terrorism agency with wide-ranging duties and authority over 4,000 active and reserve military investigators.

Information sharing among intelligence agencies has improved — but that's not saying much. The poster child of intelligence reform is a new agency called the National Counterterrorism Center, where officials from different agencies sit in the same room and draft collective reports. The center has even developed a classified website that provides synthesized terrorism intelligence for government officials.

Sounds good. But because analysts at the National Counterterrorism Center have varying levels of security clearances and come from different intelligence agencies, they see different pieces of information. Intelligence still isn't shared even when the rules allow it. Information is stored on nearly 30 incompatible networks. To access them all, analysts must use six computers.

"It's a little scary," Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), who sits on the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, said during the confirmation hearing for Gen. Michael Hayden as CIA director. "It's like we have duct-taped our systems together. Surely we can do better than this."

Apparently, Senator, we can't. Information sharing outside the National Counterterrorism Center is worse. In its 2005 report card, the 9/11 commission gave such efforts a "D." A recent study by the Markle Foundation Task Force on national security found that information sharing continued to be hampered by "turf wars and unclear lines of authority," officials who "still cling" to old ways of doing business and a diminishing sense of commitment. The task force concluded that despite dozens of initiatives, guidelines and statutory requirements, "systematic, trusted information sharing remains more of an aspiration than a reality."

That's the good news. The bad news is called the CIA and the FBI.

The CIA's current strategy for penetrating Al Qaeda? More of the same. The agency has been on a hiring binge, tripling the number of clandestine operatives since 2001 rather than improving the quality of its personnel or developing new ways to recruit jihadists who skip the embassy cocktail party circuit. As one former spy put it, hiring 50% more agents without fundamentally changing how they do business just makes you stupid.

Meanwhile, the agency formerly known as Central still struggles to produce big-picture analyses about America's enemies. Last year, a presidential commission chaired by federal Judge Laurence Silberman and former Sen. Charles Robb (D-Va.) concluded that strategic intelligence was bad and worsening. "Across the board," the commission concluded, "the intelligence community knows disturbingly little about the nuclear programs of many of the world's most dangerous actors. In some cases, it knows less now than it did five or 10 years ago."

Ironically, 9/11 has made matters worse, focusing analysts on today's threat list rather than anticipating tomorrow's enemies. Many insiders worry that the CIA has become "CNN with secrets," responding to headlines rather than undertaking more over-the-horizon analysis. Even Hayden warned Congress that unless we get serious about thinking long term, the United States would be "endlessly surprised."

These surprises are not good.

Meanwhile, over at the FBI, Director Robert Mueller told Congress in May that his bureau has "expanded [its] mission, radically overhauled our intelligence programs and capabilities, and … undergone tremendous personnel growth."

I'm not sure what FBI he's talking about. Last year, the Justice Department's inspector general found that FBI analysts — the people who are supposed to connect the dots — spent only half their time actually doing analysis. What were they busy doing instead? Taking out the trash and answering telephones, the same menial tasks they were assigned before 9/11.

It is often said that change takes time. But history is filled with examples in which more was accomplished in less. In 1865, less than five years after the Civil War began, the nation had reunited and abolished slavery. Four years after Japan attacked Pearl Harbor, U.S. forces had crossed two oceans and won the war. The founders managed to draft the Constitution in 100 working days.

Speaking from the Oval Office on Monday night, President Bush delivered his annual 9/11 refrain: We are safer than before.

The president is right about one thing: Five years after 9/11, we have not been attacked. But we should not confuse luck with effectiveness.

5 Years After Terror Of Anthrax, Case Grows Colder (HC)

By Eric Rosenberg

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

Deadly germs in the mail rattled the nation in 2001, but time hasn't yielded many clues

WASHINGTON — Five years after anthrax killed five people and introduced America to high-tech bioterrorism, one of the biggest crime mysteries of our times remains unsolved.

FBI agents and U.S. postal inspectors have pursued hundreds of leads and interviewed scores of scientists who work with the deadly anthrax bacteria, but the investigation now appears to be languishing.

"No matter what anybody says, if it is five years out, and we are not even seeing any smoke from the investigation, then I would say definitely that this case is cold right now," said Christopher Hamilton, a former FBI counter-terrorism official who worked on the anthrax investigation and is now a counter-terrorism expert at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, a non-partisan think tank. "This thing is just sitting out there with nothing happening."

The murders-by-germ in the weeks immediately after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks added to the nation's anxieties and triggered a massive hunt for the perpetrator who used the mail to spread the bacteria.

Hundreds of FBI personnel worked the case at the outset, struggling to discern whether the Sept. 11 al-Qaida attacks and the anthrax murders were connected before eventually concluding that they were not.

A senior law enforcement official familiar with the investigation insisted that "the investigation is still ongoing and intensely active." The official, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly, said there "are a number of pending and very important leads that are being pursued."

There are 23 FBI agents and 12 postal inspectors on the case, dubbed the Amerithrax investigation inside the FBI, he said.

The anthrax investigation began after a Florida photojournalist died on Oct. 5, 2001, from an infection produced by the bacteria. Within days, anthrax-laced letters were uncovered at news outlets in New York City and at the Washington office of Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D., then the top Democrat in the Senate. In November, anthrax turned up in a letter sent to Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

The letters contained similar handwritten notes. The letter to Leahy read: "You cannot stop us. We have the anthrax. You die now. Are you afraid? Death to America. Death to Israel. Allah is great."

In addition to the Florida victim, two U.S. postal workers in Washington, a New York hospital worker and an elderly Connecticut woman died from anthrax-borne infections.

The federal government reacted by shutting some congressional offices and the Supreme Court building, while postal facilities throughout the U.S. were put on high alert.

The anthrax attacks led governments and businesses around the nation to devise new safety procedures for handling mail. Some mail handlers wore surgical masks and plastic gloves for protection.

Mail sent to government offices in Washington is irradiated to destroy any dangerous bacteria.

Anthrax is a naturally occurring bacteria and only rarely infects humans. However, the anthrax used in the attacks had been finely milled to make it more easily inhaled, thus increasing its lethality and suggesting a high degree of scientific competence.

Inhaled anthrax can trigger a deadly infection by swelling body parts, flooding the lungs with fluid and igniting internal hemorrhaging.

The FBI has spent much of the ensuing five years in efforts to identify the laboratory where the anthrax — dubbed the Ames strain — originated. This is a challenging task because the Ames strain has been widely studied in research centers.

The FBI has enlisted the help of 29 government, commercial and university laboratories to develop a profile of the anthrax used in the attacks. They are looking for a microbial fingerprint based on the theory that different scientists use different production techniques to make anthrax spores, and these varied production techniques impart different chemical and physical signatures.

Transit-Worker ID Program Stalled (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu, Washington Post Staff Writer

Years of Trouble in National Effort Bodes Ill for High-Tech Licenses, Passports

A Bush administration initiative to secure the nation's ports is bogged down in industry opposition, technology flaws and evidence that it fails to safeguard workers' privacy, according to industry and government analysts.

The rocky launch of the Transportation Worker Identification Credential threatens to delay what Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff declared his highest priority after the Dubai port controversy in February: starting by year's end to screen the backgrounds of 750,000 U.S. workers at critical sea, air and land transportation facilities, and issuing them microchip-equipped ID cards.

More broadly, the long-overdue ID program foreshadows concerns that hundreds of millions of Americans soon may encounter as the government starts issuing similarly equipped driver's licenses, passports, federal-worker badges and immigrant-guest-worker cards in coming years.

"It's discouraging to see how really difficult it is to implement this sort of thing," said Doris Meissner, a former commissioner of the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service who tracks identification measures as a senior fellow at the Migration Policy Institute.

"And it's probably going to get more complicated before it gets simpler," she added.

The transportation credential, one of the first security measures initiated after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, was envisioned as a model for new, "smart" ID cards. But a familiar list of hurdles has tripped up the program, including poor administration, indifferent oversight by Congress, insufficient funding, technological glitches and resistance from the private sector, said industry and government officials.

President Bush signed the worker-ID program into law in November 2002 as part of broader maritime security legislation. It called for vetting workers at more than 300 ports and 3,700 cargo and passenger terminals using technology that incorporates fingerprints, iris scans or digital photographs.

The program would streamline checks of criminal-background files, terrorist watch lists and immigration status for truckers, stevedores, rail and airport terminal employees, and other transit workers, among others. The new "biometric" data would make it virtually impossible for anyone other than the cardholder to use the ID.

Department of Homeland Security officials initially told port operators that they expected to start issuing credit-card-size ID cards to transportation workers by the end of 2003.

Then the troubles began.

Management turnover and indecision delayed prototype testing until late 2004. Instead of the 200,000 cards planned for the pilot program, only 4,000 were issued, even as the cost rose from $12 million to $23 million.

Rep. Harold Rogers (R-Ky.), chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the department, insisted that the TSA adopt technology currently used for U.S. "green cards," which are produced in his district. The TSA paused to complete a study concluding that its alternative to the green-card technology was superior. Prototype card production was delayed again in 2005 so it could be moved to the Kentucky plant.

It took an election-year political furor over the attempt by a Dubai company to take over operations at six U.S. seaports to jump-start the project. Faced with a reminder of how little has been done to secure facilities from infiltration by potential terrorists, lawmakers called the administration's bungling of the transportation-worker IDs the Achilles' heel of the nation's port security.

But when Homeland Security officials rushed out long-delayed rules in May, labor and the nation's port operators, truckers, barge companies and tugboat companies revolted.

Industry groups and technology providers warned that complex systems for personal identification numbers and card reading could be prone to time-consuming breakdowns in saltwater environments on boats and docks. Marine executives said requiring new workers to wait as long as 60 days to clear security checks would cripple small and seasonal operators that already face worker shortages. Unions warned that without strict limits and an appeals process, workers could be denied jobs because of mistaken identity or past offenses unrelated to terrorism.

"It just doesn't make any sense given the real-world operations of the tugboat industry," said Thomas A. Allegretti, president of American Waterways Operators, which represents 500 tug and barge firms.

In July, the Homeland Security inspector general reported that hundreds of critical security vulnerabilities in proposed cards, card readers and other parts of the system posed unacceptable risks of the theft of sensitive data. Other problems include evolving federal technology standards and a projected cost to industry and workers of $2 billion to $3 billion.

Officials said these concerns are a preview of what could happen on a much larger scale with the broader government use of "smart" cards.

"You have to have a single way of identifying people as who they are that is authentic, that maintains their confidentiality and that is secure," said David Heyman, director of the homeland security program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Experts caution that Americans may not want to submit their fingerprints and eye and facial scans to the government. Privacy advocates want to know who will be in charge of keeping and discarding sensitive personal information, and how that data will be kept secure.

They are concerned about the types of government databases that would be linked to such ID records and who would see them. And even if there is consensus on the security needs, others are skeptical that the technology can be implemented without creating bottlenecks and backlogs.

"There's this idea that an ID card or ID credential is this kind of panacea," said Lee Tien, senior staff attorney for the Electronic Frontier Foundation. "But they are difficult to design and implement . . . and what we're seeing is every attempt to do so is fraught with serious, serious problems."

The questions are not hypothetical. By year's end, Homeland Security is expected to roll out national standards for driver's licenses, which would affect 200 million Americans when the rules take effect by May 2008. The change was mandated by the Real ID Act, which was enacted to make it more difficult for criminals and potential terrorists to obtain driver's licenses.

Last month, the State Department began small-scale production of the first microchip-equipped "e-passports" that over the next 11 years will replace all 60 million U.S.-issued passports and could be upgraded to include fingerprints or other biometric data.

Up to 4 million federal workers and contractors are to be next, receiving new IDs over two years starting in October. Then will come cards allowing tens of millions of residents of the United States, Canada, Mexico and many Caribbean nations to cross each other's borders without a passport. And the White House has proposed issuing similar tamper-proof biometric cards to 2 million guest workers under its contested immigration overhaul.

Analysts cite clear lessons from the transportation-worker ID program's struggles as warnings for programs such as Real ID, which they say will have to be delayed given its far greater size, cost and complexity.

As for the Transportation Worker Identification Credential program, Homeland Security announced last month that after missing a July deadline, it will postpone the installation of card readers. Critics say that for now the department has simply created a $150-per-worker photo ID. The Senate on Thursday passed port-security legislation that would force the department to ease requirements for certain short-term workers and issue rules for card readers by Dec. 31, start more test programs and report back in 2008.

"It's clear the department seems unable to complete the task and control access to our ports, which is a fundamental aspect of security," said Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate homeland security committee and co-sponsor of the bill.

Chertoff maintained that conducting background checks and issuing conventional ID cards are progress. "The fact that we may not have the full-blown perfect system doesn't mean we can't take a big step forward," he said earlier this month.

In a Sept. 8 speech, he went further, blaming the lack of progress on unnamed critics who object to tamper-resistant IDs as too burdensome or expensive, or say they amount to a national ID card.

"That kind of backsliding runs directly contrary to the lessons of 9/11," Chertoff said, noting that nearly all the Sept. 11 hijackers had obtained IDs, in some cases through fraud. He contended that a secure ID system would have prevented the attacks. "If we'd had it five years ago, there would not have been a 9/11," Chertoff said.

U.S. And State Plan To Occupy Freedom Tower (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

The federal and New York State governments have tentatively agreed to become anchor tenants in the Freedom Tower, the tallest, most symbolic and most scrutinized skyscraper project at ground zero, under a plan expected to be announced today by Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and the governors of New York and New Jersey.

The agreements, which would cover about 1 million of the 2.6 million square feet in the building, are a significant step forward in the development of the tower, which is seen by Gov. George E. Pataki and others as a symbol of the city's resilience, but regarded by some critics as folly.

The building has been bedeviled by squabbling and delays, as well as questions about design and security and whether there would be enough demand for office space downtown to keep it financially sound.

The Freedom Tower, which would rise to the emblematic height of 1,776 feet, including the antenna, is one of four office towers planned for the 16-acre site.

With the governor and the mayor eager to show progress five years after the terrorist attack on the trade center, the lease agreements would be the latest in a flurry of announcements, which included a tentative agreement in April to speed the reconstruction of the site and the creation in May of a $500 million plan for a memorial to the victims of the attack.

But significant questions remain about the lease agreements, including whether they would actually become signed contracts. The federal leases need Congressional approval, and the state leases would require approval by the governor, comptroller and attorney general.

The leading candidate to succeed Mr. Pataki, Eliot Spitzer, the Democratic attorney general, has questioned the economic viability of the tower, calling it a "white elephant." His campaign declined to comment on the agreements.

Officials sought to lure public agencies to the Freedom Tower when they failed to interest any private companies. Critics say one major concern is that the building will be a target for terrorists, but state officials have said that the tower, after a recent redesign at the behest of the police department, is safe.

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, and the Pataki administration have signed an outline of lease terms with the State Office of General Services on a 15-year lease for 415,000 square feet of space in the Freedom Tower. General Services is likely to move the State Labor Department, as well as the Insurance and Finance Departments, into the tower.

State officials said they expected to sign a formal lease in the coming months and have the option of taking as much as 1 million square feet in the future.

The federal General Services Administration has signed a memorandum of agreement to move the Customs and Border Protection agency, as well as other federal agencies, into more than 600,000 square feet.

The agencies have tentatively agreed to pay an initial annual rent of $59 per square foot, or about $59 million a year, at the building, which is scheduled to open in 2012.

"I was very confident from the beginning that it could work," Mr. Pataki said in an interview. "Now with this commitment of 1 million square feet of leases, it is clearly not just economically viable, but now it will be built and it will be occupied. We will have a new tower that sends a powerful message of restoration and resurgence."

Both Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey and Mayor Bloomberg issued statements hailing the agreements as a significant step toward restoring the World Trade Center site as a commercial hub in Lower Manhattan.

The tentative agreements reflect progress in Governor Pataki's nearly four-year effort to build the Freedom Tower. But final approval of the project by the Port Authority may be months away, which could put it in the hands of the next New York governor, who takes office in January.

When the Port Authority agreed in April to take over responsibility for building the $2.3 billion tower from the developer Larry A. Silverstein, it set several conditions. The authority, which leased the property to Mr. Silverstein, was seeking a viable financial plan, including signed leases for 1 million square feet in the Freedom Tower by the time its board meets on Thursday.

The authority expects to get $973 million in insurance proceeds from the destruction of the twin towers, as well as $250 million from the Pataki administration, but it wanted a cash flow from leases to pay its mortgage.

"We're pleased with the progress that's been made regarding the commitments by state and federal agencies at the Freedom Tower," said Anthony R. Coscia, chairman of the authority. "We're hopeful that we will be able to develop an acceptable plan of finance that will allow its construction to proceed uninterrupted and in a manner that's financially responsible to the Port Authority, the city and the region."

Mr. Coscia said it was unlikely that the Port Authority would grant final approval of the Freedom Tower project on Thursday, but he said it would probably go forward with the development of three office towers on the eastern side of the site, along Church Street. The Freedom Tower would sit at the northwest corner of the trade center site on West Street, south of Vesey Street. It has had a somewhat tortured history. The architect Daniel Libeskind's initial master plan for rebuilding the trade center site recommended building the memorial to the victims of Sept. 11 first, the Church Street towers second, and the tallest tower in the third phase. Mr. Silverstein, who had an obligation to rebuild the trade center complex, also argued that it made sense to start with the towers closest to the PATH station on Church Street.

But at a downtown breakfast meeting more than three years ago, Mr. Pataki named the tallest of the proposed buildings at ground zero the Freedom Tower. He said it would be built first and by 2008. That time goal has been abandoned, but the desire to build the skyscraper remains.

The design for the building was selected by Governor Pataki after he overruled a committee that had chosen a different architectural scheme. But then it had to be redrawn to accommodate the Police Department's security concerns, because the building would sit on West Street. The design now calls for a 186-foot-tall fortified concrete base sheathed in prismatic glass. Work on the foundation and footings has begun.

Urban planners, civic groups and some real estate executives have questioned the wisdom of building the Freedom Tower, which, they say, is too expensive, farther away from the transportation hub than the other towers, and is unlikely to attract corporate tenants, most of which regard the skyscraper as a potential target for terrorists. Indeed, the Port Authority declined to move into the building, saying it would be traumatic for its employees, who lost 84 coworkers in the Sept. 11 attacks.

Under the standard of 250 square feet per worker, the space under consideration could accommodate 4,000 government employees. Officials of the unions representing federal and state workers could not be reached for comment yesterday.

"It's going to be one of the most expensive buildings ever built in Manhattan," said the developer Douglas Durst, who owns a number of Midtown office buildings and is building a skyscraper on 42nd Street. "To saddle already overburdened taxpayers of New York with the rent necessary to pay for it makes no sense at all."

Critics say that current plans to build more than eight million square feet of office space at the trade center site recall the plans for the original complex, which depressed the downtown real estate market for years when the Port Authority built 10 million square feet of publicly-subsidized office space at one time.

With few tenant prospects, the Port Authority and the state were forced to fill much of the space with public agencies. It was not until the mid-1980's that the state began relocating to other buildings.

Some real estate executives said the government agencies will be paying a premium over the lower rents in older buildings downtown. But John Cahill, who oversees ground zero development for Governor Pataki, said that the Freedom Tower would have more-efficient floors that would allow for technological innovation and consolidation.

Although it is not a formal lease, Mr. Cahill said that Governor Pataki had gotten a "firm commitment from the White House" that the Customs Service would return to the trade center site. He added that the agreement with the federal General Services Administration and the state agencies should "enhance the attractiveness" of the Freedom Tower to corporate tenants.

There may also be a financial incentive, since about $345 million in insurance proceeds from the destruction of the old Customs building can be used to build its space in the Freedom Tower. State officials said they did not think that the money could be transferred elsewhere.

Lurita Doan, administrator of the General Services Administration, said in a statement that "the return of the federal government to Lower Manhattan and their presence in the Freedom Tower is more than symbolic; it is a commitment to the building of a memorial that captures the American spirit."

Governor Pataki said that all the signature elements of the trade center master plan are now in place, from the $2.2 billion PATH train station to the memorial, the office buildings and the Freedom Tower.

Some officials involved in rebuilding say that the final decision may go to the next governor. "We're six to months away from the point that we're full steam ahead," said a senior executive, who requested anonymity because he did not want a public spat with Governor Pataki.

The governor said he was confident that nothing could stop construction of the Freedom Tower.

"The commitments we're making now will apply into the future," he said. "I'm very confident that the brilliance of the plan and the momentum with actual construction will continue regardless of who the next governor is."

Under the April agreement, between New York State, New York City, New Jersey and Mr. Silverstein, the Port Authority took responsibility for the Freedom Tower, which, officials said, Mr. Silverstein was reluctant to build without any anchor tenants. The developer, in turn, retained the right to build three towers along Church Street.

But he was put on a strict schedule requiring him to complete the buildings by 2012.

State and Port Authority executives have been working round the clock in recent weeks with Mr. Silverstein to complete the agreement struck in April. Both sides say they have made considerable progress in narrowing their differences.

Renewal Money For New Orleans Bypasses Renters (NYT)

By Susan Saulny And Gary Rivlin

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — As billions in housing aid begins to flow here in the next few weeks, most of it will go to homeowners, who have been appointed by city officials as the true architects of this city's recovery, despite the fact that roughly half the city's residents rented housing before Hurricane Katrina.

The renters of New Orleans, it seems, are on their own.

Rents are skyrocketing across the city, up an average of 39 percent since Hurricane Katrina. The city has announced that it plans to refurbish only a small fraction of its traditional public housing units. Some neighborhoods are campaigning to tear down sturdy apartment buildings and build parks in their place. Though some aid has been set aside for landlords, many lower-income residents who say they are unable to return have been priced out.

"I want to come back, but who's going to help me build my life?" asked Lionel Smith, 46, a longtime resident of the Lower Ninth Ward and a driving school instructor whose apartment building was destroyed by the floodwaters. "There's this plan in place to take care of homeowners, but I've heard nothing about helping renters. Where are we supposed to live? Will they help rebuild apartment buildings?"

From a renter's point of view, New Orleans has become off-limits to all but prosperous tenants, as rents have increased significantly in the pockets of the city that did not flood. Before the storm, the fair market rent for a two-bedroom unit in the city was $676; it is now $940, according to the Brookings Institution.

Before the hurricane, it would not have been unusual to find a two-story, three-bedroom house in Gentilly, a solidly middle-class neighborhood, renting for less than $1,000 a month. Today, that area, north of downtown toward Lake Pontchartrain, does not exist as a functioning neighborhood.

By contrast these days, $1,000 might get a tenant half a refurbished duplex on a trash-strewn street in Mid-City — an area that also flooded, but not to the same extent — and it would most likely be offered without major appliances or air-conditioning.

Henry Jones, a New Orleans East homeowner, said that roughly half the owners in his subdivision, Wimbledon, were coming back, which he contrasted with the lack of activity he has observed in neighborhoods like Central City and Mid-City, where there are far more rental units than single-family homes.

"You drive around those neighborhoods and you pretty much see nothing going on," Mr. Jones said. "It's depressing."

Those communities that were home to the greatest concentration of rental properties are also those areas that still lie in ruins 12 months after the storm. The longer properties languish, rotting in the humid heat, the harder they are to restore to habitable conditions. With no concrete plan in place to help landlords, a large part of the rental stock has been festering for a year now, preventing residents from returning and depleting the work force.

"I'll confess to being frustrated," said Norman C. Francis, the chairman of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, the agency distributing federal aid, and the president of Xavier University here. "Most of the people who need to come back aren't homeowners at this point but renters."

State officials acknowledged that renters were not their first priority.

"We wanted to get the homeowner assistance plan off and running, because it affects more people," said Walter Leger, the chairman of the authority's housing committee.

The lack of affordable rental housing is yet another factor making it more difficult for low-income residents to return. The city has also lost its extensive health care system for the poor; its school system is only partially functioning; and there is little public transportation.

In some areas, in fact, homeowners are trying to use the recovery process to rid their neighborhoods of long-standing apartment buildings that were damaged during the storm. Building parks in the place of apartments that neighbors said lowered property values is "killing two birds with one stone," said Joseph St. Martin, an architect hired by homeowner groups in New Orleans East to work on the community development plan the city has asked every neighborhood to devise.

Unlike some other urban areas, New Orleans's rental market was dominated by small-scale local landlords before the storm. Many say they lack the resources needed to resuscitate their properties, especially when so many of them are struggling to repair their own homes.

The Louisiana Recovery Authority has set aside $859 million to help landlords (compared with $7.5 billion that has been set aside for homeowners). The goal, officials said, is to start distributing that money in the next month or so, but they acknowledge they are still working out the details of the plan.

Officials estimate that at least 30,000 units will be improved through this program, which is expected to offer no-interest 10-year mortgages of up to $75,000 a unit to landlords who agree to rent at or below the market rate. No direct subsidies to tenants are being planned.

State officials said they would offer a combination of low-income housing tax credits and financial grants to entice larger developers to build mixed-income rental properties. In New Orleans, most large-scale developments — those with more than 200 apartments — were in the eastern part of the city. Nearly all those developments are still damaged and vacant; some are for sale, while others have been torn down.

"The impact on the renters is that the cost of renting has increased," Mr. Leger said. "So our theory is if we can bring the cost of renting back down, we can put people back in the position they were in prestorm."

Critics of the proposed plan say 30,000 units is not nearly enough to make a big difference in New Orleans. The Brookings Institution estimates that more than 48,000 rental units were destroyed or heavily damaged in the flood, or about 40 percent of the original stock of apartments and rental houses.

William Quigley, director of the Gillis Long Poverty Law Center at Loyola University here, said the number could even be higher, and that many of the units were occupied by low- and middle-income families.

"The state has misleadingly named its programs as 'The Road Home Housing Programs' despite the fact that the planned expenditures will not provide a realistic road home for most of the people with low and moderate incomes," Dr. Quigley wrote recently in a complaint to federal housing officials.

A lack of information even 12 months after the hurricane has caused confusion and frustration.

"There is no real identifiable plan that anyone can point to that would enable people to say, 'I can rely on this,' " said Jerome Anderson, an assistant dean at Tulane Law School who owns five units around the city. The storm destroyed Mr. Anderson's home and all his rental properties, putting tremendous financial pressure on his resources to rebuild. His situation is typical among local landlords.

Mr. Anderson said he was constantly hearing from prospective tenants wanting to know when he might have apartments available for rent. "Anyone who owns property is probably being bombarded with questions as to when will their properties be available for rental," he said. "There's a lot of vacant property that's not available, and that is affecting the recovery, in that people don't have places to live."

Ted Quant, director of the Twomey Center for Peace Through Justice at Loyola University, owned a home in Gentilly and two rental units in New Orleans East. He is part of a new group, the African American Landlords Association, made up primarily of property owners who lost both a home and rental units. This loosely knit group is pushing for both information and assistance.

"It seems that the people who were here and didn't flood are saying to the people who flooded, 'We don't need you, stay out of town,' " Mr. Quant said. "My tenants came back and recovered what wasn't looted. They were asking when they could come back for good. I had to tell them I didn't know."

Gov.: New Orleans Crime Calls For Military Presence (AP)

AP, September 17, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Louisiana (AP) -- National Guard troops and state police will patrol the city through December, Gov. Kathleen Blanco said Saturday at a summit of law enforcement officials and crime experts called to address a spate of killings marring the recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

"Crime has no role in recovery," Blanco said. "It limits our ability to recover."

Police are on pace to recover as many illegal firearms this year as they did in the two previous years -- even though half as many people live in the city now, said Robert Browning, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

But in a positive sign, court and prison repairs should be done next month, an official said, which means the city's crippled criminal justice system will be able to process its influx of suspects more efficiently.

The summit opened hours after an early morning killing brought the city's homicide count for the year to 100.

New Orleans, with a pre-Katrina population of 455,000, had virtually no crime in the months after the storm hit on August 29, 2005, when the city was largely empty.

That changed as the evacuees started returning. In April murders began occurring regularly, sometimes in groups. The current population is uncertain, though various estimates put it at 200,000 to 250,000.

Guard members and state police were sent to New Orleans shortly after what police called one of the city's worst acts of violence in 10 years: the fatal shooting of five teenagers in mid-June.

Over Labor Day weekend, four people died in 13 shootings in the New Orleans area.

The Guard members and state troopers have helped bolster a police department whose membership fell after the storm by more than 200 to about 1,420. Blanco said the cost to the state will be about $14 million.

On Saturday, the governor called the use of troops and state police a stopgap measure to help safeguard the city while other means to deal with crime are developed.

The summit shows the city will no longer tolerate crime, Mayor Ray Nagin said.

"Any crime committed with a gun should be charged at the highest possible count, attempted murder at a minimum," Nagin said. "And all those crimes must be expedited, put to the front of the line and prosecuted."

The city also needs to crack down on illegal firearms, Browning said. In 2004 and 2005, police recovered about 1,800 illegal firearms per year, he said.

"So far they this year they have recovered 1,300," Browning said. "Which is on track to remove the same number with half the population."

Also Saturday, former state Attorney General Richard leyoub, head of a commission Nagin set up to examine criminal justice, said renovations of the criminal court and parish prison should be completed next month.

Twelve criminal court judges are sharing seven courtrooms, and so only seven can hear cases at any time. Each can handle no more than six cases a day because the sheriff's department can't transport and provide security for more.

"Once we have the building back, all of us can hold court every day," Judge Calvin Johnson said.

WAR NEWS:

Called From Diplomatic Reserve (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Former Secretary of State Leads Attempt to Salvage Iraq Mission

Is Jim Baker bailing out the Bushes once again?

The former secretary of state, James A. Baker III, a confidant of President George H.W. Bush, visited Baghdad two weeks ago to take a look at the vexing political and military situation. He was there as co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, put together by top think tanks at the behest of Congress to come up with ideas about the way forward in Iraq.

The group has attracted little attention beyond foreign policy elites since its formation this year. But it is widely viewed within that small world as perhaps the last hope for a midcourse correction in a venture they generally agree has been a disaster.

The reason, by and large, is the involvement of Baker, 76, the legendary troubleshooter who remains close to the first President Bush and cordial with the second. Many policy experts think that if anyone can forge bipartisan consensus on a plan for extricating the United States from Iraq -- and then successfully pitch that plan to a president who has so far seemed impervious to outside pressure -- it is the man who put together the first Gulf War coalition, which evicted Saddam Hussein from Kuwait in 1991.

Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), who came up with the idea for the study group and pushed for its formation, said he thinks the administration is "waiting anxiously" for the group's recommendations. He cited the "impeccable credentials" of the 10-member group, which also includes former Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, investment banker and Bill Clinton adviser Vernon E. Jordan Jr., and former White House chief of staff Leon E. Panetta. The other co-chairman is the Democratic former Indiana congressman Lee H. Hamilton, who also co-chaired the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"Their recommendations will carry a lot of weight," said Wolf. "If they come up with a unanimous opinion, the administration, Congress and the American people will have to listen."

Baker is not revealing much of his hand. He has indicated that recommendations will not be forthcoming until after the November elections, in an effort to keep the group above the political fray. He has also asked those involved in the study group -- members and staffers alike -- not to talk to the media, so most of those interviewed for this article spoke only on the condition of anonymity. Baker's assistant said the co-chairman would not be available to be interviewed.

Baker has offered some hints of his thinking -- and his dismay with the way the Iraq occupation has been handled by the administration.

"The difficulty of winning the peace was severely underestimated," Baker wrote in a recent memoir, citing "costly mistakes" by the Pentagon. These included, he wrote, disbanding the Iraqi army, not securing weapons depots and "perhaps never having committed enough troops to successfully pacify the country."

But in an interview in the current issue of Texas Monthly, Baker dashed the idea of "just picking up and pulling out" of Iraq. "Even though it's something we need to find a way out of, the worst thing in the world we could do would be to pick up our marbles and go home," he said, "because then we will trigger, without a doubt, a huge civil war. And every one of the regional actors -- the Iranians and everybody else -- will come in and do their thing."

The study group appears to be struggling to find some middle ground between such a pullout and the administration's strategy of keeping a heavy American troop presence until the Iraqi government can maintain security on its own.

"If this war is consumed by partisan attacks, if the choice is presented as simply one between 'stay the course' or 'cut and run,' we will never be able to do what is right," panel member Panetta wrote following the group's trip to Iraq in an article for his hometown paper, the Monterey County Herald in California.

Baker and panel members have been exploring different ideas, such as a greater degree of regional autonomy for Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite regions. But those familiar with the group's work said there is far from a consensus yet on what to do. One well-placed source said panel members came away from their trip sobered, with "a sense that we can't continue to do what we have been doing," adding that Baker was not simply looking to protect the administration.

"I think he basically wants to call it the way he sees it," said this source, a critic of the administration's approach to Iraq. "He's also been frustrated by the mistakes that have been made. In many ways, it has damaged the legacy he established as secretary of state."

Some are skeptical that the president will be open to advice seeming to come from one of his father's top advisers. In some ways, Bush has distanced himself from the people and policies of the first Bush administration -- though Baker has been called on occasion to perform sensitive missions, such as heading the Bush campaign's efforts in the 2000 Florida recount and leading negotiations to provide debt relief to Iraq.

The administration's more hawkish supporters, meanwhile, are nervous about Baker's involvement, counting him as one of the "realist" foreign policy proponents they see as having allowed threats against the United States to grow in the '80s and '90s. Gary J. Schmitt of the American Enterprise Institute voiced concern that the Iraq group was not listening to those advocating a more muscular military strategy to defeat the insurgency.

But Schmitt added: "People can worry about what Baker is going to say, but the president has a way of doing what he is going to do. There could be a lot of wishful thinking on the part of the older Bush crowd that the son got into trouble and now he's going to listen to Baker the strategist."

Publicly, the administration is supportive, though inside the foreign policy apparatus there appears to be skepticism that the Iraq Study Group will come up with any breakthroughs. At first, the administration was divided about whether to cooperate with the panel. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gave her support only after being assured by officials with the federally funded U.S. Institute of Peace, under whose aegis the group was formed, and other think tanks involved in the project that the venture would be a forward-looking exercise and not an examination of past mistakes, according to people familiar with the project.

Baker himself secured the personal approval of President Bush before signing on. "As I always do," Baker told Texas Monthly, "I said . . . I want him to look me in the eye and tell me he wants me to do this."

The 'Sunk-cost Fallacy' (LAT)

By Barry Schwartz, Barry Schwartz Is A Professor Of Psychology At Swarthmore College And The Author Of "The Paradox Of

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

There are reasons to stay in Iraq. But doing so because we 'owe' it to the dead isn't one of them.

YOU'VE PAID $10 to get into the movie and it just plain stinks. The plot is ridiculous, the acting is terrible, the violence is excessive. But you've already watched half of it. Do you sit through the movie to the end or do you leave?

Just a month ago, you spent $2,000 getting your 10-year-old car's transmission rebuilt. Now you find out the car is leaking oil and needs a ring job. Do you spend the next thousand or buy a new car?

You've been living with your romantic partner for 10 years. The relationship has had its ups and downs, and both of you have invested a lot in keeping it going. But every day it seems to involve more work and less joy. Is it time to move on?

You work for a private equity firm and personally persuaded your skeptical partners to invest $2 million in a high-tech start-up. Now the chief executive comes to see you with the news that they've hit some snags in developing their product, and they'll need at least another million to bring it to market. Do you write the check?

We've all encountered situations like these. We make a significant investment — of money, time or emotion — in some project, relationship or business deal, and it doesn't seem to be working out. Do we continue to "throw good money after bad" or do we "cut and run" and "stop wasting time"? What's the right way to think about such decisions?

Psychologists, decision scientists and economists have an answer. They tell us that it's a mistake to continue with a project or an activity because of what you have already invested in it. The time or money you've already spent is gone. You can't reclaim it. Using a past investment to justify a future investment is what they call the "sunk-cost fallacy."

Instead of thinking about the past, what we should be doing is thinking about the future. "Will my life be better if I leave this terrible movie or if I stay to the bitter end?" "Will my car give me 20,000 more trouble-free miles if I just do this one last repair?" None of these questions have sure answers. Life is full of uncertainty. But what we can say is that if the reason for "staying the course" is past commitment — sunk costs — we need to find a better one.

"Cut and run." "Stay the course." Where have we heard these phrases lately? Oh, yes, we've heard them trotted out in defense of continued U.S. involvement in Iraq as death, injury and insurgency mount. President Bush has offered several reasons for staying the course. And one of them is the more than 2,600 Americans who have already died in Iraq.

"I'm going to make you this promise," the president said at Ft. Bragg, N.C., on July 4. "I'm not going to allow the sacrifice of 2,527 troops who have died in Iraq to be in vain by pulling out before the job is done." And Bush has not cornered the market on this kind of reasoning. Bill Clinton said it too, more than a year ago. Asked about Iraq, he said that "we've all got a stake in its succeeding." Why? "We've got over 600 dead Americans since the conflict was ended."

We heard this argument often enough in the 1960s. As casualties mounted in Vietnam, it became more difficult to withdraw because withdrawal would have "cheapened" the lives of those already sacrificed. We "owed" it to the dead and wounded to "stay the course." What staying the course produced was thousands more dead and wounded. "Knee deep in the big muddy" is how folk singer Pete Seeger described it. The question should never have been, "What have we invested so far?" but "What are our objectives for the future and can we attain them at a reasonable cost?"

The sunk-cost fallacy took many lives in Vietnam. Whether Iraq is or is not another quagmire I leave to others, and to history, to determine. But there is one respect in which we must not allow Iraq to become another Vietnam: Continued involvement must not be justified by appealing to the imperative not to allow the dead to have "died in vain."

HOW SHOULD WE honor the sacrifices of those who have died or suffered serious injury in a U.S. military conflict? The best way to show how much we respect and value their lives is by not risking other lives unless future prospects for success fully justify putting more people in harm's way. Therefore, our standards for putting more people at risk should, if anything, become more rigorous, not less, as casualties mount.

To change course under such circumstances need not be an admission of foolishness — even if enemies do accuse the decision-maker of "flip-flopping." One can think through a problem in a logical and rigorous way, and formulate a sensible course of action, only to discover that it doesn't work out. Good decisions do not guarantee good results (just as bad decisions don't guarantee bad ones).

Yet people seem willing to waste even more (time, money or lives) to justify what they have already spent and avoid that sick feeling of failure. Think about it. You haven't really lost money on a stock whose share price keeps plummeting until after you sell it. So you keep holding on, in the hope that your judgment as an investor will eventually be vindicated. And troops haven't really "died in vain" as long as you continue to press on in the fight, no matter how disastrous the results.

I am not arguing that we should "declare victory and leave" Iraq. Nor am I suggesting that the only justification being offered for continued U.S. involvement in Iraq is the "sunk cost" in American lives. I am not saying that obligations from the past should never enter into one's consideration about the future. And I certainly don't propose that we should think about death and injury, war and peace in exactly the same way we think about car transmissions and investments in start-ups.

My suggestion here is more modest. You may attempt to justify the continued Iraq occupation in many ways, as the Bush administration has. Perhaps you think it will prevent further terror, democratize the Middle East or restrain Iran. Perhaps you think that leaving Iraq before "the job is done" will undermine the world's confidence in U.S. promises to other nations.

But it is unacceptable to justify continued involvement in Iraq or any other conflict on the grounds that we "owe" it to those who have already fallen. That is a justification that has strong emotional appeal, but it is fallacious, and no one should be allowed to get away with it.

Whatever the differences between Iraq in 2006 and Vietnam in 1968, if we allow policymakers to use our "sunk costs" — our dead military — to justify further conflict, we will have turned Iraq into another Vietnam. And if we do, we will be shamed by Iraq just as we were shamed by Vietnam.

Get Real, George (NYDN)

By Andrew Krepinevich

New York Daily News, September 17, 2006

On the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, President Bush warned the nation that the Iraq war is being fought for the highest of stakes. He characterized the conflict as "a struggle for civilization," and warned that "the safety of America depends upon the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

Given the President's stark words, you would think we're pulling out every stop and marshaling every available resource to win. And you'd be wrong. The sad but simple truth: In many ways this war is still being fought with a "business as usual" approach, and that's hurting our chances of victory.

For example, it is stunning that three-plus years into this war — a war that requires a high level of coordination between security, intelligence and reconstruction operations, and their integration with political negotiations between Iraq's competing factions — we still do not have any single individual in overall control of the war effort. Neither Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad nor Gen. George Casey, our senior political and military leaders in Baghdad, is in charge.

This is a striking violation of one of the most basic principles of war: unity of command. Apparently neither the State nor Defense departments wants to yield bureaucratic turf, and President Bush doesn't feel inclined to force them.

The same holds back in Washington, where the President has yet to establish a "war cabinet" that meets to oversee the war's conduct on a daily basis. The lessons of history are clear on this. If you want to win a war, you must be prepared to adapt more quickly than the enemy to changes in the conflict's dynamics — from the top on down.

Take another example. In a championship football game, would you constantly rotate your star players in and out of the game? Of course not. But that's exactly what the administration has done with its best generals. Three years into the war, where are generals like David Petraeus, David Barno and Peter Chiarelli — all of whom earned reputations for their skill in Afghanistan or Iraq? Petraeus was ordered back to Fort Leavenworth in Kansas. Barno has inexplicably been retired, while Chiarelli — who is leading the do-or-die fight in Baghdad — is scheduled to be replaced in December.

Can anyone imagine pulling Gen. George Patton from command halfway through his campaign in France during World War II? Bush has repeatedly said that as Iraqi Security Forces stand up, our forces can begin to withdraw. But doing that hinges on successfully embedding American officers and sergeants into the new Iraqi battalions. These advisers provide the stiff backbone the Iraqi forces need to accelerate their development. The quicker they become proficient, the sooner we can reduce our troop levels.v But we have only about a dozen advisers in Iraqi battalions, when three times as many are required. As one senior Army officer recently told me, "I think the Army would rather lose this war than change its personnel system."

Finally, we have the homefront effort — or, I should say, the lack of one. Not long ago, an Army officer remarked that "The United States is not at war. The Army is at war. The United States is at the mall."

Indeed, given the stakes involved, it remains shocking that the administration has asked nothing of the American people. No tax surcharge to pay for the war. Not even a war bond drive — or a call to conserve energy.

Fixing the problems of unity of command, of playing merry-go-round with generals, of taking a pickup team approach to the adviser effort and of refusing to demand some sacrifices here at home may not guarantee success, but the administration's failures on all fronts are a down payment on failure.

I believe Bush when he says the United States "is being tested in a way that we have not been since the start of the Cold War." But the President seems to be having a hard time convincing himself.

Training Iraqi Troops A Logistical Feat (AP-Y)

By Rebecca Santana, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Iraq has one of the world's largest oil reserves, but the Iraqi army can't get enough fuel for its tanks. It also can't get spare parts for its trucks or supply ammunition on its own.

While the U.S. training program has made great progress teaching Iraqi soldiers how to fight, the force still relies on American help for distributing supplies — a dependency that is another obstacle to sending U.S. troops home.

"Just because you stand up all the fighters, all the combat arms organizations, they're not self-sustaining until they have some form of a logistics system," said Brig. Gen. Rebecca Halstead, commander of the 3rd Corps Support Command. "It's not there yet."

As U.S. commanders worked the past three years to build Iraqi security forces, priority went to forming combat units capable of fighting Sunni Arab insurgents.

The task of maintaining those troops was left to U.S.-led coalition forces — who got Iraqis to their missions, gave them ammunition, fed them and, in many cases, even gave them their pay.

Even in areas where Iraqis have taken over security duties, they need help getting supplies from central and regional storage facilities. In volatile Anbar province, a hot bed of insurgents, it has been especially challenging for the Iraqis to keep troops supplied with food and water.

So there is now an emphasis on building an effective Iraqi logistics operation.

Of the roughly 120,000 Iraqi soldiers, about 10 percent to 15 percent are involved in supply-related activities, said Maj. Gerald Ostlund, a coalition spokesman.

By contrast, for every combat soldier in American and other foreign contingents, there are three performing support or logistics roles, U.S. officials say.

The Iraqi military won't need quite the same ratio since they have a local economy to rely on for food, housing, equipment and repairs, unlike the Americans who need to import just about everything, said Michael O'Hanlon of the Brookings Institution, a Washington D.C. think tank.

Brig. Gen. Terry Wolff, commander of the Coalition Military Assistance and Training Team that is helping Iraqis build their army, said Iraq also won't need the resources for moving troops around the world.

But many Iraqi logistical units are still understaffed, Wolff said.

For example, here at the Taji National Depot, a clearinghouse for supplies going to units across Iraq, the goal is to have about 1,200 Iraqi soldiers working at the post 12 miles north of Baghdad, but there are only about 300 now.

The American military's logistics system uses high-tech tracking devices such as radio monitors that allow items to be followed from when they leave storage in the U.S. until they arrive in Iraq.

The Iraqis use a low-tech system. Some is computerized. But records are mostly kept on paper, which means supplies can easily be lost or stolen before they get to the units that need them.

It's a system ripe for corruption, said John Pike, director of Globalsecurity.org, a research group in Washington.

"The prevailing community standard is steal everything that isn't nailed down. And when you find something that is nailed down, to go to find a crowbar," Pike said.

In one particularly egregious incident, Iraqi officials last year found that widespread fraud and corruption under former Defense Minister Hazem Shalaan led to the disappearance of $1 billion, almost the entire budget to buy new equipment.

Col. Kenneth Kirkpatrick, who advises Iraqi supply officers at Taji, said making sure everything in the depot is accounted for is a key goal.

"I think it has been a problem," he said. "Early on, things were moving through here so fast that they were just coming in on the trucks and moving out as fast as they could. Sometimes the boxes just weren't sealed properly or containers weren't locked, and that opened it up to pilferage along the route."

The depot's Iraqi deputy commander, who did not want his name used out of fear insurgents would kill him for working with the Americans, said shipping containers sometimes arrive without his staff having any idea what is in them before they are opened.

Kirkpatrick said that is mostly the case with supplies donated by other countries.

Iraqi commanders and troops in the field complain that Iraqi officials in Baghdad fail to get them essentials like fuel and spare parts for vehicles.

Lt. Col. Hassan Falah, with the highway police, likened the situation to carrying a block of ice from Baghdad to distant provinces — by the time it arrives, most of it has melted away. Falah said only four of his 20 vehicles were working due to lack of parts.

Adding to the supply problem, many Iraqi soldiers and police operate with an eclectic assortment of purchased and donated vehicles that run on various types of fuel and need different spare parts.

Then there are the fuel shortages.

An American soldier helping train the Iraqi border patrol said that when his unit pulls into a town or Iraqi base, Iraqi troops try to siphon off fuel from the U.S. Humvees because they are so low on supplies.

Wolff said the defense forces aren't allocated enough fuel from the Iraqi government. "Where do they sit on the pecking order? We believe that they're on the bottom third," he said.

In the past, when Iraqi units needed fuel, they turned to the Americans. But U.S. commanders say they have begun withholding supplies in an effort to force Iraqis to look to their own supply chains.

"For a while we really spiked where we were giving them, I would say, a majority of their fuel," said Halstead, the 3rd Corps Support Command chief. "If I keep giving you something, you'll just keep taking it."

As for maintenance of Iraqi military vehicles, the work is now being done by private contractors hired by the Ministry of Defense. But that contract expires in March, and the Iraqi army needs to decide whether to renew it or do the work itself, Wolff said.

Despite the problems, U.S. officers say they are making progress in getting Iraqis to take over more of their supply operations.

Lt. Col. William Schiek, who supervised training of the Iraqi army's 6th Motorized Transportation Regiment, said the unit has been planning, coordinating and executing its own missions for months with little direct U.S. involvement.

"They're doing 100 percent of the heavy lifting," Schiek said. "This is not a U.S. show by any means."

Yes, More Troops Would Help, A Bit (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON

IN the lawless villages and empty deserts of Anbar Province, the Sunni heartland that provides safe haven for indigenous insurgents and foreign terrorists, what could an American commander do if more troops showed up?

This tantalizing "what if?" is being debated with renewed intensity after it was revealed last week that a Marine Corps intelligence assessment said Anbar's dire security situation could be improved only by injecting more economic aid and a division's worth of troops to reinforce the current 30,000-strong coalition contingent.

In a way, the argument over more troops in Anbar plays out along lines familiar from the early stages of the Iraq war, when Congress and the Pentagon's civilian leaders traded words over whether enough troops were committed to the invasion and its aftermath.

But given the current debate, the question becomes how would more troops help in Anbar? And for how long?

The answer is, they would help, in the short term. But many military analysts also warn that sending in another division — anywhere from 12,00 to 15,000 troops — could create more problems. An extra division could flood the zone in Anbar, a province the size of Louisiana stretching from the west of Baghdad to the Syrian border.

Currently, the American military is continuing its "clear, hold and build" policy: pushing insurgents from key towns, sending in Iraqi and coalition forces to maintain security and trying to rebuild local governments and businesses. Despite the return of some insurgents, the military points to successes in cities like Falluja. But troops can't begin to secure other important towns like Ramadi, Haditha and Hit.

Adding soldiers could both accelerate efforts to eradicate insurgents and terrorists, as well as help stanch the flow of foreign fighters and cash that support the homegrown insurgency across Iraq.

The addition of troops, military experts said, could increase the number of border posts along the lengthy frontier with Syria. Extra cavalry in Humvees or light-armored vehicles could mount more raids along the historical smuggling routes — the military calls them "ratlines" — that are not being choked off today.

Anthony H. Cordesman, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, whose assessments of security in Iraq have become required reading in Washington, said he thought the military was at least a full division short of troop levels required across Iraq. Yet even with more troops, he said, the empty swaths of desert would not be worth securing, even though insurgents are free to maneuver there.

"But more troops could help in specific cities," Mr. Cordesman said. He suggested focusing on the towns and cities along the river west of Baghdad, as well as the roads from Falluja toward Syria. "You want the main cities along the road system between Syria and Baghdad," he said.

Military experts said that extra troops could also assist in the nation-building part of the mission. An influx of combat engineers could more rapidly repair and rebuild power grids, sanitation and water systems. Military engineers could train and guide Iraqis in those jobs, which would add the benefit of employing young, disaffected Sunnis.

And a larger deployment of civil affairs officers — many drawn from the reserves who work as lawyers, city managers or teachers back in the civilian world — could add spine and muscle to efforts to establish democratic city councils, to open schools and to restart businesses. Extra officers and sergeants could also accelerate the training of Iraqi security forces.

But all those arguments for more troops founder on a tyrannical fact. Many more troops are not available. Iraqi forces are generating slowly. Foreign partners don't seem eager to add troops. And because of the new military operation to secure Baghdad, American forces have actually been pulled from Anbar, although not from the critical cities.

There's also the matter of whether more troops help in the long term. Many senior officers and military analysts argue that more soldiers conducting more combat missions would only add to a sense among many Iraqis that the United States is a clumsy and violent occupying power.

"I'll state emphatically that our job is to win in Al Anbar," said Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the second-ranking commander in Iraq. "But it is not the kind of fight that is going to be won by military kinetic action alone. It's a combination across all the lines of operations."

General Chiarelli, the commander of day-to-day military operations in Iraq, is one of the Army's leading advocates of using a broad spectrum of military and government-wide capabilities to solve Iraq's security problems.

In a 2005 article in Military Review, an official Army journal, he described how "kinetic action" — combat operations — must be combined with other "lines of operation," which include training Iraqi security forces, establishing democratic government, improving municipal services and building the economy.

The senior Marine commander in Anbar, Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, said that more troops may help, but only so much.

"I think the introduction of further U.S. forces out here will certainly give short-term affect," General Zilmer said. "But at the end of the day, I don't believe it's going to be the significant change that is necessary to achieve long-term security and stability out here in Anbar. That, we still believe, has got to be an Iraqi solution to that piece."

The Longer The War, The Larger The Lies (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

RARELY has a television network presented a more perfectly matched double feature. President Bush's 9/11 address on Monday night interrupted ABC's "Path to 9/11" so seamlessly that a single network disclaimer served them both: "For dramatic and narrative purposes, the movie contains fictionalized scenes, composite and representative characters and dialogue, as well as time compression."

No kidding: "The Path to 9/11" was false from the opening scene, when it put Mohamed Atta both in the wrong airport (Boston instead of Portland, Me.) and on the wrong airline (American instead of USAirways). It took Mr. Bush but a few paragraphs to warm up to his first fictionalization for dramatic purposes: his renewed pledge that "we would not distinguish between the terrorists and those who harbor or support them." Only days earlier the White House sat idly by while our ally Pakistan surrendered to Islamic militants in its northwest frontier, signing a "truce" and releasing Al Qaeda prisoners. Not only will Pakistan continue to harbor terrorists, Osama bin Laden probably among them, but it will do so without a peep from Mr. Bush.

You'd think that after having been caught concocting the scenario that took the nation to war in Iraq, the White House would mind the facts now. But this administration understands our culture all too well. This is a country where a cable news network (MSNBC) offers in-depth journalism about one of its anchors (Tucker Carlson) losing a prime-time dance contest and where conspiracy nuts have created a cottage industry of books and DVD's by arguing that hijacked jets did not cause 9/11 and that the 9/11 commission was a cover-up. (The fictionalized "Path to 9/11," supposedly based on the commission's report, only advanced the nuts' case.) If you're a White House stuck in a quagmire in an election year, what's the percentage in starting to tell the truth now? It's better to game the system.

The untruths are flying so fast that untangling them can be a full-time job. Maybe that's why I am beginning to find Dick Cheney almost refreshing. As we saw on "Meet the Press" last Sunday, these days he helpfully signals when he's about to lie. One dead giveaway is the word context, as in "the context in which I made that statement last year." The vice president invoked

"context" to try to explain away both his bogus predictions: that Americans would be greeted as liberators in Iraq and that the insurgency (some 15 months ago) was in its "last throes."

The other instant tip-off to a Cheney lie is any variation on the phrase "I haven't read the story." He told Tim Russert he hadn't read The Washington Post's front-page report that the bin Laden trail had gone "stone cold" or the new Senate Intelligence Committee report(PDF) contradicting the White House's prewar hype about nonexistent links between Al Qaeda and Saddam. Nor had he read a Times front-page article about his declining clout. Or the finding by Mohamed ElBaradei of the International Atomic Energy Agency just before the war that there was "no evidence of resumed nuclear activities" in Iraq. "I haven't looked at it; I'd have to go back and look at it again," he said, however nonsensically.

These verbal tics are so consistent that they amount to truth in packaging — albeit the packaging of evasions and falsehoods. By contrast, Condi Rice's fictions, also offered in bulk to television viewers to memorialize 9/11, are as knotty as a David Lynch screenplay. Asked by Chris Wallace of Fox News last Sunday if she and the president had ignored prewar "intelligence that contradicted your case," she refused to give up the ghost: "We know that Zarqawi was running a poisons network in Iraq," she insisted, as she continued to state again that "there were ties between Iraq and Al Qaeda" before the war.

Ms. Rice may be a terrific amateur concert pianist, but she's an even better amateur actress. The Senate Intelligence Committee report released only two days before she spoke dismissed all such ties. Saddam, who "issued a general order that Iraq should not deal with Al Qaeda," saw both bin Laden and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi as threats and tried to hunt down Zarqawi when he passed through Baghdad in 2002. As for that Zarqawi "poisons network," the Pentagon knew where it was and wanted to attack it in June 2002. But as Jim Miklaszewski of NBC News reported more than two years ago, the White House said no, fearing a successful strike against Zarqawi might "undercut its case for going to war against Saddam." Zarqawi, meanwhile, escaped.

It was in an interview with Ted Koppel for the Discovery Channel, though, that Ms. Rice rose to a whole new level of fictionalizing by wrapping a fresh layer of untruth around her most notorious previous fiction. Asked about her dire prewar warning that a smoking gun might come in the form of a mushroom cloud, she said that "it wasn't meant as hyperbole." She also rewrote history to imply that she had been talking broadly about the nexus between "terrorism and a nuclear device" back then, not specifically Saddam — a rather deft verbal sleight-of-hand.

Ms. Rice sets a high bar, but Mr. Bush, competitive as always, was not to be outdone in his Oval Office address. Even the billing of his appearance was fiction. "It's not going to be a political speech," Tony Snow announced, knowing full well that the 17-minute text was largely Cuisinarted scraps from other recent political speeches, including those at campaign fund-raisers. Moldy canards of yore (Saddam "was a clear threat") were interspersed with promising newcomers: Iraq will be "a strong ally in the war on terror." As is often the case, the president was technically truthful. Iraq will be a strong ally in the war on terror — just not necessarily our ally. As Mr. Bush spoke, the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, was leaving for Iran to jolly up Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Perhaps the only way to strike back against this fresh deluge of fiction is to call the White House's bluff. On Monday night, for instance, Mr. Bush flatly declared that "the safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad." He once again invoked Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman, asking, "Do we have the confidence to do in the Middle East what our fathers and grandfathers accomplished in Europe and Asia?"

Rather than tune this bluster out, as the country now does, let's try a thought experiment. Let's pretend everything Mr. Bush said is actually true and then hold him to his word. If the safety of America really depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad, then our safety is in grave peril because we are losing that battle. The security crackdown announced with great fanfare by Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki in June is failing. Rosy American claims of dramatically falling murder rates are being challenged by the Baghdad morgue. Perhaps most tellingly, the Pentagon has nowstopped including in its own tally the large numbers of victims killed by car bombings and mortar attacks in sectarian warfare.

And that's the good news. Another large slice of Iraq, Anbar Province (almost a third of the country), is slipping away so fast that a senior military official told NBC News last week that 50,000 to 60,000 additional ground forces were needed to secure it, despite our huge sacrifice in two savage battles for Falluja. The Iraqi troops "standing up" in Anbar are deserting at a rate as high as 40 percent.

"Even the most sanguine optimist cannot yet conclude we are winning," John Lehman, the former Reagan Navy secretary, wrote of the Iraq war last month. So what do we do next? Given that the current course is a fiasco, and that the White House demonizes any plan or timetable for eventual withdrawal as "cut and run," there's only one immediate alternative: add more manpower, and fast. Last week two conservative war supporters, William Kristol and Rich Lowry, called for exactly that — "substantially more troops." These pundits at least have the courage of Mr. Bush's convictions. Shouldn't Republicans in Congress as well?

After all, if what the president says is true about the stakes in Baghdad, it's tantamount to treason if Bill Frist, Rick Santorum and John Boehner fail to rally their party's Congressional majority to stave off defeat there. We can't emulate our fathers and grandfathers and whip today's Nazis and Communists with 145,000 troops. Roosevelt and Truman would have regarded those troop levels as defeatism.

The trouble, of course, is that we don't have any more troops, and supporters of the war, starting with Mr. Bush, don't want to ask American voters to make any sacrifices to provide them. They don't want to ask because they know the voters will tell them no. In the end, that is the hard truth the White House is determined to obscure, at least until Election Day, by carpet-bombing America with still more fictions about Iraq.

Ties To GOP Trumped Know-How Among Staff Sent To Rebuild Iraq (WP)

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran, Washington Post Staff Writer

Adapted from "Imperial Life in the Emerald City," by Rajiv Chandrasekaran, copyright Knopf 2006

After the fall of Saddam Hussein's government in April 2003, the opportunity to participate in the U.S.-led effort to reconstruct Iraq attracted all manner of Americans -- restless professionals, Arabic-speaking academics, development specialists and war-zone adventurers. But before they could go to Baghdad, they had to get past Jim O'Beirne's office in the Pentagon.

To pass muster with O'Beirne, a political appointee who screens prospective political appointees for Defense Department posts, applicants didn't need to be experts in the Middle East or in post-conflict reconstruction. What seemed most important was loyalty to the Bush administration.

O'Beirne's staff posed blunt questions to some candidates about domestic politics: Did you vote for George W. Bush in 2000? Do you support the way the president is fighting the war on terror? Two people who sought jobs with the U.S. occupation authority said they were even asked their views on Roe v. Wade .

Many of those chosen by O'Beirne's office to work for the Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran Iraq's government from April 2003 to June 2004, lacked vital skills and experience. A 24-year-old who had never worked in finance -- but had applied for a White House job -- was sent to reopen Baghdad's stock exchange. The daughter of a prominent neoconservative commentator and a recent graduate from an evangelical university for home-schooled children were tapped to manage Iraq's $13 billion budget, even though they didn't have a background in accounting.

The decision to send the loyal and the willing instead of the best and the brightest is now regarded by many people involved in the 3 1/2 -year effort to stabilize and rebuild Iraq as one of the Bush administration's gravest errors. Many of those selected because of their political fidelity spent their time trying to impose a conservative agenda on the postwar occupation, which sidetracked more important reconstruction efforts and squandered goodwill among the Iraqi people, according to many people who participated in the reconstruction effort.

The CPA had the power to enact laws, print currency, collect taxes, deploy police and spend Iraq's oil revenue. It had more than 1,500 employees in Baghdad at its height, working under America's viceroy in Iraq, L. Paul Bremer, but never released a public roster of its entire staff.

Interviews with scores of former CPA personnel over the past two years depict an organization that was dominated -- and ultimately hobbled -- by administration ideologues.

"We didn't tap -- and it should have started from the White House on down -- just didn't tap the right people to do this job," said Frederick Smith, who served as the deputy director of the CPA's Washington office. "It was a tough, tough job. Instead we got people who went out there because of their political leanings."

Endowed with $18 billion in U.S. reconstruction funds and a comparatively quiescent environment in the immediate aftermath of the U.S. invasion, the CPA was the U.S. government's first and best hope to resuscitate Iraq -- to establish order, promote rebuilding and assemble a viable government, all of which, experts believe, would have constricted the insurgency and mitigated the chances of civil war. Many of the basic tasks Americans struggle to accomplish today in Iraq -- training the army, vetting the police, increasing electricity generation -- could have been performed far more effectively in 2003 by the CPA.

But many CPA staff members were more interested in other things: in instituting a flat tax, in selling off government assets, in ending food rations and otherwise fashioning a new nation that looked a lot like the United States. Many of them spent their days cloistered in the Green Zone, a walled-off enclave in central Baghdad with towering palms, posh villas, well-stocked bars and resort-size swimming pools.

By the time Bremer departed in June 2004, Iraq was in a precarious state. The Iraqi army, which had been dissolved and refashioned by the CPA, was one-third the size he had pledged it would be. Seventy percent of police officers had not been screened or trained. Electricity generation was far below what Bremer had promised to achieve. And Iraq's interim government had been selected not by elections but by Americans. Divisive issues were to be resolved later on, increasing the chances that tension over those matters would fuel civil strife.

To recruit the people he wanted, O'Beirne sought rÃ©sumÃ©s from the offices of Republican congressmen, conservative think tanks and GOP activists. He discarded applications from those his staff deemed ideologically suspect, even if the applicants possessed Arabic language skills or postwar rebuilding experience.

Smith said O'Beirne once pointed to a young man's rÃ©sumÃ© and pronounced him "an ideal candidate." His chief qualification was that he had worked for the Republican Party in Florida during the presidential election recount in 2000.

O'Beirne, a former Army officer who is married to prominent conservative commentator Kate O'Beirne, did not respond to requests for comment.

He and his staff used an obscure provision in federal law to hire many CPA staffers as temporary political appointees, which exempted the interviewers from employment regulations that prohibit questions about personal political beliefs.

There were a few Democrats who wound up getting jobs with the CPA, but almost all of them were active-duty soldiers or State Department Foreign Service officers. Because they were career government employees, not temporary hires, O'Beirne's office could not query them directly about their political leanings.

One former CPA employee who had an office near O'Beirne's wrote an e-mail to a friend describing the recruitment process: "I watched rÃ©sumÃ©s of immensely talented individuals who had sought out CPA to help the country thrown in the trash because their adherence to 'the President's vision for Iraq' (a frequently heard phrase at CPA) was 'uncertain.' I saw senior civil servants from agencies like Treasury, Energy . . . and Commerce denied advisory positions in Baghdad that were instead handed to prominent RNC [Republican National Committee] contributors."

As more and more of O'Beirne's hires arrived in the Green Zone, the CPA's headquarters in Hussein's marble-walled former Republican Palace felt like a campaign war room. Bumper stickers and mouse pads praising President Bush were standard desk decorations. In addition to military uniforms and "Operation Iraqi Freedom" garb, "Bush-Cheney 2004" T-shirts were among the most common pieces of clothing.

"I'm not here for the Iraqis," one staffer noted to a reporter over lunch. "I'm here for George Bush."

When Gordon Robison, who worked in the Strategic Communications office, opened a care package from his mother to find a book by Paul Krugman, a liberal New York Times columnist, people around him stared. "It was like I had just unwrapped a radioactive brick," he recalled.Finance Background Not Required

Twenty-four-year-old Jay Hallen was restless. He had graduated from Yale two years earlier, and he didn't much like his job at a commercial real-estate firm. His passion was the Middle East, and although he had never been there, he was intrigued enough to take Arabic classes and read histories of the region in his spare time.

He had mixed feelings about the war in Iraq, but he viewed the American occupation as a ripe opportunity. In the summer of 2003, he sent an e-mail to Reuben Jeffrey III, whom he had met when applying for a White House job a year earlier. Hallen had a simple query for Jeffrey, who was working as an adviser to Bremer: Might there be any job openings in Baghdad?

"Be careful what you wish for," Jeffrey wrote in response. Then he forwarded Hallen's resume to O'Beirne's office.

Three weeks later, Hallen got a call from the Pentagon. The CPA wanted him in Baghdad. Pronto. Could he be ready in three to four weeks?

The day he arrived in Baghdad, he met with Thomas C. Foley, the CPA official in charge of privatizing state-owned enterprises. (Foley, a major Republican Party donor, went to Harvard Business School with President Bush.) Hallen was shocked to learn that Foley wanted him to take charge of reopening the stock exchange.

"Are you sure?" Hallen said to Foley. "I don't have a finance background."

It's fine, Foley replied. He told Hallen that he was to be the project manager. He would rely on other people to get things done. He would be "the main point of contact."

Before the war, Baghdad's stock exchange looked nothing like its counterparts elsewhere in the world. There were no computers, electronic displays or men in colorful coats scurrying around on the trading floor. Trades were scrawled on pieces of paper and noted on large blackboards. If you wanted to buy or sell, you came to the exchange yourself and shouted your order to one of the traders. There was no air-conditioning. It was loud and boisterous. But it worked. Private firms raised hundreds of thousands of dollars by selling stock, and ordinary people learned about free enterprise.

The exchange was gutted by looters after the war. The first wave of American economic reconstruction specialists from the Treasury Department ignored it. They had bigger issues to worry about: paying salaries, reopening the banks, stabilizing the currency. But the brokers wanted to get back to work and investors wanted their money, so the CPA made the reopening a priority.

Quickly absorbing the CPA's ambition during the optimistic days before the insurgency flared, Hallen decided that he didn't just want to reopen the exchange, he wanted to make it the best, most modern stock market in the Arab world. He wanted to promulgate a new securities law that would make the exchange independent of the Finance Ministry, with its own bylaws and board of directors. He wanted to set up a securities and exchange commission to oversee the market. He wanted brokers to be licensed and listed companies to provide financial disclosures. He wanted to install a computerized trading and settlement system.

Iraqis cringed at Hallen's plan. Their top priority was reopening the exchange, not setting up computers or enacting a new securities law. "People are broke and bewildered," broker Talib Tabatabai told Hallen. "Why do you want to create enemies? Let us open the way we were."

Tabatabai, who held a doctorate in political science from Florida State University, believed Hallen's plan was unrealistic. "It was something so fancy, so great, that it couldn't be accomplished," he said.

But Hallen was convinced that major changes had to be enacted. "Their laws and regulations were completely out of step with the modern world," he said. "There was just no transparency in anything. It was more of a place for Saddam and his friends to buy up private companies that they otherwise didn't have a stake in."

Opening the stock exchange without legal and structural changes, Hallen maintained, "would have been irresponsible and short-sighted."

To help rewrite the securities law, train brokers and purchase the necessary computers, Hallen recruited a team of American volunteers. In the spring of 2004, Bremer approved the new law and simultaneously appointed the nine Iraqis selected by Hallen to become the exchange's board of governors.

The exchange's board selected Tabatabai as its chairman. The new securities law that Hallen had nursed into life gave the board control over the exchange's operations, but it didn't say a thing about the role of the CPA adviser. Hallen assumed that he'd have a part in decision-making until the handover of sovereignty. Tabatabai and the board, however, saw themselves in charge.

Tabatabai and the other governors decided to open the market as soon as possible. They didn't want to wait several more months for the computerized trading system to be up and running. They ordered dozens of dry-erase boards to be installed on the trading floor. They used such boards to keep track of buying and selling prices before the war, and that's how they'd do it again.

The exchange opened two days after Hallen's tour in Iraq ended. Brokers barked orders to floor traders, who used their trusty white boards. Transactions were recorded not with computers but with small chits written in ink. CPA staffers stayed away, afraid that their presence would make the stock market a target for insurgents.

When Tabatabai was asked what would have happened if Hallen hadn't been assigned to reopen the exchange, he smiled. "We would have opened months earlier. He had grand ideas, but those ideas did not materialize," Tabatabai said of Hallen. "Those CPA people reminded me of Lawrence of Arabia."'Loyalist' Replaces Public Health Expert

The hiring of Bremer's most senior advisers was settled upon at the highest levels of the White House and the Pentagon. Some, like Foley, were personally recruited by Bush. Others got their jobs because an influential Republican made a call on behalf of a friend or trusted colleague.

That's what happened with James K. Haveman Jr., who was selected to oversee the rehabilitation of Iraq's health care system.

Haveman, a 60-year-old social worker, was largely unknown among international health experts, but he had connections. He had been the community health director for the former Republican governor of Michigan, John Engler, who recommended him to Paul D. Wolfowitz, the deputy secretary of defense.

Haveman was well-traveled, but most of his overseas trips were in his capacity as a director of International Aid, a faith-based relief organization that provided health care while promoting Christianity in the developing world. Before his stint in government, Haveman ran a large Christian adoption agency in Michigan that urged pregnant women not to have abortions.

Haveman replaced Frederick M. Burkle Jr., a physician with a master's degree in public health and postgraduate degrees from Harvard, Yale, Dartmouth and the University of California at Berkeley. Burkle taught at the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health, where he specialized in disaster-response issues, and he was a deputy assistant administrator at the U.S. Agency for International Development, which sent him to Baghdad immediately after the war.

He had worked in Kosovo and Somalia and in northern Iraq after the 1991 Persian Gulf War. A USAID colleague called him the "single most talented and experienced post-conflict health specialist working for the United States government."

But a week after Baghdad's liberation, Burkle was informed he was being replaced. A senior official at USAID sent Burkle an e-mail saying the White House wanted a "loyalist" in the job. Burkle had a wall of degrees, but he didn't have a picture with the president.

Haveman arrived in Iraq with his own priorities. He liked to talk about the number of hospitals that had reopened since the war and the pay raises that had been given to doctors instead of the still-decrepit conditions inside the hospitals or the fact that many physicians were leaving for safer, better paying jobs outside Iraq. He approached problems the way a health care administrator in America would: He focused on preventive measures to reduce the need for hospital treatment.

He urged the Health Ministry to mount an anti-smoking campaign, and he assigned an American from the CPA team -- who turned out to be a closet smoker himself -- to lead the public education effort. Several members of Haveman's staff noted wryly that Iraqis faced far greater dangers in their daily lives than tobacco. The CPA's limited resources, they argued, would be better used raising awareness about how to prevent childhood diarrhea and other fatal maladies.

Haveman didn't like the idea that medical care in Iraq was free. He figured Iraqis should pay a small fee every time they saw a doctor. He also decided to allocate almost all of the Health Ministry's $793 million share of U.S. reconstruction funds to renovating maternity hospitals and building new community medical clinics. His intention, he said, was "to shift the mind-set of the Iraqis that you don't get health care unless you go to a hospital."

But his decision meant there were no reconstruction funds set aside to rehabilitate the emergency rooms and operating theaters at Iraqi hospitals, even though injuries from insurgent attacks were the country's single largest public health challenge.

Haveman also wanted to apply American medicine to other parts of the Health Ministry. Instead of trying to restructure the dysfunctional state-owned firm that imported and distributed drugs and medical supplies to hospitals, he decided to try to sell it to a private company.

To prepare it for a sale, he wanted to attempt something he had done in Michigan. When he was the state's director of community health, he sought to slash the huge amount of money Michigan spent on prescription drugs for the poor by limiting the medications doctors could prescribe for Medicaid patients. Unless they received an exemption, physicians could only prescribe drugs that were on an approved list, known as a formulary.

Haveman figured the same strategy could bring down the cost of medicine in Iraq. The country had 4,500 items on its drug formulary. Haveman deemed it too large. If private firms were going to bid for the job of supplying drugs to government hospitals, they needed a smaller, more manageable list. A new formulary would also outline new requirements about where approved drugs could be manufactured, forcing Iraq to stop buying medicines from Syria, Iran and Russia, and start buying from the United States.

He asked the people who had drawn up the formulary in Michigan whether they wanted to come to Baghdad. They declined. So he beseeched the Pentagon for help. His request made its way to the Defense Department's Pharmacoeconomic Center in San Antonio.

A few weeks later, three formulary experts were on their way to Iraq.

The group was led by Theodore Briski, a balding, middle-aged pharmacist who held the rank of lieutenant commander in the U.S. Navy. Haveman's order, as Briski remembered it, was: "Build us a formulary in two weeks and then go home." By his second day in Iraq, Briski came to three conclusions. First, the existing formulary "really wasn't that bad." Second, his mission was really about "redesigning the entire Iraqi pharmaceutical procurement and delivery system, and that was a complete change of scope -- on a grand scale." Third, Haveman and his advisers "really didn't know what they were doing."

Haveman "viewed Iraq as Michigan after a huge attack," said George Guszcza, an Army captain who worked on the CPA's health team. "Somehow if you went into the ghettos and projects of Michigan and just extended it out for the entire state -- that's what he was coming to save."

Haveman's critics, including more than a dozen people who worked for him in Baghdad, contend that rewriting the formulary was a distraction. Instead, they said, the CPA should have focused on restructuring, but not privatizing, the drug-delivery system and on ordering more emergency shipments of medicine to address shortages of essential medicines. The first emergency procurement did not occur until early 2004, after the Americans had been in Iraq for more than eight months.

Haveman insisted that revising the formulary was a crucial first step in improving the distribution of medicines. "It was unwieldy to order 4,500 different drugs, and to test and distribute them," he said.

When Haveman left Iraq, Baghdad's hospitals were as decrepit as the day the Americans arrived. At Yarmouk Hospital, the city's largest, rooms lacked the most basic equipment to monitor a patient's blood pressure and heart rate, operating theaters were without modern surgical tools and sterile implements, and the pharmacy's shelves were bare.

Nationwide, the Health Ministry reported that 40 percent of the 900 drugs it deemed essential were out of stock in hospitals. Of the 32 medicines used in public clinics for the management of chronic diseases, 26 were unavailable.

The new health minister, Aladin Alwan, beseeched the United Nations for help, and he asked neighboring nations to share what they could. He sought to increase production at a state-run manufacturing plant in the city of Samarra. And he put the creation of a new formulary on hold. To him, it was a fool's errand.

"We didn't need a new formulary. We needed drugs," he said. "But the Americans did not understand that."A 9/11 Hero's Public Relations Blitz

In May 2003, a team of law enforcement experts from the Justice Department concluded that more than 6,600 foreign advisers were needed to help rehabilitate Iraq's police forces.

The White House dispatched just one: Bernie Kerik.

Bernard Kerik had more star power than Bremer and everyone else in the CPA combined. Soldiers stopped him in the halls of the Republican Palace to ask for his autograph or, if they had a camera, a picture. Reporters were more interested in interviewing him than they were the viceroy.

Kerik had been New York City's police commissioner when terrorists attacked the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001. His courage (he shouted evacuation orders from a block away as the south tower collapsed), his stamina (he worked around the clock and catnapped in his office for weeks), and his charisma (he was a master of the television interview) turned him into a national hero. When White House officials were casting about for a prominent individual to take charge of Iraq's Interior Ministry and assume the challenge of rebuilding the Iraqi police, Kerik's name came up. Bush pronounced it an excellent idea.

Kerik had worked in the Middle East before, as the security director for a government hospital in Saudi Arabia, but he was expelled from the country amid a government investigation into his surveillance of the medical staff. He lacked postwar policing experience, but the White House viewed that as an asset.

Veteran Middle East hands were regarded as insufficiently committed to the goal of democratizing the region. Post-conflict experts, many of whom worked for the State Department, the United Nations or nongovernmental organizations, were deemed too liberal. Men such as Kerik -- committed Republicans with an accomplished career in business or government -- were ideal. They were loyal, and they shared the Bush administration's goal of rebuilding Iraq in an American image. With Kerik, there were bonuses: The media loved him, and the American public trusted him.

Robert Gifford, a State Department expert in international law enforcement, was one of the first CPA staff members to meet Kerik when he arrived in Baghdad. Gifford was the senior adviser to the Interior Ministry, which oversaw the police. Kerik was to take over Gifford's job.

"I understand you are going to be the man, and we are here to support you," Gifford told Kerik.

"I'm here to bring more media attention to the good work on police because the situation is probably not as bad as people think it is," Kerik replied.

As they entered the Interior Ministry office in the palace, Gifford offered to brief Kerik. "It was during that period I realized he wasn't with me," Gifford recalled. "He didn't listen to anything. He hadn't read anything except his e-mails. I don't think he read a single one of our proposals."

Kerik wasn't a details guy. He was content to let Gifford figure out how to train Iraqi officers to work in a democratic society. Kerik would take care of briefing the viceroy and the media. And he'd be going out for a few missions himself.

Kerik's first order of business, less than a week after he arrived, was to give a slew of interviews saying the situation was improving. He told the Associated Press that security in Baghdad "is not as bad as I thought. Are bad things going on? Yes. But is it out of control? No. Is it getting better? Yes." He went on NBC's "Today" show to pronounce the situation "better than I expected." To Time magazine, he said that "people are starting to feel more confident. They're coming back out. Markets and shops that I saw closed one week ago have opened."

When it came to his own safety, Kerik took no chances. He hired a team of South African bodyguards, and he packed a 9mm handgun under his safari vest.

The first months after liberation were a critical period for Iraq's police. Officers needed to be called back to work and screened for Baath Party connections. They'd have to learn about due process, how to interrogate without torture, how to walk the beat. They required new weapons. New chiefs had to be selected. Tens of thousands more officers would have to be hired to put the genie of anarchy back in the bottle.

Kerik held only two staff meetings while in Iraq, one when he arrived and the other when he was being shadowed by a New York Times reporter, according to Gerald Burke, a former Massachusetts State Police commander who participated in the initial Justice Department assessment mission. Despite his White House connections, Kerik did not secure funding for the desperately needed police advisers. With no help on the way, the task of organizing and training Iraqi officers fell to U.S. military police soldiers, many of whom had no experience in civilian law enforcement.

"He was the wrong guy at the wrong time," Burke said later. "Bernie didn't have the skills. What we needed was a chief executive-level person. . . . Bernie came in with a street-cop mentality."

Kerik authorized the formation of a hundred-man Iraqi police paramilitary unit to pursue criminal syndicates that had formed since the war, and he often joined the group on nighttime raids, departing the Green Zone at midnight and returning at dawn, in time to attend Bremer's senior staff meeting, where he would crack a few jokes, describe the night's adventures and read off the latest crime statistics prepared by an aide. The unit did bust a few kidnapping gangs and car-theft rings, generating a stream of positive news stories that Kerik basked in and Bremer applauded. But the all-nighters meant Kerik wasn't around to supervise the Interior Ministry during the day. He was sleeping.

Several members of the CPA's Interior Ministry team wanted to blow the whistle on Kerik, but they concluded any complaints would be brushed off. "Bremer's staff thought he was the silver bullet," a member of the Justice Department assessment mission said. "Nobody wanted to question the [man who was] police chief during 9/11."

Kerik contended that he did his best in what was, ultimately, an untenable situation. He said he wasn't given sufficient funding to hire foreign police advisers or establish large-scale training programs.

Three months after he arrived, Kerik attended a meeting of local police chiefs in Baghdad's Convention Center. When it was his turn to address the group, he stood and bid everyone farewell. Although he had informed Bremer of his decision a few days earlier, Kerik hadn't told most of the people who worked for him. He flew out of Iraq a few hours later.

"I was in my own world," he said later. "I did my own thing."

How L. Paul Bremer's occupation paved the way for today's chaos in Baghdad.

IMPERIAL LIFE IN THE EMERALD CITY

Inside Iraq's Green Zone

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran

Knopf. 320 pp. $25.95

When President Bush announced in May 2003 that he was appointing L. Paul Bremer as the top U.S. civilian official in Iraq, I received an e-mail from one of his former business colleagues: "I just heard that Jerry [Bremer's nickname] will be running Iraq. And the Iraqis thought that the worst we could do was to bomb them."

At the time, I just smiled and dismissed the message. Three years later, Rajiv Chandrasekaran's extraordinary book made me realize how tragically prescient that e-mail had been. Imperial Life in the Emerald City is full of jaw-dropping tales of the myriad large and small ways in which Bremer and his team poured fuel into the lethal cauldron that is today's Iraq. He was not alone and had many eager and powerful partners in Washington, Baghdad and elsewhere. Still, by reporting on daily life and decision making inside the Green Zone, the cloistered compound that housed Bremer's Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), Chandrasekaran shows how incomplete our conventional wisdom is about what went wrong in Iraq.

That common wisdom holds that while the decision to invade Iraq and topple Saddam Hussein is still open to debate, American mismanagement of the country after the invasion is not. Even the Bush administration's staunchest supporters now accept that "mistakes were made" and admit that, for example, dismantling the Iraqi army and driving out officials tied to the old dictatorship's Baath Party (both policies that Bremer championed) were bad ideas. But often implicit in this dominant interpretation is a complacent understanding, even a justification, of U.S. mistakes made during the occupation. After all, goes the thinking, ethnic divisions, suicidal Islamist fanatics, decades of oppression and decay, and all sorts of other obstacles conspired against the success of the bold American enterprise.

It is hard to hold that view after reading this book. Chandrasekaran, now an assistant managing editor of The Washington Post, was The Post's Baghdad bureau chief in 2003-04 and has a keen eye for the small detail that illuminates larger truths. He clearly suggests that the self-inflicted wounds created by CPA ineptitude, arrogance and ignorance were far from inevitable. Nor, he shows, were they minor causes of the mess the United States faces today in Iraq. Imperial Life in the Emerald City documents the way that an avalanche of unjustifiable mistakes transformed a difficult mission into an impossible one.

Take, for example, the story of Frederick M. Burkle Jr., a Navy reserve officer and physician with two Bronze Stars whom a colleague describes as "the single most talented and experienced post-conflict health specialist working for the United States government." Burkle was ousted a week after Baghdad's liberation because, he was told by his superiors, the White House preferred to have a Bush "loyalist" in charge of health matters in Iraq. Burkle was replaced (fully two months later) by James K. Haveman Jr., a social worker whose experience as the community-health director for Michigan's former Republican governor, John Engler, had followed a stint running "a large Christian adoption agency in Michigan that urged pregnant women not to have abortions." Haveman had also traveled widely "in his capacity as a director of International Aid, a faith-based relief organization that provided health care while promoting Christianity in the developing world." (That pro-life stance was not uncommon in the CPA: Two staffers report being asked during their job interviews if they supported the Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade ruling.) Chandrasekaran's rendition of Haveman's performance in Iraq makes for unnerving reading: the launch of an antismoking campaign while hospitals lacked pain killers; the emphasis on preventive medicine in a country ravaged by a bloody insurgency; an attempt to refashion Iraq's health care system with a U.S.-inspired model based on private providers, co-payments and primary care while newborns routinely died for lack of incubators.

Or take the case of Capt. John Smathers, a reservist and personal-injury lawyer charged with bringing some order to the chaotic traffic jams that ensued after U.S. authorities eliminated all import duties and the country was flooded by imported used cars. The solution? Download Maryland's motor-vehicle code from the Internet, translate it into Arabic and, after much haggling and revision, have Bremer sign it into law. CPA Order 86 included provisions such as, "Pedestrians walking during darkness or cloudy weather shall wear light or reflective clothing."

Micromanaging and emulating U.S. institutions was also the instinct of Jay Hallen, the clueless 24-year-old in charge of reopening the Baghdad stock market. His approach was to create one patterned after the New York Stock Exchange. (No, it didn't work.) Nor was Hallen the only inexperienced twentysomething CPA staffer given responsibilities for which he was utterly unprepared. Six of the "ten young gofers" that the CPA had requested from the Pentagon to handle minor administrative tasks found themselves managing Iraq's $13-billion budget. Where did the Pentagon recruit them? From the Heritage Foundation; they had sent their resumes there, looking for work in that conservative think tank.

When so much money is combined with organizational chaos, a state of emergency and the expectation that powerful friends in Washington would provide any needed cover, corruption is inevitable. Sure enough, Chandrasekaran offers tales of corruption among American contractors that read like dispatches from a kleptocratic banana republic.

Readers should avoid the temptation to dismiss Imperial Life in the Emerald City as yet another book documenting America's misadventures in Iraq. That of course it is, but the book offers more than a dispatch from the trenches. Chandrasekaran does not set out to score partisan points or unveil large geopolitical lessons; he is, essentially, a reporter telling readers what he saw. Yet it is impossible to read his book without thinking about the larger implications of the story he tells.

What caused the massive collapse of common sense that doomed the CPA and undermined the U.S. gamble in Iraq? That is the question that every page tacitly forces on the reader. American ingenuity, pragmatism and practical approaches to problem-solving are legendary. But Chandrasekaran shows that what reigned in Iraq was massive incompetence, patently unfeasible schemes, naive expectations and arrogance fueled by ignorance. His book methodically documents the baffling ineptitude that dominated U.S. attempts to influence Iraq's fiendish politics, rebuild the electrical grid, privatize the economy, run the oil industry, recruit expert staff or instill a modicum of normalcy to the lives of Iraqis. Nor are the book's complaints Monday-morning quarterbacking. The CPA's failings caused widespread grumbling at the time. Chandrasekaran tells of a message board on which some Marines had drawn a gravestone inscribed with the words "COMMON SENSE." The caption underneath it read: "Killed by the CPA."

Why? What happened? Chandrasekaran does not try to answer these questions directly. But his indispensable book offers powerful hints as to what the likely answers are. Bremer's regency suffered from too much unaccountable political power, too much carelessly spent money and too many ideological certitudes. Those conditions allowed incompetence, petty partisanship, patronage, nepotism and corruption to thrive. That is why "mistakes were made" -- and Chandrasekaran gets us away from that passive-voice formulation to show who, precisely, made them. Those mistakes go a long way toward explaining why success in Iraq is proving so tragically elusive. Â·

A Liberal Hawk Strikes Back (LAT)

Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

THE CIRCULAR firing squad is the signature practice of the Democratic Party. Think of 1968, or 1972, or everything that happened during the Clinton presidency except impeachment, or the Howard Dean campaign. Democrats are never truly happy unless they're at each others' throats.

It has been a while since the Democratic Party had a good, old-fashioned internal bloodbath. The Bush years have had a unifying effect. But as Bush begins to recede from the scene, the prospect of controlling Congress looms and the presidential primaries appear over the horizon, the cherished habits are bound to resume.

In fact, the infighting has started. The new Democratic civil war, which is already burbling up in liberal magazines, blogs and opinion columns, centers on whether the Bush administration screwed up Iraq or whether the project was doomed to failure regardless.

This may sound like a trivial subject for a vicious ideological bloodbath. (Leave it to Democrats to tear each other to shreds over a counter-factual historical argument.) But it's actually a crucial question. At stake is nothing less than who gets to direct the party's foreign policy.

The liberal wing of the party has long been aware that although Democratic voters are generally dovish, the party's foreign policy elite is fairly hawkish. Liberals, understandably, want to depose that hawkish elite and replace it with a dovish one. Flynt Leverett, a foreign policy advisor to John Kerry, complained that "Democrats have fallen into a 'soft neoconservatism' that has dulled the party's voice on foreign policy." John Tirman, in his book, "100 Ways America Is Screwing Up the World," writes, "When I see a liberal hawk, I smell a rat."

The Iraq debacle (which most liberal hawks supported) has given the doves new ammunition. In some ways it resembles the fallout from the Vietnam War, when liberals such as George McGovern — who were skeptical of the Cold War — unseated the Kennedy-era hawks who had led the country into a quagmire in Southeast Asia. One difference between Vietnam and Iraq is that the former was conducted mostly by Democratic administrations, while the latter has been conducted by a Republican one. Liberal hawks (like me) believe that this mostly absolves us; it wasn't us who conducted this debacle.

Doves, naturally, want to hang the war around our necks anyway. They say blaming Bush is a cop-out. Last year, Sam Rosenfeld and Matthew Yglesias wrote an article in the American Prospect attacking those who fault the conduct of the Iraq war. "Administration bungling," they wrote, "is simply not the root source of America's failure in Iraq." Those hawks who believe otherwise, they wrote, are engaging in what they called the "incompetence dodge" — a phrase that continues to circulate among liberal doves.

The argument that the Iraq war had no chance to succeed has an undeniable surface appeal. Things are going so badly there that it's hard to imagine how it could have turned out differently.

But the more we learn about the war's conduct, the more we learn that the administration didn't just make the normal sorts of mistakes that inevitably occur in wartime; it was almost criminally negligent. The Bush administration literally refused to do any planning for the occupation. They invaded before all the available troops were in place, staffed the Coalition Provisional Authority with underqualified hacks vetted solely on the basis of ideological loyalty and rashly disbanded the Iraqi army, which could have provided some early order.

One might counter that none of this was really decisive because Iraq is so deeply riven with sectarian feuds that brutal fighting between Sunnis and Shiites was inevitable. But this misunderstands a lot about human behavior. When the authority of government dissolves, people retreat to the safety of tribal solidarity, and under such conditions they can do savage things of which they never thought themselves capable. Once the expectation of chaos sets in, it can spiral out of control.

Many doves on the left and right looked at the savagery in Sarajevo in the 1990s and saw a never-ending tribal war, but in fact Serbs, Bosnians and Croats had peacefully coexisted in a multiethnic city for decades.

Even in the United States we have seen outbreaks of racial violence and looting in Bensonhurst, Crown Heights and elsewhere. This doesn't mean blacks and whites are doomed to fight a race war.

The funny thing is that, in other contexts, liberals don't dispute the notion that Bush administration incompetence caused otherwise preventable catastrophes. Almost no liberal believes otherwise when it comes to, say, the response to Hurricane Katrina. If Bush could have bungled Katrina this badly, isn't it just possible he could have done the same thing in Iraq?

Iraq Stumbling In Bid To Purge Its Rogue Police (NYT)

By Edward Wong And Paul Von Zielbauer

DOJ_NMG_0064672

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 16 — Shiite militiamen and criminals entrenched throughout Iraq's police and internal security forces are blocking recent efforts by some Iraqi leaders and the American military to root them out, a step critical to winning the trust of skeptical Sunni Arabs and quelling the sectarian conflict, Iraqi and Western officials say.

The new interior minister, Jawad al-Bolani, who oversees the police, lacks the political support to purge many of the worst offenders, including senior managers who tolerated or encouraged the infiltration of Shiite militias into the police under the previous government, according to interviews with more than a dozen officials who work with the ministry and the police.

No one expected a housecleaning to be easy, and some headway has been made in firing people. But despite that progress, recent difficulties reveal the magnitude of the task facing Mr. Bolani and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. When he took office in late May, Mr. Maliki said one of his top goals was to reform the Shiite-led Interior Ministry, which had, to the minority Sunni Arabs, become synonymous with government complicity in abduction, torture and killing.

The ministry recently discovered that more than 1,200 policemen and other employees had been convicted years ago of murder, rape and other violent crimes, said a Western diplomat who has close contact with the ministry. Some were even on death row. Few have been fired.

Despite the importance American commanders place on hiring more Sunni Arabs for the overwhelmingly Shiite police force, the ministry still has no way to screen recruits by sect or for militia allegiance. Such loyalties are the root cause of the ministry's problems.

A senior American commander said that of the 27 paramilitary police battalions, "we think 5 or 6 battalions probably have leaders that have led that part of the organization in a way that is either criminal or sectarian or both."

Death squads in uniforms could be responsible for the recent surge in sectarian violence, with at least 165 bodies found across Baghdad since Wednesday.

There is little accountability. The government has stopped allowing joint Iraqi and American teams to inspect Iraqi prisons. No senior ministry officials have been prosecuted on charges of detainee mistreatment, in spite of fresh discoveries of abuse and torture, including a little-reported case involving children packed into a prison of more than 1,400 inmates. Internal investigations into secret prisons, corruption and other potential criminal activity are often blocked.

The Americans view an overhaul of the Ministry of the Interior as a crucial step in helping rein in the growing sectarian conflict.

"I think there are some definite issues in the M.O.I.," Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the second-ranking commander in Iraq, said in an interview. "I think there probably needs to be some leadership changes. But I know the minister of interior himself is working those."

Mr. Bolani, a Shiite engineer appointed last May, sincerely wants to purge the ministry of Shiite partisans brought in by his predecessor, the officials interviewed said. But his independence from powerful Shiite political leaders — the very quality that earned him the job — also means Mr. Bolani has limited power to remove politically connected subordinates and enact changes.

"He's got to be careful about what he does, just to stay alive," the Western diplomat said.

An American adviser to the ministry said Mr. Bolani was unavailable for an interview last week.

A New Security Plan

Some tentative progress has been made under the new government. Death squads in police uniforms no longer kidnap and kill with absolute impunity in parts of Sunni-dominated western Baghdad, many Iraqis say. The American military estimates there was a 52 percent drop in the daily rate of execution-style killings from July to August.

Officials attribute the decline to a new Baghdad security plan, more police oversight by American trainers and policy changes in the ministry. Military officials say the killings in the past week took place in neighborhoods not yet cleared out by security sweeps and are not necessarily the work of policemen — imposters are rife throughout Iraq.

"The performance has improved slightly," said Ayad al-Samarraie, a legislator and senior official in the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni Arab group that is sharply critical of the Interior Ministry. "Less people are kidnapped, and there are less raids by the militias on the people."

Brig. Gen. Abdul Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the ministry had fired 1,500 employees since June. They include senior officers like the police chief of Anbar Province. Mr. Bolani is pushing to enact a law that would ban the ministry's 167,000 employees from belonging to a political party.

Yet, a powerful official suspected of aiding the Shiite militias, Adnan al-Asadi — nicknamed Triple A by the Americans — still holds the job of deputy minister of administration. Mr. Asadi is "the one who really runs the M.O.I.," said Saleh Mutlak, a Sunni Arab legislator. Mr. Bolani wants to oust Mr. Asadi but does not have the political backing to do so, leaving American advisers frustrated, said an American official who was not authorized to talk publicly on the subject and spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Mr. Asadi supports the ministry's inspector general, whom the advisers consider wholly ineffective. American advisers set up an internal affairs unit late last year to conduct honest in-house inquiries. But the two offices feud, and the internal affairs unit lacks full authority to investigate the police in the provinces.

A recent fingerprinting campaign throughout the ministry showed that 1,228 police officers and ministry employees had been convicted of violent crimes under Saddam Hussein's government, said the Western diplomat, who spoke only on the condition of anonymity because of protocol. A handful had been sentenced to death.

"These are rapists, murderers, drug dealers," the diplomat said. "The impression I got is that there are a lot more out there."

Mr. Bolani has said he intends to fire some of them. But a complete purging of the ministry's most criminally violent employees is impossible, the diplomat said, because "they're going to go straight to the militias, or set up their own criminal gangs."

Even top Pentagon officials now acknowledge the ministry's deeply rooted dysfunctions. "Corruption, illegal activity and sectarian bias have constrained progress in developing M.O.I. forces," according to a Pentagon report issued to Congress at the end of August. "Inappropriate tolerance of and infiltration by Shia militias, some of which are influenced by Iran, is the primary concern of the government of Iraq."

Trouble With Elite Units

Since May, when Shiite politicians fought to keep control of the ministry under the new government, the ministry's total force has grown to more than 167,000 from 146,000. It is divided into 118,000 regular police officers, 24,400 paramilitary troops and 24,700 border guards.

Of those, the paramilitary units now called the national police are the most feared. Under Bayan Jabr, a conservative Shiite politician who was Mr. Bolani's predecessor, fighters from the two most powerful Shiite militias, the Badr Organization and the Mahdi Army, were recruited into the ranks of those elite units.

Assaults on civilians by gunmen in paramilitary uniforms have continued in some predominantly Sunni or mixed areas of Baghdad.

A woman who asked to be identified as Umm Shahad said in an interview that her 24-year-old son, a Sunni Arab, was recently taken from his car at a checkpoint run by paramilitary officers in their neighborhood, Jihad. She said she went to the unit's local stationhouse and to the Interior Ministry to search for him. Officials at each place said they had no idea where he was. "These were real commandos," she said of her son's abductors. "We are so afraid."

Col. Damon Penn, the senior American adviser to the national police's 9,000-member Second Division, acknowledged that "there are still some militias operating within the national police."

"I think there are some individuals and small cells that they need to purge to make this a truly governmental force," he said. But progress had been made, he insisted.

So suspect are the national police that the American military and Iraqi Army began inspections of each battalion in August. The reviews include recording the serial numbers of all national police weapons and vehicles. Twelve battalions have already been inspected, and the rest are to be completed by October, when the units will get new blue uniforms.

Each brigade will be pulled from the field and put through a six-week training course in policing and the rule of law, Colonel Penn said.

Four of the eight police brigades are to be deployed soon from Baghdad to the provinces, so building public confidence in them is critical.

Prisoner Abuse by the Police

The Iraqi and American inspectors assigned to the police prison known as Site 4 found themselves walking through a chamber of horrors at the end of May.

More than 1,400 prisoners had been packed into a small area by the Wolf Brigade, a national police unit accused of abuses by Sunni Arabs.

Prisoners with "lesions resulting from torture" were found during the inspection in eastern Baghdad on May 30, as was "equipment used for this purpose," according to a human rights report recently released by the United Nations mission here.

Some prisoners had been beaten, others bound and hung by their arms, an American officer said. There were at least 37 children or teenagers.

The discovery showed that torture by the police was still rampant despite promises by government officials to end it. Right after Site 4 was examined, the government stopped allowing joint Iraqi and American teams to inspect Iraqi prisons.

American commanders and Iraqi human rights officials say the treatment of detainees remains troubling. "New evidence has continued to emerge pointing to torture and other cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment in detention centers," the United Nations report said.

The Ministry of Human Rights reported that 4,331 detainees were being held in Interior Ministry prisons as of Aug. 31. Yet no one has a clear estimate of the number of prisons run by the Interior Ministry, because some elite police brigades operate detention centers on their bases.

The Second Division of the national police, for instance, holds 250 detainees in four cramped rooms at Camp Justice, the division headquarters in northern Baghdad. That number is down from 650 last March. But American advisers there recently found 12 prisoners with bruises and black eyes.

The possible existence of secret prisons like the torture compound discovered in the Jadriya neighborhood last year continues to worry American commanders.

"It's obviously a concern," said Brig. Gen. Dana J. H. Pittard, who is in charge of the operational training of the national police. "The pessimistic side of me says they exist."

Crowding and a lack of access to judges are widespread problems, despite Mr. Maliki's order for a mass prisoner release in June, said Wijdan M. Salim, the minister of human rights. Detainees can languish in prison for months before seeing a judge. Some in Camp Justice have gone six months without appearing before a judge.

Sectarianism and the Police

As long as police units remain overwhelmingly Shiite, the distrust of them that is prevalent among Sunni Arabs will be tough to overcome, Sunni leaders say. Yet, Mr. Bolani has avoided putting in place a policy that would diversify or even track the sectarian makeup of police units and recruits. A ministry spokesman said Mr. Bolani preferred not to think in those terms.

But General Chiarelli, the senior American commander, said: "I'm concerned with some of the ethnic makeup of some of the stations. Our goal was to take a look at that, to work with the minister of interior to get a balance, because I think that's absolutely essential."

The weaknesses in having an unrepresentative police force became more evident this summer. In one incident, American and Iraqi commanders tried to move the headquarters of a national police brigade from eastern Baghdad, which is mostly Shiite, to Dora, an extremely volatile area that is majority Sunni. A fifth of the 1,500 members quit, Colonel Penn said. "There are some dedicated Sunni areas that the Shia aren't comfortable going into, and vice versa," he said.

The Americans have pushed the ministry to change the Shiite makeup of the national police by filling academy classes with Sunni Arabs. The Second Division was only 7 or 8 percent Sunni Arab at the start of the summer. It is now 20 percent Sunni.

The Iraqi population is estimated to be 60 percent Shiite Arab, 20 percent Sunni Arab and 20 percent Kurd. Asked what the breakdown of the overall police force was, General Chiarelli said he was trying to find out himself.

Getting the balance right is "absolutely critical," he said, because hostility among Sunni Arabs is still high.

In the southern half of the Ghazaliya neighborhood, a mostly Sunni area in northwest Baghdad, "there is no trust between the people and the Iraqi police," said a man who called himself Abu Jafr, a guard at a sewage pumping station surrounded by small lakes of raw waste.

"Every time the Iraqi police come to the neighborhood, they get shot at, because people here think they're from the militias," he said.

To help change that perception, American commanders across Baghdad are trying a new tactic: having neighborhood police units work alongside Iraqi Army units, which enjoy a modicum of trust even among Sunni Arabs. The Americans have also placed an advisory team in most of the city's police stations.

At the main station in Ghazaliya, staffed almost entirely by Shiite officers, a group of policemen and Iraqi Army soldiers prepared to roll out on a joint patrol on a recent afternoon. The American battalion commander of the area, Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, pointed to the vehicles as he strode from his armored carrier into the walled compound. "That is huge for the Ghazaliyans to see," he said.

A few days later, six headless bodies turned up in the neighborhood. No one knew who was responsible.

Where Iraq Itself Finds Hope (WP)

By Barham Salih

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

From my experiences visiting the United States, it is easy for me to understand how disappointed and saddened Americans must be at the scenes of violence from Iraq. For Iraq's leaders, the carnage is a source of deep frustration. The pace of what we can achieve, relative to what we aspire to, is simply not what the people of Iraq and the generous people of the United States deserve.

We must change the dynamic of violence. The Iraqi government has undertaken a searching analysis and is responding with a strategy on two fronts: national and international.

We have a sense of urgency, but we refuse to give in to panic. While it is important to highlight the progress made, particularly given the extremely pessimistic tone of debate in Washington, we know we must confront many grave challenges. The unrelenting security problem, sectarian polarization, corruption and the inability of the government to deliver services are all threats to the transition. They could prove fatal if not dealt with urgently.

We Iraqis must recognize that it is up to us to resolve our problems. Outsiders cannot deliver for us. The Iraqi leadership must assume responsibility, deal with these challenges and turn the tide. This can be done by Iraqis, but they will undoubtedly need sustained support from the international community and particularly the United States.

The key planks of the national side of our strategy -- embodied in a "national compact" -- are national reconciliation, democratic federalism, political inclusion and a fair and rational oil policy. To achieve these things, the Iraqi Policy Council on National Security, composed of key elected officials, has adopted an intensive legislative timetable. This agenda is vital: It is the political part of our approach to ending the violence.

We have imposed a tough timetable because we owe it to our own people to press harder and to advance, no matter how intense the assault upon us by the terrorists. For example, this month we should pass our investment law and establish a Parliamentary Commission for the Review of the Constitution. Next month the parliament should vote on legislation to reform the de-Baathification commission. In December it should pass legislation on disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of former combatants.

These laws will move us toward a viable political equilibrium inside Iraq. Because Iraq is an inherently diverse country we need a balance that protects diversity and encourages a voluntary, democratic, federal national unity. This will benefit the entire region.

For most of its existence as a modern state, Iraq was profoundly unbalanced politically. Power was concentrated in the hands of the few, the benefits of the state denied to the many. The liberation of Iraq in 2003 temporarily created a new, if fundamentally democratic, imbalance. Almost overnight, the Kurds and Shiite Arabs were enfranchised, while many -- too many -- Sunni Arabs did not participate in the new political process.

We must defend diversity. Those responsible for the violence, the Baathist-jihadist terrorist axis, hate and reject diversity and democracy. They seek supremacy and theocracy.

Yet another force that the national compact must address is the disequilibrium that comes from majoritarianism. This is an issue not just for Iraq but for its regions, because those who are a majority in one part of the country are a minority in other areas. To prevent tyranny of the majority, Iraq now has a bill of rights that requires practical political enforcement.

Balance is critical. Without it, there could be disintegration of the country. Within the national reconciliation program outlined by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, we must seek balance on de-Baathification -- balance between the need for justice for the victims of the Saddam Hussein regime and the need to politically rehabilitate those whose crimes were not beyond the pale.

Similarly, in our counterterrorism and anti-militia strategy, we must balance political and security measures. There is no pure security solution to the terrorism and militia challenges -- just as there is no neat, "politics only" way of settling these issues. We need both approaches. The door to the political process must always remain open; our security forces must be ever vigilant.

The second part of our strategy is international. The Iraqi government understands that it must end terrorist violence not just for Iraq's sake but also for the region. If Iraq plunges into a full-blown civil war, so will the rest of the Middle East. This is not a theory but a fact that our wiser neighbors comprehend.

Resolved to avoid past mistakes, we announced the plan for an "International Compact With Iraq" in a statement with the United Nations on July 27. At a recent productive meeting in the United Arab Emirates, with the assistance of the United Nations, Iraq sat down with other interested parties to develop this compact.

It involves a road map for economic development. In a nation weaned on war, we need to give the bored young men of Iraq employment and the pride that comes from hard work -- instead of the easy swagger of the gunman. We should invest our oil revenue in infrastructure. We must aim to create jobs and distribute the benefits of the current oil boom widely.

We want a partnership, not unconditional aid. We are adopting a structured plan for economic development, not issuing a laundry list of financial demands. In utilities and hydrocarbons there has to be transparency and accountability, a dialogue between the federal government and the federal regions and equitable development.

Moreover, we are promising clear targets for economic restructuring, accompanied by mechanisms for intelligence cooperation and security coordination. Such an approach, with broad international support, is something new and, we hope, a harbinger of a Middle East characterized by cooperation, not conflict.

Oops, There Goes Basra (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Abdul Razzaq Al-saiedi

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq

ABDUL AZIZ AL-HAKIM wears the black turban signifying descent from the prophet Muhammad. He leads a powerful Shiite party with close ties to Iran. And he heads the United Iraqi Alliance, the Shiite coalition that has been the dominant force in post-invasion Iraqi politics.

Yet early this month this powerful leader made what some politicians here thought a rookie mistake. He tried — and failed — to rush through Parliament a bill giving Shiite-dominated provinces in southern Iraq a procedure to form autonomous states that could take control of much of Iraq's oil reserves.

When his bid failed, it appeared to unmask a weakness that emboldened his opponents to fight him harder on the larger issue: how soon autonomous regions can be formed in Iraq. Instead of a quick decision, he got a protracted debate that continued into the weekend.

The slipup shows how steep the learning curve may be for Iraq's legislators — even the most wily — as they observe democratic procedures.

"He obviously lost this round," said Adnan Pachachi, a secular Sunni Arab and former Iraqi foreign minister. "That's not a good thing for a politician. And he lost because many people in his own alliance were against him."

Even by the standards of the Iraqi Parliament, the argument was nasty. The Sunni speaker, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, accused supporters of the proposal of trying to sneak it past him. Other Sunni leaders hinted that the legislation could lead them to pull out of the so-called unity government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds.

Those objections were not a surprise. Everyone knew Sunni Arabs are desperately afraid that Iraq will be split into three parts and leave them with little oil.

The surprise was how quickly and widely Mr. Hakim's gambit seemed to unite others against him, including a substantial portion of his own Shiite coalition that has its own doubts about moving quickly to regional autonomy. These legislators include a faction led by Moktada al-Sadr, the firebrand cleric who has wide support among Shiites in city slums and poor rural regions and is a rival of Mr. Hakim's for power in the coalition.

Regardless of whether the federalism proposal eventually passes, the fight has now exposed the divisions within the Shiite coalition in the Parliament itself, and it has illustrated the growth of Mr. Sadr's influence relative to Mr. Hakim.

Mr. Hakim's party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri, wants the Shiite-dominated southern provinces to be allowed to form one huge autonomous state, beneath which would lie billions of barrels of oil.

But other Shiite parties, some analysts say, are hesitant to back so grand a vision because such a huge autonomous region could one day fall under the sway of one party — Mr. Hakim's. And that could marginalize the power of others like the Sadr and Fadhila parties, whose support is more concentrated in distinct areas.

Those loyal to Mr. Hakim contend he will ultimately prevail on the federalism proposal, which has the support of the Kurdish political bloc. They say meetings of political leaders in coming days may lead to a deal as soon as Tuesday. But even they admit this is not for certain.

"We are still in the middle of discussions," said Haitham al-Husseini, an adviser to Mr. Hakim. A Sunni sense of indignity figures strongly in those discussions. The new Constitution allows federal states, but it was approved in last October's referendum only after Sunni leaders won a provision requiring Parliament to reconsider provisions promptly that troubled the Sunnis. The charter also requires Parliament to define, by a set deadline, how autonomous regions could be formed. Neither has happened.

Mr. Husseini denied that Mr. Hakim's party had tried to rush the bill through. "In fact, we think it is a bit late," he said, citing the time limit in the Constitution.

But Basim Sharif, a leader of the Fadhila Party, says Iraq needs better security, and political and social foundations before autonomous states form.

So the opposition can take heart that it has delayed the proposal. The Sadr coalition takes the position that any move to split Iraq into federal states should be delayed until the "occupiers" — meaning the Americans — leave.

"We know the Americans interfere even in minor things," said Bahaa al-Aaraji, a top Sadr aide. "What about an important issue like federalism?" There is no room for compromise, he says. "We refuse it. That's it."

As Deaths Rise, Sunnis Criticize Baghdad Plan (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 16 — Dozens more bodies have been discovered in Baghdad in the past two days, bringing the four-day total to at least 165 and prompting some Sunni Arab leaders to raise new questions about the recent security operation intended take back Baghdad from the insurgents, deaths squads and militias who have been waging sectarian warfare.

"If the result of the security plan is an increase in bodies and killings according to their identification, I think it moves toward a catastrophe," said Dhafir al-Ani, a senior member of the main Sunni Arab political bloc in Parliament.

At least 21 bodies were discovered throughout the capital on Saturday after 35 were found Friday, Iraqi police officials said.

Most of those bodies were found between 6 a.m. Friday and 6 a.m. Saturday, according to an Interior Ministry official. He said many victims had clear signs of torture or had been blindfolded, gagged or shot in the head at close range.

On Thursday, the senior American military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, said scores of mutilated bodies found in the middle of the week appeared to be "from murder execution-style type activity." He said the rise in killings was occurring in parts of Baghdad where American forces had not swept through as part of the new security push.

A senior Iraqi police spokesman, Brig. Gen. Abdul Karim Khalaf, said in an interview on Saturday that the bodies discovered over the past two days were being found "all over Baghdad." He blamed "insurgents, Al Qaeda, and groups related to the Baath Party." These perpetrators, he said, "know how to kill and how to torture."

Yet Sunni Arab leaders have voiced increasing concern that the Iraqi government has failed to crack down on death squads linked to Shiite militias that have run rampant since the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February unleashed a wave of sectarian violence.

"The government should be brave this time and work seriously to end the militias that now work freely" throughout the capital, Mr. Ani said in an interview on Saturday. Many people who are killed are not identified, or the government never announces their names, he said, adding, "The real number of the people who are killed is more than what is announced."

48 More Bodies Found Dumped In Baghdad (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Most of the victims were bound, tortured and shot, the Interior Ministry says. Bombings and gun battles around Iraq add to the toll.

BAGHDAD — Police said Saturday that they had recovered 48 bodies throughout Baghdad, bringing the toll from clandestine killings since Monday to about 190 people, most of them shot execution-style.

The vast majority of the bodies found during a 24-hour period in Baghdad were of young men who had been tortured, blindfolded and handcuffed before being shot several times, said Capt. Mohammed Hanoon of the Interior Ministry.

Securing the capital has become the top priority for American commanders in Iraq, who have deployed an additional 8,000 troops there in an effort to halt escalating sectarian violence.

To prevent fighters from entering Baghdad and to counter trafficking of explosives and arms, U.S. and Iraqi security forces are digging ditches and building berms around the capital, creating a 60-mile security perimeter, U.S. officials say.

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman, said Saturday that the plan would also use existing topographical features such as canals and rivers to stem the flow of contraband.

In the past, the military has built sand barriers around cities such as Fallouja and Tall Afar before major combat operations there. But Baghdad is a far more complex problem.

The deadliest threat is not explosives or large-scale attacks by Sunni-led insurgents but rather secret executions. Shiite-dominated Iraqi security forces have been accused of carrying out systematic killings of Sunni residents in the capital.

During a news conference Saturday, Iraqi Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul Khalaf said digging a trench around Baghdad was just one idea among many.

"It's still under discussion," he said.

As police recovered the bodies Saturday, several bombs targeted civilians, politicians and security forces in the capital.

In one attack, insurgents had allegedly placed explosives in or near a corpse, detonating the bomb when the Iraqi army arrived to pick up the body. One soldier died and three people were injured.

Armed men attacked police at a Baghdad checkpoint near the Sheraton Hotel, starting a gun battle with hotel guards, authorities said.

Meanwhile, a suicide attacker killed one civilian and injured 22 in an attack on a police station in the Dora neighborhood of southern Baghdad.

North of Baghdad near Baqubah, a bomb exploded near a police patrol, killing three officers and injuring one.

A second bomb — left in a bag near a downtown shopping area — killed one person and injured four.

A third bomb killed three police officers and injured two in Zafarniya.

In Saddam Hussein's hometown, Tikrit, north of Baghdad, police and witnesses described intense fighting involving rifles, machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades.

One witness, Salim Shammari, a 43-year-old taxi driver, said he watched four armed men attack the municipal building, which was guarded by American troops.

DOJ_NMG_0064679

Four armed men "shouted to everybody to leave the place," Shammari said.

They were well armed, he said.

"One of them said, 'We do not want anybody to stay here,' " Shammari recalled. "We immediately ran away." Hiding in a house, he heard fierce shooting, he said.

Police Lt. Saad Jabir said the gun battle injured several people.

Farther north, in the oil-rich city of Kirkuk, a roadside bomb exploded near a police patrol; the casualty toll was unclear. Gunmen also attacked a police checkpoint on the northern highway between Hawija and Kirkuk, injuring two policemen, officials said. Two attackers also died.

Explosions Kill 17 In Baghdad; Maliki Appeals For Unity (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal/AP, September 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- After a one-day lull, bloodshed surged again in the capital Saturday, with at least 17 people dead in attacks and 27 probable victims of sectarian killings found dumped in the streets as Iraq's prime minister launched a fresh appeal for reconciliation.

Violence has escalated sharply in Baghdad over the past week, except for Friday, when only three killings were recorded -- two Iraqis shot to death and a U.S. soldier killed by a bomb. Saturday's toll raised the city's violent deaths to more than 180 just since Wednesday -- either slain by bombs and gunfire or tortured and shot before being dumped, a hallmark of reprisal killings being waged between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki urged Iraqis Saturday to cast aside their sectarian, ethnic and political differences and embrace his national reconciliation plan. The appeal came as Iraqi security forces announced they will dig trenches around Baghdad in an attempt to prevent insurgents and explosive-laden cars from getting into the sprawling city of 6 million.

The U.S. military confirmed Saturday that there was a plan in progress to create a "security belt" around the capital. "There is a plan in progress for a security belt around Baghdad that includes trenches and other obstacles for channeling exit from and entry to the city through checkpoints controlled by Iraqi forces. This is a cooperative effort between the Iraqi government and the Coalition," said Lt Col. Barry Johnson, a spokesman for Multinational Forces in Iraq.

See continuing coverage2 of developments in Iraq, including an interactive map3 of major insurgent attacks.

The trenches are intended to curb attacks such as three car bombings Saturday morning in Baghdad that killed at least nine people and wounded dozens.

"No one should be part of the national reconciliation plan unless they recognize others, accept them as partners and totally reject any sectarian, ethnic or political differences," Mr. Maliki told a gathering of Iraqi non-governmental organizations

Addressing groups that represent children orphaned by terrorism and those disabled by war, Mr. Maliki said it was the responsibility of all Iraqis to join the effort. "National reconciliation is a correct way of thinking and carries a high feeling of responsibility," Mr. Maliki said. "To succeed in this today, we have to embrace the culture of dialogue and reconciliation."

Mr. Maliki unveiled a 24-point reconciliation plan in June that he hopes will bridge the religious, ethnic and political divisions feeding Iraq's violence. The plan includes an offer of amnesty to members of the Sunni Arab-led insurgency not involved in terrorist activities, and calls for disarming primarily Shiite sectarian militias.

But no major Sunni Arab insurgent group has publicly agreed to join the plan, and many Shiite militias are controlled by legislators themselves. Car bombings, mortar attacks and shootings have killed hundreds of Iraqis the past few weeks.

Mr. Maliki said that once the plan managed to create an "atmosphere of reconciliation and dialogue," his government would take decisions based on the views expressed both by NGO's and tribal leaders -- who last month agreed to back his effort.

"These decisions will be historic and they should be shouldered by all the groups participating in the political process, because participation means sharing responsibilities. There are no rights without a price. Those who do not take the responsibly of defending the state and its laws will would no longer be our partners in the political process."

In Saturday's violence, gunmen killed the former spokesman of a defunct political coalition that included Shiite, Sunni, Kurdish and independent parties. Mohammed Shihab al-Dulaimi was shot in central Baghdad, the leader of the Iraqi Accordance Front, Adnan Al-Duleymi, said.

A suicide car bomb aimed at U.S. and Iraqi vehicles in the capital's southern Dora district killed three Iraqis who were shopping in a market and wounded 19 people, police 1st Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razaq said. He said another car bomb killed two soldiers and a civilian downtown.

Police also reported three policemen slain by a car bomb, the shooting deaths of two civilians in separate incidents, and three civilians killed by two roadside bombs. Gunmen also killed three civilians and wounded eight in a drive-by shooting in central Baghdad, Lt. Bilal Ali Mejeed of the Risafa police station said.

In the volatile western city of Ramadi, meanwhile, a suicide bomber on a motorcycle killed three Iraqi policemen outside a hospital and a car bomb killed four officers at a checkpoint, a police official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media..

Inspired by Islamic history, the plan for a ditch around Baghdad is the newest twist in what has so far been a losing battle to prevent suicide car bombs and other weapons from being smuggled into the capital.

"Trenches will be dug around Baghdad in the coming weeks," the Interior Ministry spokesman, Brig. Abdul-Kareem Khalaf, told the Associated Press on Friday. "They will surround Baghdad." He provided no details of what distance the trenches would cover, nor how deep or wide they would be. It is about 60 miles around the edge of the city.

In Washington, U.S. President George W. Bush also mentioned a new plan to safeguard Baghdad -- but he spoke of using an earthen mound rather than a ditch.

Brig. Khalaf said the trench plan would restrict vehicle and pedestrian traffic to just 28 entry points, all with guarded checkpoints. Similar checkpoints are set up now on some central routes through Baghdad, including the highway to the airport, but they need hundreds of soldiers to man them.

He said the plan was inspired by the Battle of Khandaq -- Arabic for Battle of the Trench -- in 627, during which Prophet Muhammad protected the city of Medina from an army by digging trenches.

Vehicle bombs have killed at least 960 Iraqis and wounded 2,763 in Baghdad this year, according to an AP count. That's just over a fifth of the city's deaths from war-related violence and nearly a half of its wounded. Most of the car bombs are thought to be assembled in areas just south of Baghdad, in the so-called Triangle of Death.

There have been past operations seeking to prevent bombs from being smuggled into the capital. The first such plan -- Operation Lightning -- was launched with much fanfare in May 2005. More than 40,000 Iraqi police and soldiers, backed by U.S. troops and air support. But they failed to cut down on bombings.

A year later, as killings in Baghdad surged, a joint U.S.-Iraqi security offensive known as Operation Together Forward was launched June 15. It too has made little headway, with the city's death toll surpassing 1,500 in July and triggering fears among U.S. commanders that civil war could break out.

GIs Spared In Sectarian Strife (WT)

By Aqeel Hussein, London Sunday Telegraph

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The sectarian violence that has brought Iraq to the verge of civil war has had one unexpected benefit: a marked fall in the number of American military casualties in Baghdad.

American combat deaths in the capital are down 50 percent from the same three-month period last year and some terrorists say the United States has succeeded in deflecting attention from its own troops.

"Now we are fighting each other," said one insurgent. "That is what the Americans wanted and now they are winning."

From July to September last year, 44 U.S. personnel were killed in Baghdad. In the corresponding period this year, the figure fell to 24, a reflection, according to militia leaders, of the changing priorities of the insurgents.

Although the number of attacks on American forces in Baghdad has dropped, sectarian violence in the capital has snowballed in recent months as Sunni and Shi'ite gunmen attack each other.

Dozens of bodies turn up around the city each day, many the victims of summary execution, as Iraq edges closer to civil war.

Yesterday, another 35 bodies were found around Baghdad, bringing the total since Wednesday to more than 150. Many of the victims had been bound, tortured and shot.

With Sunnis and Shi'ites concentrating on attacking each other, they admit that they are struggling to find the time and resources to target Americans.

Hanza al Nasawi, a spokesman for Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi army, said it was not possible to keep fighting on two fronts.

"We stopped the fight against the Americans and now we are fighting against the terrorists because they are killing the Shia," he said. "We want to defend the Shia."

Nahid al Gertani, a former officer in the Republican Guard and one of the leaders of the Sunni fighters in southern Baghdad, said his forces were defending the Sunnis against the Shi'ite militias. "Our first target is the Shia militia," he said. "We made an agreement with the American Army four months ago to stop the fight."

Mr. al Gertani said the insurgents had decided to stop fighting the Americans so they could concentrate on tackling the Shi'ite militias, but emphasized that this did not reflect any thaw in relations between the two sides. "They are not our friends, and we will fight another day."

Iraqi civilians say they had recently been surprised to see U.S. troops in parts of the city where they previously would have been attacked had they ventured out. U.S. forces also are reported to have intervened to keep the warring parties apart, placing guards on the Alkubasey mosque -- a known base for Sunni fighters -- to protect it from Shi'ite attacks.

Abu Tayseer, a Baghdad councilor, said he was angry that the militias were fighting each other instead of the Americans.

"That is what the Americans wanted and now they are winning," he said.

The Pentagon said it is making progress in restoring order to Baghdad.

"Under Iraqi leadership, Operation Together Forward is continuing its advances toward reducing sectarian violence and terrorist attacks," said Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Pentagon spokesman.

"We are cautiously optimistic that the cycle of retaliatory violence has slowed in targeted areas, but we also recognize that the real measurement of this progress must be seen over time."

How Bad Is The Senate Intelligence Report? (WKST)

By Stephen F. Hayes

Weekly Standard, September 17, 2006

Very Bad

According to a report released September 8 by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Saddam Hussein "was resistant to cooperating with al Qaeda or any other Islamist groups." It's an odd claim. Saddam Hussein's regime has a long and well-documented history of cooperating with Islamists, including al Qaeda and its affiliates.

As early as 1982, the Iraqi regime was openly supporting, training, and funding the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood, an Islamist organization opposed to the secular regime of Hafez Assad. For years, Saddam Hussein cultivated warm relations with Hassan al-Turabi, the Islamist who was the de facto leader of the Sudanese terrorist state, and a man Bill Clinton described as "a buddy of [Osama] bin Laden's."

Throughout the 1990s, the Iraqi regime hosted Popular Islamic Conferences in Baghdad, gatherings modeled after conferences Turabi hosted in Khartoum. Mark Fineman, a reporter for the Los Angeles Times, attended one of the conferences and filed a story about his experience on January 26, 1993. "There are delegates from the most committed Islamic organizations on Earth," he wrote. "Afghan mujahedeen (holy warriors), Palestinian militants, Sudanese fundamentalists, the Islamic

Brotherhood and Pakistan's Party of Islam." Newsweek's Christopher Dickey attended the same conference and wrote about it in 2002. "Islamic radicals from all over the Middle East, Africa, and Asia converged on Baghdad," he wrote, "to show their solidarity with Iraq in the face of American aggression. . . . Every time I hear diplomats and politicians, whether in Washington or the capitals of Europe, declare that Saddam

Hussein is a 'secular Baathist ideologue' who has nothing to do with Islamists or terrorist calls to jihad, I think of that afternoon and I wonder what they're talking about. If that was not a fledgling Qaeda itself at the Rashid convention, it sure was Saddam's version of it."

Iraqi leaders frequently touted their Islamist credentials. "We are blessed in this country for having the Islamic holy warrior Saddam Hussein as a leader, who is guiding the country in a religious holy war against the infidels and nonbelievers," said Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, one of Saddam's top deputies, in an address to the terrorist confab. On August 27, 1998, 20 days after al Qaeda attacked the U.S. embassies in Africa, Babel, the government newspaper run by Saddam's son Uday Hussein, published an editorial proclaiming Osama bin Laden "an Arab and Islamic hero."

None of this is a secret, as the press coverage attests. But the authors of the Senate report seem determined to write it out of the history. On what basis do the authors claim that Saddam Hussein was "resistant" to cooperation with Islamists? The finding is sourced to "postwar detainee debriefs--including debriefs of Saddam Hussein and Tariq Aziz." Well then, that settles it.

But why take Saddam's word for it? This is, after all, the same man who claims that he is the president of Iraq. Even assuming the man isn't a pathological liar, isn't it the case that detainees interrogated by a government fighting a global war on terror might have an incentive to understate their complicity in global terror?

This appears to have occurred to the report's authors. "The Committee believes that the results of detainee debriefs largely comport with documentary evidence, but the Committee cannot definitively judge the accuracy of statements made by individuals in custody and cannot, in every case, confirm that detainee statements are truthful and accurate."

In fact, it's not clear that the results of the detainee debriefs do, in fact, largely comport with the documentary evidence. What is clear is that where there was a conflict, the committee almost always chose to disregard the documentary evidence in favor of the debriefings, sometimes to comical effect. According to the report, Saddam Hussein was asked whether he might cooperate with al Qaeda because "the enemy of the enemy is my friend." The report dutifully--and uncritically--offers his response. "Saddam answered that the United States was not Iraq's enemy. He claimed that Iraq only opposed U.S. policies."

Really? That's hard to reconcile with these instructions from Saddam Hussein in a 1993 address. "Attack them, our beloved people," Saddam ordered in a speech broadcast on Iraqi television. "You are the glory of our nation. Attack them." Or this editorial: "American and British interests, embassies, and naval ships in the Arab region should be the targets of military operations and commando attacks by Arab political forces," argued Uday Hussein's newspaper Babel on November 15, 1997.

A statement from Saddam's Baath party on November 8, 1998, called for "the highest levels of jihad" against American interests. "The escalation of the confrontation and the disclosure of its dimensions and the aggressive intentions now require an organized, planned, influential and conclusive enthusiasm against U.S. interests."

And Saddam Hussein celebrated the attacks on September 11, 2001. "The American cowboys are reaping the fruit of their crimes against humanity," he declared just days after the worst terrorist attack on American soil.

These are just four examples out of dozens. Despite his claims to the contrary, Saddam Hussein regarded the United States as an enemy. And for years he demonstrated his willingness to work with Islamists by, among other things, working with Islamists. The Senate report fails to provide any of this contextual balance to the denials of detained Iraqi officials. It is a revealing omission that raises serious doubts about the quality of the reporting throughout the 52 pages examining Iraq's links to al Qaeda.

There is much to quarrel with in the report. But it is worth spending a moment to consider the vast amount of information that was left out of the committee's treatment of Iraq's links to al Qaeda. A few examples:

There is no mention in the report of Abdul Rahman Yasin, an Iraqi who admitted mixing the chemicals for the bomb used in the 1993 World Trade Center attack, cited in the July 2004 Senate report as an al Qaeda operation. The mastermind of that attack, Ramzi Yousef, is the nephew of 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. Two weeks after the bombing, according a

July 2004 report issued by the same Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Yasin fled to Iraq with Iraqi assistance. ABC News reported in 1994 that a Baghdad neighbor of Yasin's told them that he travels freely and "works for the government."

There is no mention of documents recovered in postwar Iraq confirming that the Iraqi regime provided Yasin with housing and funding after his return to Iraq until the beginning of the Iraq War in 2003. Vice President Dick Cheney has discussed these documents in television and radio interviews.

There is no mention of documents unearthed by reporters with the Toronto Star and the London Telegraph. The documents, expense reports from the Iraqi Intelligence Service, contain an exchange of memos between IIS officers about who will pay for a March 1998 trip to Baghdad by a "trusted confidante" of Osama bin Laden. The documents were provided to the U.S. intelligence community. "I have no doubt that what we found is the real thing," wrote Mitch Potter, a reporter for the Toronto Star, and one of the journalists who found the documents in the bombed-out headquarters of the Iraqi Intelligence Service days after the fall of Baghdad. Intelligence and military sources tell THE WEEKLY STANDARD that the documents are corroborated by telephone intercepts from March 1998.

There is no mention of documents showing that the Iraqi regime cultivated a relationship with bin Laden's chief deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, throughout the 1990s. Time magazine's Joe Klein, an Iraq War critic who is dubious of a broader Iraq-al Qaeda relationship, noted last week: "Documents indicate that Saddam had long-term, low-level ties with regional terrorist groups--including Ayman al-Zawahiri, dating back to his time with the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood. There is strong evidence as well that elements of the Special Republican Guard ran terrorist training camps." (One quibble: Is it possible for the leader of Iraq to have "low-level" ties with the leader of Egyptian Islamic Jihad?) The 9/11 Commission reported that Zawahiri "had ties of his own to the Iraqis." In June 2003, U.S. News & World Report described what a defense official called a "potentially significant link" between Iraq and al Qaeda that came, at that early date, from a single source. "A captured senior member of the Mukhabarat, Iraq's intelligence service, has told interrogators about meetings between Iraqi intelligence officials and top members of the Egyptian Islamic Jihad, a group that merged with al Qaeda in the 1990s. The prisoner also described $300,000 in Iraqi transfers to the organization to pay for attacks in Egypt. The transfers were said to have been authorized by Saddam Hussein."

There is no mention of captured Iraqi documents that indicate the regime was providing financial support to Abu Sayyaf, an al Qaeda affiliate group in the Philippines. On June 6, 2001, the Iraqi ambassador to the Philippines, Salah Samarmad, faxed an eight-page report on an Abu Sayyaf kidnapping to the Iraqi Foreign Ministry. According to the fax, the Iraqi Intelligence Service had provided assistance to Abu Sayyaf, but following the high-profile kidnapping decided to suspend this support. According to the document: "The kidnappers were formerly (from the previous year) receiving money and purchasing combat weapons. From now on we (IIS) are not giving them this opportunity and are not on speaking terms with them."

There is no mention of alleged Iraqi complicity in Abu Sayyaf attacks in October 2002 that claimed the life of U.S. Special Forces soldier Mark Wayne Jackson. One week after that attack, Filipino authorities recovered a cell phone that was to have detonated a bomb placed on the playground of a local elementary school. The cell phone , which belonged to an Abu Sayyaf terrorist, had been used to make calls to Abu Sayyaf leaders. Investigators also discovered that the phone had also been used to call Hisham Hussein, the second secretary of the Iraqi Embassy in Manila, just 17 hours after the attack that took the life of the American soldier. Hussein was ordered out of the Philippines for his associations with terrorist groups, including Abu Sayyaf.

There is no mention of the Clinton administration's 1998 indictment of Osama bin Laden, which noted that al Qaeda had "reached an understanding with the government of Iraq that al Qaeda would not work against that government and that on particular projects, specifically including weapons development, al Qaeda would work cooperatively with the Government of Iraq." The language was dropped from a superseding indictment of bin Laden, after the August 7, 1998, East Africa embassy bombings allowed prosecutors to narrow their charges. Patrick Fitzgerald, a U.S. attorney involved in preparing the original indictment (who would later gain national prominence in the CIA leak case), testified before the 9/11 Commission. He told the panel that the claim in the indictment came from Jamal al Fadl, who told prosecutors that a senior Iraqi member of al Qaeda, Mamdouh Mahmud Salim, had worked out the agreement between Iraq and al Qaeda. According to Fitzgerald's testimony, Salim "tried to reach a sort of agreement where they wouldn't work against each other--sort of the enemy of my enemy is my friend--and that there were indications that within Sudan when al Qaeda was there, which al Qaeda left in the summer of '96, or the spring of '96, there were efforts to work on jointly acquiring weapons."

There is no mention of the Clinton administration's many public claims that Iraq was working with al Qaeda on chemical weapons development in Sudan. According to the 9/11 Commission Report, the passage in the indictment of bin Laden "led [Richard] Clarke, who for years had read intelligence reports on Iraqi-Sudanese cooperation on chemical weapons, to speculate to [National Security Adviser Sandy] Berger that a large Iraqi presence at chemical facilities in Khartoum was 'probably a direct result of the Iraq-al Qaeda agreement.' Clarke added that VX precursor traces found near al Shifa were the 'exact formula used by Iraq.'"

There is no mention of telephone intercepts, cited by a "senior intelligence official" in August 1998, connecting al Shifa officials with Emad al Ani, the father of Iraq's VX program. William Cohen, secretary of defense under Bill Clinton, reviewed the intelligence in testimony before the 9/11 Commission on March 23, 2004, and claimed that the plant owner had visited Baghdad to meet al Ani. "This particular facility [al Shifa], according to the intelligence we had at that time, had been constructed under extra ordinary security circumstances, even with some surface-to-air missile capability or defense capabilities; that the plant itself had been constructed under these security measures; that the--that the plant had been funded, in part, by the so-called Military Industrial Corporation; that bin Laden had been living there; that he had, in fact, money that he had put into this Military Industrial Corporation; that the owner of the plant had traveled to Baghdad to meet with the father of the VX program."

On it goes. In addition, there are numerous omissions that could shed light on Iraq's involvement in trans regional terrorism more broadly.

There is no mention of Iraqi documents first reported in a monograph published by the Joint Forces Command after 18 months' study of prewar Iraq. According to their report, called The Iraqi Perspectives Project:

Beginning in 1994, the Fedayeen Saddam opened its own paramilitary training camps for volunteers, graduating more than 7,200 "good men racing full with courage and enthusiasm" in the first year. Beginning in 1998, these camps began hosting "Arab volunteers from Egypt, Palestine, Jordan, 'the Gulf,' and Syria." It is not clear from available evidence where all of these non-Iraqi volunteers who were "sacrificing for the cause" went to ply their newfound skills. Before the summer of 2002, most volunteers went home upon the completion of training. But these camps were humming with frenzied activity in the months immediately prior to the war. As late as January 2003, the volunteers participated in a special training event called the "Heroes Attack." This training event was designed in part to prepare regional Fedayeen Saddam commands to "obstruct the enemy from achieving his goal and to support keeping peace and stability in the province."

There is no mention of Iraqi documents discussing "Blessed July," a planned wave of terrorist attacks that was also first reported in The Iraqi Perspectives Project study.

According to the report: "The Saddam Fedayeen also took part in the regime's domestic terrorism operations and planned for attacks throughout Europe and the Middle East. In a document dated May 1999, Saddam's older son, Uday, ordered preparations for 'special operations, assassinations, and bombings, for the centers and traitor symbols in London, Iran and the self-ruled areas [Kurdistan].' Preparations for 'Blessed July,' a regime-directed wave of 'martyrdom' operations against targets in the West, were well under way at the time of the coalition invasion."

It is the uneven treatment of Iraqi documents that provides perhaps the best window into the mindset of the writers of the Iraq-al Qaeda section of the Senate report. The first sentence of that section reads: "The purpose of this section is to assess the accuracy of the Intelligence Community's prewar analysis on links between the regime of Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda using information collected since Operation Iraqi Freedom."

The Senate report concedes that the document exploitation process in Iraq is incomplete, but it cavalierly assures readers that nothing significant will be found. "While document exploitation continues, additional reviews of documents recovered in Iraq are unlikely to provide information that would contradict the Committee's findings or conclusions."

Such an assessment is at best premature according to intelligence officials familiar with the document exploitation project. "Given my past participation in this realm and my current status it would be imprudent to get into detail," writes Michael Tanji, a former senior Defense Intelligence Agency official who helped lead the document exploitation effort for 18 months. "Suffice it to say that when you are counting sheets of paper by hundreds-of-millions (not to mention other forms of media that have been obtained that threaten to dwarf paper holdings) and your methodology is somewhere between inadequate and woeful, saying that you have a strong grasp on what was and wasn't going on in Iraq based on an 'initial review' is akin to saying that you don't need to read the bible because you've memorized the ten commandments . . . in pig Latin."

As of March 2006, three years after the start of the Iraq War, the document exploitation project run by the Defense Intelligence Agency had fully translated fewer than 5 percent of the documents captured in postwar Iraq. The Senate report, in an apparent effort to appear more authoritative, uses a different measurement. The authors tell us that 34 million pages out of some 120 million have been "translated and summarized to some extent." Thirty-four millions pages seems like an impressive number. But think about it. Just 28 percent of captured Iraqi documents have been "translated and summarized to some extent." That is hardly the kind of exhaustive analysis that would permit meaningful conclusions.

And, in any case, there are reasons to be skeptical of those estimates. Intelligence officials familiar with the DOCEX project say that the numbers in the report are inflated in an effort to impress congressional overseers. If just the cover sheet on a 200-page document has been read once and summarized, for example, all 200 pages are counted toward the total number of documents that have been exploited "to some extent." A translator who read only the cover sheet on the eight-page fax from Manila to Baghdad would have missed the revelation that Iraq had been providing money and arms to Abu Sayyaf. But for the purposes of the Senate report, that important document would have made the list of documents "translated and summarized to some extent." The real number of fully exploited documents, according to those familiar with the DOCEX project, remains in the single digits. The report's oracular assurances--that further exploitation is "unlikely" to change our understanding of Iraqi links to al Qaeda--is both deeply revealing and deeply troubling.

Where the report isn't tendentious, it is sloppy. Key names are misspelled; it's "Shakir" on one page, and "Shakhir" on another, which might be thought trivial. But consider: The writers of the report seem not to understand that "Shaykh Salman al-Awdah" and "Shaikh Sulayman al-Udah" is the same person and that he was an important spiritual mentor to al Qaeda and its leadership. At another point, the report claims that Saddam Hussein considered al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi an "outlaw." In the body of the report, the claim is attributed to a senior Iraqi official; in its conclusions the same information is attributed to an "al Qaeda detainee."

Where the report isn't tendentious and sloppy, it's confused. Saddam Hussein and his cronies disclaim any relationship and yet the Senate report itself cites two authenticated documents in which the Iraqi Intelligence Service (IIS) itself discussed the "relationship" between Iraq and al Qaeda. A 1992 document notes that bin Laden is "a Saudi opposition official in Afghanistan" and claims "the Syria [IIS] section has a relationship with him." An Iraqi Intelligence document describing the connections between Iraq and al Qaeda in 1997 notes that "through dialogue and agreements we will leave the door open to further develop the relationship and cooperation between both sides."

In its conclusions, the Senate report once again sets aside this documentary evidence of a relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda and defers to the claims of Saddam Hussein and other Iraqi detainees. "Postwar findings indicate that Saddam Hussein was distrustful of al Qaeda and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime, refusing all requests from al Qaeda to provide material or operational support." Perhaps the documents don't count as "findings."

The Senate report is rife with such selective reading of the evidence. Consider the case of Ahmed Hikmat Shakir. Here is the report's treatment of Shakir.

The second lead centered on contact between Ahmad Hikat Shakir al-Azzawi, an Iraqi national, and [9/11] hijacker Khalid al-Mihdhar, in Malaysia in January 2000. Shakir was a part-time facilitator of Arab visitors at the Kuala Lumpur airport for the Iraqi embassy. Some information alleged that the Iraqi Embassy employee who gave Shakhir [sic] his job was a former IIS officer.

The CIA assessed that Shakir, "apparently acting in his capacity as an airport facilitator, met al-Mihdhar at the airport. The two then shared a taxi to a Kuala Lumpur hotel, although airport facilitators were not responsible for providing land transportation for passengers." The two were not spotted together again. The CIA noted that Shakir's departure from Malaysia only one week after helping al-Mihdhar, "raised suspicion about his connections and intentions." The CIA added that, "Shakir's travel and past contacts linked him to a worldwide network of Sunni extremist groups and personalities including suspects in the bombing of the 1993 World Trade Center and indirectly to senior al Qaeda associates. His relationship with the embassy employee could suggest a link between Baghdad and Shakir's extremist contacts, but it could also be a case of an Iraqi expatriate finding a temporary job for a fellow national.

After Shakir's capture in 2002, a foreign government service working in partnership with the CIA reported that Shakir was not affiliated with al Qaeda and had no connections to the IIS. The information said there was "no link, clue or hint to any foreign intelligence service, radical religious group or terrorist operation."

To summarize what the report acknowledges: An Iraqi national with known contacts to Sunni extremists and employed by the Iraqi Embassy in Malaysia, facilitated the travel of a 9/11 hijacker and then disappeared one week after the encounter. That alone is interesting. Now consider what the report leaves out.

Not only did Shakir abruptly leave Malaysia one week after he helped al-Mihdhar, he had begun his job at the Iraqi Embassy only two months earlier. The Iraqi Embassy controlled his schedule. Among Shakir's "contacts" with men the report describes only as "Sunni extremists" were Musab Yasin, an Iraqi who is the brother of Abdul Rahman Yasin, discussed above for his participation in the 1993 World Trade Center attack; Ibrahim Suleiman, a Kuwaiti native whose fingerprints were found on the bombmaking manuals authorities allege were used in preparation for that attack; Zahid Sheikh Mohammed, brother of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the September 11 attacks; and Abu Hajer al Iraqi, described in U.S. court documents as Osama bin Laden's "best friend."

The Senate report tells us that "some information alleged" that Shakir's Iraqi Embassy contact had been affiliated with Iraqi Intelligence. That information also came from an Iraqi detainee. Why is it treated with skepticism when the claims of other detainees are accepted as fact?

We cite the Shakir case not because it indicates that the Iraqi regime had foreknowledge or directed the 9/11 attacks. Rather, it stands as yet another example of the Senate report's selective use of evidence and the alacrity with which its authors sought to reject alleged Iraqi ties to al Qaeda.

One of the few areas where the Senate report provides new information concerns the presence of Abu Musab al Zarqawi in Iraq before the war. According to the Senate report: "A postwar CIA assessment on al-Zarqawi notes that both captured former regime documents and former regime officials show that the IIS did respond to a foreign request for assistance in finding and extraditing al-Zarqawi for his role in the murder of U.S. diplomat Lawrence [sic] Foley. In the spring of 2002, the IIS formed a 'special committee' to track down al-Zarqawi, but was unable to locate and capture him." Those documents "also show that lower-level IIS units attempted to search for the individual."

Taken together with detainee debriefings, the documents, if authentic, certainly raise questions about the Bush administration's prewar claims, backed by CIA director George Tenet, that Zarqawi was being harbored by the Iraqi regime. The Senate report quotes a 2005 CIA analysis that concluded: "The regime did not have a relationship, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates."

The CIA report may be right. But there are several additional facts to consider in evaluating the Zarqawi-Iraq relationship, only one of which made it into the Senate report. The report notes that the Iraqi Intelligence Service received information from a foreign government service on five individuals suspected of playing a role in the assassination of U.S. AID worker Laurence Foley. One of those individuals, Abu Yasim Sayyem, was captured in early 2003.

According to the Senate report an IIS officer "was shocked when the Director of his division ordered Sayyem to be released. According to the Iraqi official, the Director of his division told him that Saddam Hussein ordered Sayyem's release." The IIS officer dismissed the possibility that the IIS was involved with al Qaeda or Zarqawi and speculated that Saddam intervened to free Sayyem because he might fight U.S. forces in the event of an invasion of Iraq.

Five additional facts not included in the Senate report provide important context. According to the July 2004 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence report on Iraq, Abu Zubaydah, a top-ranking al Qaeda official in U.S. custody, told interrogators "that he was not aware of a relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda" and that he found such a relationship "unlikely." Zubaydah "also said, however, that any relationship would be highly compartmented and went on to name al Qaeda members who he thought had good relations with the Iraqis." Among those he named? Abu Musab al Zarqawi. From the July 2004 Senate report: "Abu Zubaydah indicated that he had heard that an important al Qaeda associate, Abu Musab al Zarqawi, and others had good relationships with Iraqi Intelligence." As noted, detainee testimony should be treated with skepticism. But Zubaydah, who provided both good information and bad in his debriefings, was in a position to know about Zarqawi's associations. The two men planned a millennium attack on the Radisson Hotel in Amman, Jordan, in 1999.

Zarqawi received medical treatment at a Baghdad hospital known for treating senior Iraqi regime officials. (Initial reports that he had his leg amputated were wrong. Subsequent reporting suggests Zarqawi was treated for nasal problems.) In a 2005 interview with Al-Hayat, Jordan's King Abdullah said: "We had information that he entered Iraq from a neighboring country, where he lived, and what he was doing. We informed the Iraqi authorities about all this detailed information we had, but they didn't respond." Jordanian intelligence continues to believe that the Iraqi regime knowingly harbored Zarqawi.

Muhammad al Masari, a known al Qaeda mouthpiece, told the editor of the Arabic-language newspaper Al-Quds Al-Arabi, Abdel Bari Atwan, that Saddam reached out to al Qaeda--and Zarqawi--after the fall of the Taliban in 2001 and provided funding for al Qaeda operatives to relocate to Iraq. "According to Masari, Saddam saw that Islam would be key to a cohesive resistance in the event of invasion. Iraqi army commanders were ordered to become practicing Muslims and to adopt the language and spirit of the jihadis. On arrival in Iraq, Al-Qaeda operatives were put in touch with these commanders, who later facilitated the distribution of arms and money from Saddam's caches."

Finally, when Zarqawi returned to Iraq after the war, he teamed up almost immediately with a cadre of former Iraqi Intelligence officials to conduct attacks on U.S. troops and softer targets in Iraq.

Not only is the Senate report's section on Zarqawi woefully incomplete, it is contradictory. The report's conclusions echo the CIA finding: "Postwar information indicates that Saddam Hussein attempted, unsuccessfully, to locate and capture al-Zarqawi and that the regime did not have a relationship with, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi." That Saddam Hussein himself ordered a Zarqawi associate freed--if the IIS officer's reporting is accurate--suggests that the Iraqi regime at the very least turned a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his network.

The mainstream press has treated the Senate report as the definitive word on Iraqi links to al Qaeda. It is not. It is worth remembering that while critics of the Bush administration have long since decided that there was no relationship at all between the Iraqi regime and al Qaeda, there are many observers who continue to hold a different view. If these individuals disagree on the extent of the relationship and its meaning, they agree that there was one.

"There was no question in our minds that there was a relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda," said 9/11 Commission co-chairman Thomas Kean.

"Saddam Hussein's regime welcomed them with open arms and young al Qaeda members entered Iraq in large numbers, setting up an organization to confront the occupation," said Hudayfa Azzam, the son of bin Laden's longtime mentor Abdullah Azzam.

"I believe very strongly that Saddam had relations with al Qaeda," said former Iraqi prime minister and longtime CIA asset Ayad Allawi. "And these relations started in Sudan. We know Saddam had relationships with a lot of terrorists and international terrorism."

"What our report said really supports what the administration, in its straight presentations, has said," noted 9/11 Commissioner John Lehman. "There were numerous contacts; there's evidence of collaboration on weapons. And we found earlier, we reported earlier, that there was VX gas that was clearly from Iraq in the Sudan site that President Clinton hit. And we have significant evidence that there were contacts over the years and cooperation, although nothing that would be operational."

And late last week, following the release of the Senate report, Barham Salih, deputy prime minister of Iraq, had this to say: "The alliance between the Baathists and jihadists which sustains al Qaeda in Iraq is not new, contrary to what you may have been told." Salih continued: "I know this at first hand. Some of my friends were murdered by jihadists, by al Qaeda-affiliated operatives who had been sheltered and assisted by Saddam's regime."

Some day there will be an authoritative and richly detailed history of the nature of the relationship between the Iraqi regime of Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden's al Qaeda and other Islamist terror groups. This latest product of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence is unlikely to merit even a footnote in this history.

Terrorist Ties (WT)

By Deroy Murdock

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064688

Iraq war critics trumpet a Sept. 8 Senate Intelligence Committee report that concluded Saddam Hussein knew nothing about the September 11, 2001, attacks. Hence, the argument goes, he had no connection to al Qaeda, and therefore lacked ties to Islamic terrorists. In short: "Bush Lied, People Died."

This seriously flawed report relies on unreliable witnesses, ignores potential and actual evidence of Saddam's philanthropy of terror, and yet quietly acknowledges he, in fact, worked with terrorists. If Saddam's lawyers seek a clean bill of health for their client, this isn't it.

For starters, the report's sources include "multiple detainees -- including Saddam and former Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz." Both are on trial and could face severe punishment. Their exculpatory remarks should be highly suspect, but appear valid to Senate Intelligence staffers. On Page 67, their report paraphrases Saddam's statement that he eschewed al Qaeda's anti-Americanism because "the United States was not Iraq's enemy." Perhaps he merely was being playful when he fired almost daily at U.S. aircraft patrolling the No-Fly Zone and attempted to assassinate former President George H.W. Bush in 1993. Indeed, on Page 68, Mr. Aziz offers the FBI Saddam's response to al Qaeda's August 1998 bombing of U.S. Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Saddam "was pleased at the act of terrorism because the U.S. had bombed Iraq during the first Gulf war and tried to kill Saddam. Saddam thought al Qaeda was an effective organization."

The report also quotes captured Iraqi documents. Among some 120 million such papers, only 34 million have been "translated and summarized to some extent" to speed analysis. Nevertheless, with nearly 72 percent of these records still unusable, the report concludes: "additional reviews of documents in Iraq are unlikely to provide information that would contradict the committee's findings or conclusions." Or, in plain English: "Don't confuse us with data. Trust us. We're psychic."

This report overlooks numerous indications, some firmer than others, that Saddam supported the September 11 conspiracy specifically and al Qaeda broadly, among other Islamic terrorist groups. Consider:

The report disregards the May 7, 2003, decision of Clinton-appointed U.S. District Court Judge Harold Baer Jr. that Baghdad backed the September 11 attack. Judge Baer awarded $104 million in damages from the Ba'athist regime to the families of George Eric Smith and Timothy Soulas, both killed at the World Trade Center. As Judge Baer ruled: "I conclude that plaintiffs have shown, albeit barely --by evidence satisfactory to the court -- that Iraq provided material support to bin Laden and al Qaeda."

The report misses the fact that the architect of the 1993 World Trade Center attack, Ramzi Yousef -- nephew of September 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed -- landed in America on an Iraqi passport. Nor does it mention Indiana-born, Iraqi-bred Abdul Rahman Yasin, the al Qaeda operative who built the 1993 WTC bomb that killed six and injured 1,040. He fled to Iraq and, documents show, received a house and salary from Saddam's regime. As Sheila MacVicar reported for ABC News on July 27, 1994: "Last week, [TV program] 'Day One' confirmed [Yasin] is in Baghdad. Just a few days ago, he was seen at [his father's] house by ABC News. Neighbors told us Yasin comes and goes freely."

The report forgets that President Clinton's State Department designated Iraq a state sponsor of terrorism as early as 1993. "Iraq continued to plan and sponsor international terrorism in 1999," State later declared. Baghdad "continued to provide safe haven and support to various terrorist groups."

The Senate document concedes "Saddam's record of support for secular terrorist organizations like the Palestinian Liberation Front," but then breezes past his $10,000, then $25,000, reward checks to the families of Palestinian homicide bombers. Between the $15,000 boost in these bonuses on March 11, 2002, and the March 20, 2003, launch of Operation Iraqi Freedom, 28 such killers wounded 1,209 people and murdered 223 more, including at least eight Americans.

While Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have tried to answer this paper, President Bush himself should deliver several major addresses detailing Saddam's extensive terror record.

Educating the public with new, declassified information would help counteract the "Bush lied us into war" chorus. If this left-wing cantata goes unchallenged, it could cost Republicans control of Congress and leave Mr. Bush exposed to greater indignities -- including impeachment.

U.S., Afghan Troops Launch Offensive (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Thousands of American and Afghan troops unleashed a new offensive against Taliban militants in eastern Afghanistan on Saturday in an effort to expand the government's reach into the volatile Pakistani border region.

The operation comes as a NATO-led force, including 2,500 U.S. soldiers, is launching heavy attacks on militants in Afghanistan's south, claiming to have killed hundreds of guerrillas over the past two weeks.

In London, the commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan said Saturday he expects the military campaign against the Taliban to last another three to five years.

The new offensive is "just one part of a series of coordinated operations placing continuous pressure on Taliban extremists ... in order to provide security to the population, extend the government to the people and to increase reconstruction," the military said in a statement.

Dubbed Operation Mountain Fury, the offensive involves 7,000 U.S. and Afghan soldiers in the central and eastern provinces of Paktika, Khost, Ghazni, Paktya and Logar, the military said. Fighter planes and helicopters will back the forces.

Taliban and other Islamic extremist groups, including al-Qaida, are known to operate in the region, especially in the area bordering Pakistan where the reach of the government is weak and militants find sanctuaries.

Highlighting the dangers the troops face, two separate insurgent attacks on a military base in Khost province killed a U.S.-led coalition soldier and wounded another on Friday, the military said. A number of Afghan troops also were wounded, a statement said.

A suspected suicide bomber also blew himself up in the same province when explosives strapped to his body went off prematurely as he approached a police checkpoint on Saturday. Nobody else was injured in the blast, police said.

The U.S. military said troops have been preparing for weeks for Mountain Fury but launched its "maneuver phase" early Saturday. A separate U.S.-led operation called Big Northern Wind has been under way in neighboring Kunar province's Korangal Valley since late August.

The offensives come as the country is going through its bloodiest phase since the U.S.-led invasion ousted the hard-line Taliban from power in 2001.

Lt. Gen. David Richards of Britain, who took command of the 8,000-strong NATO force last month, said predicted the campaign to crush the Taliban would take three to five more years and added he was determined to succeed.

He told Channel 4 News fighting in the turbulent southern province of Helmand had been "very intense" until about two weeks ago but that the Taliban had lost many fighters.

"Although in a way we were not able to maneuver as freely as we would have wished perhaps, we have, I think, created an environment in which most people, including many Taliban, have just had enough fighting."

According to an Associated Press count based on reports from U.S., NATO and Afghan officials, 2,800 people have died so far this year in violence nationwide, including militants and civilians — about 1,300 more than the toll for all of 2005.

"Mountain Fury will continue until the conditions of bringing security, construction and growth are met," Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, the top U.S. operational commander, said in a statement.

"The Afghan people are tired of war. They want what their government is capable of providing: security, employment, education and a better way of life," Freakley said.

Elsewhere, NATO troops and aircraft in the country's southern Uruzgan province killed 17 suspected insurgents placing roadside bombs near a military base Friday, the alliance said.

About 60 suspected Taliban militants also attacked a police checkpoint in southern Afghanistan Friday, sparking a battle in which four militants died, police said.

NATO and Afghan soldiers came to the aid of police after the insurgents attacked the checkpoint near the district police headquarters in the Khas Uruzgan district of southern Uruzgan province, said Mohammad Zahir, the district police chief.

Afghan security forces and NATO suffered no casualties. Police recovered the bodies of four suspected Taliban fighters along with their weapons, Zahir said.

Separately, a bomb blast south of the Afghan capital killed three security guards and wounded another on Saturday, police said.

The remote-controlled device went off as a car carrying four Afghans passed on the main road in the Musayi district of Kabul province, said Ali Shah Paktiawal, a police official.

The victims were all working for local private security firms which provides services to local and international non-governmental organizations, said Mohammad Daud Nadim, regional police chief. All four were armed at the time of the blast, he said.

Road Blast In Afghanistan Kills Three Aid Workers (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Anti-Taliban Offensive Launched in 5 Provinces

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 16 -- Three Afghan aid workers were killed Saturday when their vehicle hit a bomb on a highway just south of the capital, while 7,000 Afghan and U.S. troops launched an operation against Taliban insurgents in five eastern and central provinces.

Police said the unidentified aid workers were killed and a fourth was injured when a remote-controlled bomb exploded under their vehicle. The attack was the fourth major bombing in eight days.

Aside from insurgent and military activity, the populace remained calm Saturday as news began to circulate of comments about Islam made earlier this week by Pope Benedict XVI. The remarks, which included a medieval reference to Islam as "evil and inhuman" and "spread by the sword," have angered Muslims around the world.

"We heard about it on the radio, and it seems the pope wants to create a crisis. This is an insult to all Muslims and an ignorant attack on Islam," said Enayatullah Balegh, a leading cleric. But he added: "We do not favor any violence or protest, because Kabul is not secure and someone might take advantage of it. We will show our anger in words."

The Foreign Affairs Ministry said the pope's words showed an "improper understanding of Islam" and called on him to apologize to all Muslims. In a statement, the ministry said that world leaders, instead of "inciting violence and tension," should help bring followers of different religions "closer to each other."

Afghanistan, a conservative Muslim country run by a moderate, elected government, is experiencing an insurgency by thousands of fighters loyal to the Taliban, an extremist Islamic movement that ruled for six years and was ousted by a U.S.-led invasion in 2001.

In recent months, the Taliban has unleashed the worst wave of violence in more than four years across southern Afghanistan and in other provinces. Attacks have been carried out by several hundred forces and by lone suicide bombers.

In the latest of several offensives against the Taliban, officials said that 4,000 Afghan soldiers and police accompanied by 3,000 U.S. troops began moving Saturday into five provinces that have experienced increasing insurgent violence -- Khost, Ghazni, Paktia, Paktika and Logar.

U.S. military officials here said the operation, called Mountain Fury, was one of several aimed at "placing continuous pressure on Taliban extremists" in order to bring security, governance and development to impoverished rural regions.

The officials said the operation would be accompanied by $43 million in aid projects, including new schools, roads, bridges and 26 district administration centers. Taliban forces have attacked and destroyed such district centers in remote areas of several provinces.

"While we offer stability, governance and reconstruction, the Taliban offer oppression and violence in the form of killing innocent Afghans attending funerals, burning schools and murdering effective governors," Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, senior commander of U.S. forces here, said in a statement.

Hakim Taniwal, 63, the governor of Paktia province, was assassinated by a suicide bomber last Sunday. The next day, a suicide bomber detonated explosives at Taniwal's funeral in the governor's native Khost province, killing six people.

DOJ_NMG_0064691

In the southern province of Kandahar, where 10,000 NATO troops have been battling Taliban fighters for nearly two weeks, NATO officials said Saturday that they had killed more than 500 insurgents and liberated two districts near the provincial capital that the Taliban had attempted to capture and hold.

The NATO forces are being assisted by 2,500 U.S. soldiers, including helicopter crews.

"This was a decisive success," said Mark Laity, a NATO spokesman in Kabul. He said the Taliban had drawn fighters from many areas to take a stand in the Panjwai and Zhari districts. "They fought for a long time, and they lost," he said. "This will force the Taliban to think seriously about whether they can stand and fight elsewhere."

But Taliban forces took their fight to other parts of the country, including previously calm regions as well as the national capital area. The governor of remote Nimruz province in the southwest appealed for help after insurgents seized a stretch of a highway that connects Afghanistan with Iran.

In Khost province, an American soldier was killed in an attack on a U.S. base. Officials said he was training troops in the new Afghan army. Several other Afghan and U.S. soldiers were wounded in that attack and a second one on the same base.

U.S. troops are also involved in a separate anti-Taliban operation in the eastern province of Konar, where they are fighting insurgents and assisting in development projects. A major new bridge over the Pech River will be inaugurated by U.S. and Afghan officials next week.

When Hit By The Enemy, Troops Are Taught To Send This Strong Message: Ordinary Afghans Can Trust Them. (PHI)

By Andrew Maykuth

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 17, 2006

One in an occasional series.

INQUIRER STAFF WRITER

PECH RIVER VALLEY, Afghanistan - The soldiers of C Company huddled around the radio as the bad news spread: Insurgents had ambushed a platoon about 10 miles upriver, killing the turret gunner of an armored humvee.

"One KIA," said First Sgt. John Mengels, a 20-year veteran, swearing under his breath. "One wounded."

A quiet rage ran through the main camp in eastern Afghanistan that day, Aug. 17. Army Capt. Robert Stanton, the company commander, hovered over a topographical map with one of his platoon leaders, jabbing at routes the Taliban might take to flee into the Hindu Kush mountains.

The Americans' instincts told them to strike back with great force - to send a strong message to anyone associated with the militants who had set up the ambush. But their training instructed them to retaliate only when the time was right, at precisely the right target - that winning over the population was just as important as killing the enemy.

"A lot of Afghans are sitting on the fence," said Mengels, 43, who has also served in Iraq. "If you are careful, they see that, and they come to your side. But if you kill the wrong people, it's damage that takes months - years - to recover from."

Five years after America launched the war on terrorism here after the 9/11 attacks, the battle in Afghanistan has evolved into a protracted counterinsurgency campaign stretching along much of the 1,500-mile Pakistani border, where resurgent Taliban forces live among the Afghans or find sanctuary in tribal areas across the border.

U.S. conventional military forces, trained to employ shock-and-awe power, have retooled for a more sophisticated mission. For a year before C Company and the other units of the 10th Mountain Division's Third Brigade Combat Team were deployed to Afghanistan in March, even the lowest infantryman was drilled in the new doctrine. The soldiers learned Afghan language, culture and history. No more calling the enemy Haji - not when the Afghan government that the Americans are supporting is Muslim, too.

"We are trying to advance the state of the art in counterinsurgency here," said Col. John W. Nicholson Jr., the brigade commander whose forces are stationed in eastern Afghanistan.

But the mission is difficult and frustrating, particularly when the Taliban get infusions of money, recruits and arms from outside Afghanistan. The enemy is clever and elusive, preferring to fight from afar, using rockets or improvised explosive devices (IEDs).

"Whenever they attack us directly, we win," Mengels said. "But they fire rockets at us, and they run. Or they leave IEDs. They're like ghosts out there."

While NATO troops fighting in Afghanistan's southern deserts have received much attention, Americans are dying here in mountainous eastern Afghanistan. It's the forgotten front in a forgotten war.

Of 28 coalition deaths in Afghanistan in the last month - 10 Americans, eight Britons, eight Canadians and two French - a quarter occurred here in Konar and Nurestan provinces, a few miles from Pakistan.

In a little more than a week in August when an Inquirer reporter and photographer were embedded with forces, seven Americans died in engagements near the Pech valley.

This is the territory of the First Battalion, 32d Regiment - one of the Third Brigade's light infantry battalions now deployed in eastern Afghanistan. During six months in Afghanistan, the 1-32 has taken more casualties than it did during its yearlong deployment to Iraq.

"When I first came to Afghanistan, I actually thought it was more of a peacekeeping mission at the time," said Pvt. Adam Boguskie, a humvee gunner from Kentucky. "I couldn't have been more wrong."

Into the teeth of al-Qaeda

The Afghanistan government has never exerted much control in the severe highlands of Konar and Nurestan, where the mountains contain some of Afghanistan's only forests. Nurestan, the more northern province, is so isolated that its inhabitants converted to Islam only in the 19th century, more than a thousand years after the rest of the country.

This region traditionally has been governed by tribal groups, who conspire with smugglers and insurgents to transit arms and fighters on narrow footpaths that thread through the valleys. Before the Taliban fell, Islamic militants trained here without much risk of detection. Even after the Americans in 2002 established a base in Konar's capital, Asadabad, coalition control did not extend far beyond the wire.

"The terrorists who attacked the Trade Center were trained up here," said Stanton, the C Company commander. "It's a traditional safe haven for al-Qaeda... . They're here, they're in the country, they're very prevalent, and they don't want us here. More specifically, they don't want the government of Afghanistan to succeed."

In 2005, three members of a four-man Navy SEAL team were killed in an ambush in Konar, in the hills along the Korengal River, a Pech tributary. The militants shot down a Chinook helicopter sent to rescue the SEALs, killing all 16 aboard, the biggest blow against U.S. forces in Afghanistan since 2001.

The Americans responded with an intense campaign in the Korengal valley last fall, and followed in the spring with an assault called Operation Mountain Lion. But the militants only fled deeper into the mountains until the operations ended.

This summer, American commanders have changed their strategy. They launched an aggressive road-building program, replacing rutted gravel tracks with roads that can accommodate two lanes of traffic. The new roads allow more rapid troop movement, spur economic growth and loyalty to the government, and are far more difficult for the enemy to mine.

"Where the road ends, that's where the influence of the antigovernment elements begins," said Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the overall commander of the coalition forces.

To protect the road builders and expand the government's influence, the Army established small valley outposts manned by one or two platoons in spartan conditions.

They have crude latrines, no showers, minimal fortifications and no tents. The soldiers can shower and call their families once every two weeks, during 24-hour "refits" at the big operating bases.

"There's no Internet, no phones, no television, no radio," Stanton said. "It's literally a patch of dirt on the side of the road."

C Company moved into the Pech valley in June to protect a contractor rebuilding the 20-mile road between the American forward operating bases at Asadabad and Nangalam. Before the company established itself, IEDs routinely filled the road.

Three months later, American patrols move up and down there 24 hours a day. "Now we own this road," said Lt. Christopher Haynes, a platoon leader.

But ownership has come at a price.

The militants initially rained down rockets on the American bases or peppered them with machine gun fire at dusk.

And then there were IEDs. Even with greater control, fears lingered that militants might slip in and bury a bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0064693

"There are days when I spend the whole patrol staring at the road thinking, 'It's going to blow up,' " Haynes said.

On June 16, militants exploded a bomb beneath a six-wheeled all-terrain vehicle that carried Lt. Forrest Ewens and Sgt. Ian T. Sanchez. They were killed instantly.

As is typical after many IED strikes, a firefight broke out immediately between the Americans on the road and the militants on the high ground. The Americans said they had returned fire into the nearby village of Dag. An undetermined number of civilians were killed.

Two days later, a jittery private guarding one of the U.S. outposts fired on a car bristling with rocket-propelled grenades as it sped past the camp. It turned out to be a friendly, unmarked police vehicle. Three officers were killed.

In both cases, the soldiers have attempted to mend relations by meeting with villagers and police officers.

In a meeting in Dag, Haji Osman Jan told Lt. Timothy Lo that many villagers were still wary of the Americans, but appreciated the road project.

"People are happier, now that they know you are helping our country to rebuild," he said.

'It has become personal'

A big part of C Company's routine is "village assessments," which often last a week. A platoon of foot soldiers, each hauling 100 pounds of equipment and Kevlar body armor, hikes into the mountains to live in small villages, gathering intelligence and information on the local needs.

On July 24, one such patrol received intelligence that a militant group had abducted a civilian friendly with the Americans, and the soldiers went in pursuit. Soon they were engaged in an intense firefight. Even Stanton, the company commander, was pinned down.

Six insurgents died, but so did David M. Hierholzer, a popular squad leader from Tennessee. The loss of Hierholzer - along with Ewens and Sanchez - stung the company.

"It took me 20 years in the Army to lose somebody close to me," Mengels said, "and it was real bad."

The soldiers blame a local militia commander, Habib Jan.

"It has become personal," Mengels said. "I don't want to leave Afghanistan with Habib Jan still alive."

More killed, then attack

There was no sign of Habib Jan in the Pech valley in August. But other militants were active.

On Aug. 11, insurgents attacked a B Company foot convoy, and three soldiers died.

On Aug. 17, A Company took the next casualty, in the Korengal valley, where the militants had supposedly been cleared out. In that ambush, turret gunner Pvt. Joseph R. Blake, 34, was shot in the head, showering blood and brains over the soldiers in his vehicle.

It was the radio news of that attack that so enraged C Company, even though it held back from pursuit.

On Aug. 19, two days later, the radio crackled again with another grim report from the Korengal.

The insurgents had struck A Company again, this time with a roadside bomb that set a humvee ablaze. Three soldiers were wounded and three killed.

The response that night was swift and powerful.

From 10 miles away, the sky rumbled with thunder from artillery fire and the primal buzz-saw of an A-10 Thunderbolt raking the mountains with its lethal Gatling gun.

The ridge line erupted in light - the soldiers said a plane had dropped a phosphorous bomb - and for a few seconds the horizon turned crimson, like hell on earth.

This time there was no holding back.

The Death Of An Afghan Optimist (WP)

By Barnett R. Rubin

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Hekmat Karzai, a cousin of President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan, called me from Kabul last Sunday. "Barney," he said. "We lost a friend today." A suicide bomber had blown up the car of Hakim Taniwal, the governor of Paktia province on

Afghanistan's frontier with Pakistan, killing him and two aides. The attack took place outside Taniwal's office, where I had gotten into the same car with him five weeks earlier, and where we had our final conversation.

I first met Taniwal in 1985 in Peshawar, Pakistan, where he had joined other intellectuals fleeing the Soviet occupation of his homeland. After the scholar and poet Said Bahauddin Majrooh was gunned down in his Peshawar home in February 1988 by radical Islamists favored by Pakistan and the CIA, these scholars started to disperse. Taniwal left for Australia, and would return to his native Afghanistan only after the Karzai government came to power.

As his name indicated, this bearded sociologist was part of the Tanai tribe, one of Afghanistan's border groups so often depicted as fierce and warlike. But Taniwal, educated in Europe, exemplified another side of tribal life -- the soft-spoken elder who leads and reconciles by wisdom and eloquence.

Hekmat Karzai, who has documented how tactics such as suicide bombing have migrated to Afghanistan from the new terrorist haven of Iraq, told me that after learning of Taniwal's death, he had walked with President Karzai in the garden of Afghanistan's presidential palace. How, they wondered, could they still ask Afghanistan's professionals to help govern the country? Yet without them, the government could not possibly meet popular expectations, could not begin to restore hope to a nation nearly bereft of that emotion.

The last time we spoke, Taniwal repeatedly emphasized that stability was possible only with the support of ordinary Afghans. "We should invest in peace," he said, "not in fighting." He backed military operations based on precise intelligence, but such operations, he believed -- even if they killed, captured or routed some Taliban -- would have little long-lasting effect without popular support and economic development. Elders from 10 provinces, whom I met the day before my visit with Taniwal, had agreed, denouncing corrupt state officials. The people have totally lost trust in the government, they told me.

The Taliban "are slowly neutralizing the people," Taniwal said. "The government can't protect them, so they will go to the other side. They will not help the government to keep security." An elder from the neighboring province had offered a similar conclusion: "If the people were not distressed with the current government, the Taliban could not do anything. If the government starts negotiation with the elders and recognizes them, then we will be the police for the government." A minister in Kabul estimated the annual cost of putting elders in each district on the government payroll at $5 million -- a small price to pay for greater stability in a country where violence such as the suicide bomb that killed Taniwal is increasingly resembling that of Iraq in intensity, if not yet in scope.

Taniwal and I did not debate whether Pakistan was supporting the Taliban. As we sat a few miles from the frontier between the two countries -- the Pakistani tribal district of North Waziristan was a two-hour drive away on a dangerous road -- the answer was too obvious. "All the Taliban were once in Afghanistan," Taniwal said. "Now they are in Pakistan. The Taliban are helped by the [Pakistani] government." As we ate lunch at his home, a call from the police told of a suicide attack against a convoy on that very road to Pakistan.

Taniwal opposed big offensives by the U.S.-led coalition. "They roll over and flatten the whole area," he said. "But the enemy just goes from our side to the other side." The other side, of course, was Pakistan, where Taniwal, like so many other Afghans, had found a combination of refuge and persecution.

Pakistan was then negotiating a truce with Taliban who had gained control of most of North Waziristan. The final agreement, announced four days before Taniwal's killing, ceded control of the area to the militants in return for expelling "foreigners" (Arabs, Chechens, Uzbeks and others) and ending infiltration into Afghanistan. According to reports from the region, however, the suicide bomber who killed Taniwal four days later may have been sent on his mission from Waziristan.

Taniwal wanted the coalition to "pressure Pakistan more and more to keep the people there and also arrest and send them to Afghanistan." But for him, pressuring Pakistan was aimed not at destroying the Taliban but at reintegrating them. He wanted them, and all Afghans, "not to solve problems with the Kalashnikov. The Taliban should join with the government, the society, and have their own party," like the Taliban's sympathizers in Pakistan, who run in elections.

Though he asked me to keep this confidential, his death allows me -- indeed, it obligates me -- to reveal that he also advocated settling Afghanistan's historic conflict with Pakistan over the Pashtun territories across the frontier known as the Durand Line, which Afghanistan has never recognized as a border, even under the Taliban. "All the troubles up until now have been because of this problem," Taniwal said. Afghanistan built its army with Soviet aid to counter Pakistan, a U.S. ally. As a result, he said, "we did not gain Pashtunistan, but we almost lost Afghanistan." If international mediators can help resolve this conflict, "then there will be peace, development, business," Taniwal said. "Then Pakistan will be secure, and Afghanistan will be secure."

Taniwal feared that the United States and the current Afghan government would make the same errors as the Soviets and the governments they supported, but he recognized the difference between the two eras. "This is not an occupation," he said. "Afghanistan was a base for terrorists. These bases have been destroyed. Now they are trying again, and we have to fight back. But we should not make mistakes. Afghanistan is slowly going to be like the problem in Iraq if we don't solve these problems."

He put on his turban. We left his office, accompanied by a few lightly armed guards, and walked toward his car.

Nobel Laureates Call For Peace, Slam Bush (WT)

By Valerie Richardson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

DENVER -- Ten Nobel Peace Prize winners gathered here this weekend to issue a worldwide call for peace and understanding toward all people, with the possible exception of those in the Bush administration.

The laureates, who met here to celebrate the 10th anniversary of PeaceJam, an international education organization, opened the three-day event by excoriating the White House for its invasion of Iraq and subsequent increases in military spending.

"I honestly wonder how any of them can think for a nanosecond how having civil war in Iraq has made us safer," said Jody Williams of Vermont, who won the peace prize in 1997 for her work toward clearing land mines.

Billed as the largest U.S. gathering of Nobel Peace Prize winners in history, the event served as a starting point for the laureates' "Global Call to Action," an initiative aimed at urging young people to record 1 billion "acts of peace" over the next 10 years.

About 3,000 young people from 31 countries attended the event, held at the University of Denver.

The event's biggest names, the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Desmond Tutu, steered clear of politics. The Dalai Lama was greeted like a rock star yesterday before a one-hour speech in which he urged young people to embrace globalization.

"There are no national boundaries. The whole globe is becoming one body," the Tibetan spiritual leader said. "In these circumstances, I think war is outdated -- destruction of your neighbor is actually destruction of yourself."

At a press conference Friday, however, other peace prize winners criticized U.S. foreign policy, saying the focus should be on social and economic justice.

Adolfo Perez Esquivel, the 1980 winner for his Latin American human-rights work, took it a step further with a personal shot at President Bush.

"Bush says he prays. But I think God covers up His ears when George Bush prays," Mr. Esquivel said through a Spanish translator.

The Nobel Peace Prize winners also issued a statement identifying 10 "barriers to global peace." They included disease, poverty, nuclear weapons, social injustice, racism, access to natural resources and the rights of women and children.

Conspicuously absent from the list was global terrorism. Several laureates said that terrorism was an outgrowth of ignorance, prejudice and inequality, and that it cannot be eradicated until those underlying social issues are addressed.

Mrs. Williams said the September 11 attacks were a response to U.S. aggression around the world, and that the White House should have tried to understand the reasons behind them before invading Iraq.

"They do not like the aggressive policies of the country and they don't like that we're ignorant of that," she said.

Mr. Esquivel compared the nearly 3,000 persons killed on September 11 with the tens of thousands of children who die every day of hunger. "I call that economic terrorism," he said.

Shirin Ebadi, who won the peace prize in 2003 for advocating democracy and human rights in the Middle East, said she was "very sorry for the sad events of September 11," but added that it would have been better for the United States to build a school in Afghanistan for each victim, rather than invading the country.

The founders of PeaceJam, Dawn Engle and Ivan Suvanjieff, said one of the event's goals was for the laureates to become as popular with young people as actors and musicians.

"I want the Nobel laureates to be icons, [instead of] some thumb-sucking [celebrities]," Mr. Suvanjieff said. "I want peace to be hip, sexy and cool."

Task Force Receives Top Award (HC)

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales this week bestowed his office's top annual award to federal prosecutors, FBI agents and paralegals who have served on the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, including those involved in this year's fraud and conspiracy trial of former Enron chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling.

The recipients of the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service included Sean Berkowitz, Kathryn Ruemmler, John Hueston and Cliff Stricklin, the lead prosecutors in the four-month trial of Lay and Skilling.

Other team members who received the award were prosecutors Robb Adkinds and Andrew Stolper and appellate specialists Douglas Wilson and John Drennan.

The award was also given to previous task force attorneys and leaders, including its first director, Leslie Caldwell; her successor as director, Andrew Weissmann; and former task force prosecutors Samuel Buell, Matthew Friedrich, Lisa Monaco, Benton Campbell and Linda Lacewell.

CRIMINAL LAW:

'Continued Criminal Conduct' Leads To Longer Sentence (SELMATJ)

By Victor Inge, THE SELMA TIMES-JOURNAL

Selma (AL) Times-Journal, September 17, 2006

MOBILE - A Selma man who federal authorities say "continued criminal conduct" will get a longer sentence than recommended.

DeWayne Lewis, 34, pleaded guilty to a felon in possession of a handgun in May 2006 and faced a sentencing range of 63 to 78 months in prison, under the federal advisory sentencing guidelines.

In the plea agreement, prosecutors had recommended the low end of the guidelines, court officials said.

However, after Lewis testified in his own behalf at the sentencing hearing this week, senior U.S. District Judge Charles R. Butler ruled that Lewis had perjured himself during his testimony and therefore "lacked acceptance of responsibility for his actions."

While on release awaiting sentencing, Lewis tested positive for cocaine use.

In addition, Lewis was a passenger in a vehicle stopped by the Selma Police Department when a gun was found next to where Lewis was seated.

Judge Butler then sentenced Lewis to the maximum term of 78 months in federal prison, to be followed by three years of supervised probation, according to information obtained from the U.S. Justice Department.

Deborah J. Rhodes, U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Alabama, said the charges resulted from a joint investigation conducted by the ATF&E, The SPD and the Dallas County Sheriff's Office.

Federal law enforcement authorities have been vigilant about gun crimes in Selma lately, as ATF&E officers have worked for the past two years to help bring charges against more than 15 individuals from the St. Phillips Street area.

Authorities say they operated as "a street gang," and used guns to protect their turf.

Rodriguez Trial Entering Final Stage (STPPP)

By Dave Kolpack

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 17, 2006

FARGO, N.D. - The trial of Alfonso Rodriguez Jr. is entering its final stage, and jurors may begin deliberating this week over whether he should be the first person sentenced to death in North Dakota in nearly 100 years.

The verdict by the federal court jury of seven women and five men must be unanimous for Rodriguez, 53, of Crookston, Minn., to be sentenced to death instead of life in prison. He was convicted late last month of kidnapping resulting in the death of University of North Dakota student Dru Sjodin.

"I think this part is much harder to predict than when he was found guilty," said Joseph Daly, a Hamline University law professor who has participated in death penalty cases and has been following the Rodriguez case. "In North Dakota, jurors are not used to dealing with death penalty cases."

North Dakota does not have the death penalty but it is allowed in federal cases. During a trip to Fargo last year, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the government is justified in seeking capital punishment in some cases in states that have outlawed the penalty.

"I believe the fact the state doesn't have the death penalty doesn't mean that the people of the state would not impose the ultimate sanction when the right circumstances dictate that that happen," Gonzales said.

Prosecutors point to the fact that jurors, in deciding earlier that Rodriguez was eligible for the death penalty, found that Sjodin, 22, of Pequot Lakes, Minn., was killed in an "especially heinous, cruel and depraved manner."

Sjodin disappeared from a Grand Forks mall parking lot in November 2003. Her body was found in a ravine near Crookston the following April. Authorities said she had been beaten, raped and stabbed.

Defense attorneys say several factors favor a sentence of life in prison for Rodriguez. They say he was sexually abused as a child and may have suffered brain damage from farm chemicals, leading to psychological and behavioral problems.

Rodriguez's attorneys are expected to wrap up their testimony on Monday. U.S. District Judge Ralph Erickson said he believes jurors could began deliberating his sentence by the middle of the week, after prosecutors present rebuttal evidence.

Rodriguez's mother and two of his sisters testified last week about their struggles as a poor migrant farm family, living in a house with no electricity or running water. They said children teased Rodriguez about his race and physical appearance.

"It's not so easy to put aside that kind of heartfelt feeling of a mother and his background," Daly said Sunday. "I think it will have some effect on the jurors ... and you only need to affect one juror."

Prosecutors say another factor favoring the death penalty is that jurors found Rodriguez caused serious injury in three earlier assaults on women.

The government also believes that testimony by friends and family of Sjodin in the last phase of the trial points to a death sentence.

Daly said he expects the case to be appealed, whether Rodriguez receives the death penalty or life in prison. Death penalty appeals would be more prolonged, Daly said.

"It's possible her parents will never see him executed," he said.

FBI Sex Raises Privacy Issues (PTR)

By Carl Prine, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, September 17, 2006

It's a steamy story of sex, lies and videotape, told in an obscure federal court case the FBI doesn't want you to hear about.

But the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review uncovered the hidden details of "Dale J. Herr vs. the Department of Justice" at the normally staid U.S. Merit Systems Protection Board in Washington, the agency where fired federal workers go to get their jobs back.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation's quest to keep its dirty laundry from public sight concerns civil libertarians, who worry 9/11 turned a naturally secretive agency into a place that now walls off even routine litigation. Labor lawyers also fear federal courts are letting agencies pry too far into the private lives of employees.

FBI officials, however, insist they will continue to evict X-rated G-men.

The salacious Herr dossier makes the FBI's Cleveland field office into Hugh Hefner's Playboy Mansion. Herr, 38, a West Point grad and former special agent, concedes in court documents that in 2002 he videotaped his sexual exploits with three women -- two co-workers and one from outside the agency.

One female agent "had consented to videotaping of her sexual activities with (Herr) on other occasions," but he later filmed her "when she had not consented to and was not aware of the taping," according to court records.

FBI files also reveal two other women had no clue they were caught on film, footage Herr kept solely "for his own use."

"Based on conversations I had with (one of the women), I believed she would not be comfortable making videotapes of our sexual encounters," Herr admitted in court papers. FBI files say Herr knew at the time it "was not ... the right thing to do."

One of the female agents found the tapes in 2002 and told co-workers. Scuttlebutt about the amateur pornos swept the Cleveland field office, and the FBI began to question Herr's integrity and hold "much less confidence in his abilities to perform ... any job," according to legal filings.

An unnamed Cleveland supervisor testified he had to counsel two filmed female feds and make sure that "they and other employees concentrated on their work, rather than on the gossip and rumors." But Cleveland superiors never questioned Herr's job as a high-ranking agent. His office even recommended only a 30-day suspension, according to his attorney, Richard L. Swick of Washington.

The FBI brass overruled that recommendation. On June 9, 2004 -- 20 months after Herr's blue movies triggered an internal investigation -- he lost his badge. His appeal is pending.

Agents at field offices nationwide who knew Herr declined to speak on the record about the matter, saying they didn't want to jeopardize the litigation or incur agency discipline. Herr's attorney advised his client not to talk to the news media.

Girls on film

Special Agent Jeffrey B. Killeen, an attorney representing the Department of Justice in the matter, is so close-mouthed he won't even admit Herr exists. Killeen, assigned to the Pittsburgh office, often works on internal FBI investigations.

Although one of the taped women continued a romantic relationship with Herr after the brouhaha -- according to Herr's attorney -- Killeen persuaded administrative law judges to remove her name from documents because she was a "victim." Killeen also got judges to erase mention of the Cleveland field office and the identities of anyone who gave testimony.

When Herr's lawyer moved to rename his client "John Doe," not only did the FBI not oppose it, but also begged the court to seal every aspect of the case.

Senior FBI officials declined to discuss the Herr case.

"Decisions like that are never made lightly," said Patrick W. Kelley, FBI's deputy general counsel. "It's a process. We have to keep in mind that there may be victims, and we have a duty to protect them from an unwarranted invasion of their privacy. To do that, we must look even at singularly identifying details in cases. We do this to ensure that more damage isn't done to the victims."

Administrative law judges hear nearly 12,000 appeals annually for the Merit Systems Protection Board from federal workers who say they've been unjustly fired, furloughed or demoted. Judges rarely close hearings, disguise the identities of participants or bar taxpayers from reading testimony. Over the past 33 years, the board's panel in Washington has cloaked only three cases out of almost 300,000. The last "John Doe" caption came in a 1981 case involving a spy accused of molesting his daughter.

Against FBI wishes, the Washington panel published some details of Herr's case. But at the FBI's insistence, judges continue to keep citizens from attending Herr's Chicago hearings, reading transcripts or accessing court filings. Judges and their clerks in Washington and Chicago declined comment.

Contacted by the Trib, nearly a dozen top civil libertarians said FBI and board actions in the Herr matter raise questions about when it's appropriate to hide agent misconduct. At issue: Did the FBI push so hard to protect alleged victims, or did the agency fear embarrassment from a salacious story?

"The FBI and the board went too far, in my opinion," said attorney David K. Colapinto of Washington, an expert on government secrecy. "They could've blacked out the names of the women without putting the case under seal. The danger in all of this is that they could turn future proceedings in cases like this into a Star Chamber, which has happened before and which has been shown to have violated both the U.S. Constitution and the public's right to know.

"But does it surprise me? No. We're living in an era of secrecy. After 9/11, the FBI and the courts are making everything 'confidential' or 'secret,' and I'm afraid that mentality now might be extended even to the Merit Systems Protection Board."

NeXXXus of Evil?

Some labor lawyers fear the board's ruling reached too far into the private lives of federal workers. Herr's Chicago judge initially found the FBI failed to find a link between his boorish behavior and how he fought crime. That's important because FBI policies let agents engage in legal sexual conduct that some people find morally objectionable -- including adultery, homosexuality and gender-bending wardrobe choices.

"That's the key. It was none of the FBI's business," said attorney Swick. "They were just upset about what he did, and they can't say what he did was illegal. He didn't violate the FBI's own personnel policies, so why are they doing this to him?"

Swick says it's a shame the nation lost a dedicated agent and vows to reinstate him. The FBI concedes what Herr did in Ohio in 2002 wasn't illegal, but Pennsylvania and 47 other states now have "video voyeurism" laws banning what he did.

The Board tribunal reasoned that making pornos didn't get Herr in trouble, it was his "clearly dishonest" conduct that "caused emotional distress to the FBI employees he had videotaped." Judges said the fallout from his bedroom behavior snarled FBI operations, and an agency charged with collaring corrupt city cops can hold its own law enforcement officers to "a high standard of conduct."

FBI leaders consider the "high standard of conduct" the agency's cornerstone. They take pride in a rigorous vetting process that weeds out most applicants. To refresh academy ethics training, the FBI routinely posts e-mails to agents detailing bad behavior in their ranks. Strict standards govern much of a G-man's professional life, and agents are warned to never project an "appearance of impropriety."

"It's important for agents to understand that their conduct outside the agency can have repercussions in the office," said the FBI's Kelley. "And just because something isn't illegal doesn't mean it won't affect what we do."

Ralph Smith says the FBI's culture won't allow seamy conduct to go unpunished. The former civil service supervisor, best-selling author and staffing firm owner published some "John Doe" details on his popular Fedsmith.com Web site.

"Imagine a case like this one, with all the sex and videotaping, the gossiping and the long investigation that followed," said Smith. "There are issues of privacy and trust involved in all of that, and those are important concepts to FBI supervisors. The culture of the FBI won't tolerate that kind of behavior, even if it's not illegal."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

In Shadow Of 70's Racism, Recent Violence Stirs Rage (NYT)

By Dan Frosch

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

FARMINGTON, N.M. — The memory of 1974 still hangs heavily over this troubled New Mexico town, like a bad spirit drifting down from the sandpaper mesas and scrub-speckled hillsides.

That was the year the bodies of three Navajo men were found in nearby Chokecherry Canyon, burned and bludgeoned. The three white high school students charged in their killings were sent not to prison but to reform school.

The violence and mild sentences incited marches by Navajos through Farmington's streets and exposed tensions between them and the town's largely white residents. The United States Commission on Civil Rights eventually investigated and found widespread mistreatment and prejudice against Navajos.

Now, more than three decades later, Navajo leaders here are again calling for federal intervention.

On June 4, the police said, three white men beat a Navajo man, William Blackie, 46, and shouted racial slurs at him after asking him to buy beer for them. The men were charged with kidnapping, robbery and assault, and are being prosecuted under the state hate crimes law, which allows for longer sentences.

DOJ_NMG_0064700

Six days later, a white Farmington police officer killed a Navajo man, Clint John, 21, after a struggle in a Wal-Mart parking lot. The police said Mr. John had assaulted his girlfriend and attacked the officer — grabbing his baton and moving aggressively toward him — before the officer shot Mr. John four times. Mr. John had a history of violence, the police said.

Mr. John's family says he did not have the baton when he was shot and is filing a wrongful death lawsuit against city officials, the Police Department and the officer.

The San Juan County Sheriff's Office, which investigated Mr. John's death, concluded that the shooting was justified. But after an outcry from Navajo Nation officials, the United States Justice Department is reviewing the matter to determine if a federal inquiry is necessary.

Both events have rocked this commercial hub of about 42,000 residents on the eastern edge of the Navajo Nation. After Mr. John's shooting, the Navajo Council allocated $300,000 to study racial violence in the 11 towns that border Navajo land and to finance the John family's lawsuit.

On Sept. 2, amid growing unease, Navajo leaders organized a march they said drew 1,000 participants. The march snaked along Highway 64, which leads to the Navajo community of Shiprock.

"We marched to memorialize the people that have died because of racial violence here," said Duane Yazzie, president of the Shiprock chapter of the Navajo Nation. "This was an outlet for people who are frustrated and angry."

Similar marches 32 years ago protested the severe, sometimes violent treatment of Navajos, like the practice of beating drunken Navajos passed out on Farmington's streets.

In 1975, the Civil Rights Commission released "The Farmington Report: A Conflict of Cultures," which described widespread prejudice against American Indians in Farmington and said they had suffered in almost every area from injustice and maltreatment.

These days, Farmington is no longer the Selma, Ala., of the Southwest, as some derisively called it then. The town has more Indians — about 17 percent of its residents, compared with less than 10 percent in the mid-1970's. The Civil Rights Commission, revisiting Farmington in 2004, found marked progress.

Mayor Bill Standley cited improvements including the creation of a citizen police advisory committee, an intertribal service organization and a Navajo behavioral health center. Mayor Standley categorized this year's violence as isolated.

"When these things happen, we still have to be concerned, and we have to listen," he said. "We have thousands of interactions between people in Farmington where nothing happens. But when things do go wrong, the culprit is usually alcohol. For the most part, it's not racism that drives Farmington's problems today, it's alcohol."

Indeed, a study this year by the Police Department showed that most crimes against Indians in Farmington were committed by Indians.

Police Chief Mike Burridge said the 12 Indians among the 124 officers on his force had supported the department after Mr. John's shooting.

"They told me they wished it was a Native American officer that was involved," said Mr. Burridge, adding that his officers underwent cultural sensitivity training that specifically addressed Navajo issues.

But Larry Emerson, chairman of the New Mexico Indian Education Advisory Council, said white residents had not absorbed the history of Indian subjugation and its psychological and social effects.

"The bias, the unfairness, this has been going on all along," said Mr. Emerson, who is Navajo. "Our people have suffered intergenerational trauma. They're so numb to it, they can't feel own their feelings anymore."

Racial violence — like the bludgeoning death in 2000 of a 36-year-old Navajo woman by two white men — still occurs, if less frequently. Mr. Emerson and Mr. Yazzie said many crimes against Navajos went unreported.

"We've become so accustomed to our treatment by the Anglo community, we just accept it as normal," said Mr. Yazzie, who was shot by a white hitchhiker in 1978 and lost an arm in the attack.

Mr. Yazzie said he believed outsiders, new to Farmington and its complicated racial dynamic, were to blame for the upswing in violence. He said he considered Mr. John's shooting unjustified and wanted the federal government to intervene, as it did in the 1970's. Other tribal leaders agree.

DOJ_NMG_0064701

"We've come a long way since 1974, but sometimes it takes the feds to move things in the right direction, said Joe Shirley Jr., the president of the Navajo Nation. "Otherwise, it doesn't get done."

A stroll down Main Street, lined with antique shops and Navajo art galleries, reveals familiar divisions.

"The majority of Navajos are good people," said Joann Carney, a white saleswoman at a clothing shop. "But a few give them a bad name."

"Navajos get a lot of looks walking down the streets here," said Patrick John, an American Indian from Shiprock. "There's a lot of tension here. This is a border town."

For George Arthur, a Navajo Nation delegate who lives near Farmington, the problems are escalating. A few years ago, Mr. Arthur said, his son was beaten by white youths who tried unsuccessfully to set him on fire. Mr. Arthur said no one was charged in the crime.

"The Navajo are a proud people," he said. "We've learned to survive, and we can tolerate certain aspects of life. But not when it comes to our dignity."

Report Sizes Up The Toll Of Human Trafficking In Minnesota (MINNST)

By Myron P. Medcalf And Howie Padilla, Star Tribune Staff Writers

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 17, 2006

About 120 social-service groups in Minnesota that responded to a survey estimated that they had worked with more than 500 sex trafficking victims and 55 labor trafficking victims over the past three years.

The exploitation in Minnesota of victims lured into forced labor and sex should be addressed on an "organized, statewide" level, according to a Minnesota Department of Public Safety report on human trafficking.

About 120 social-service groups in Minnesota that responded to a survey estimated that they had worked with more than 500 sex trafficking victims and 55 labor trafficking victims over the past three years. Some victims had been trafficked from Minneapolis, St. Paul, Roseville and the Mall of America, according to the report.

Without statewide data on trafficking-related arrests, the numbers don't represent the fullness of the crime, according to the report, which was prepared for the Legislature.

Someone is trafficked when "forced, defrauded or coerced into service regardless of movement," but sometimes the offense involves transporting people across borders, domestic and international.

"This is an issue Minnesota is beginning to pay attention to," said Danette Buskovick of the Department of Public Safety, who wrote the report.

Also this week, the St. Paul Police Department's Gerald D. Vick Human Trafficking Task Force held its first meeting.

In a teleconference that lasted about four hours, St. Paul Sgt. John Bandemer and Cmdr. Todd Axtell -- along with other federal, state and local law enforcement officials -- heard from Houston officials about how they battle the problem. A federal grant honoring Vick helped fund the department's work on human trafficking. The slain St. Paul police sergeant was known for his zeal in fighting human trafficking and helping prostitutes turn their lives around.

But cracking down on leaders of human-trafficking rings has proven challenging because of scare tactics used to silence victims, some of whom are threatened because of their immigrant status, said Gail Pendleton, a national consultant on immigration issues who was in St. Paul on Friday for a conference on domestic violence in immigrant and refugee communities.

"The challenge is finding them," she said. "They generally are held captive. ... The first people they're not going to talk to are law enforcement."

Also at the conference was Joy Friedman, a former prostitute who was trafficked between states and now works with Breaking Free, a St. Paul group that assists females fleeing prostitution. Said Friedman: "This is something that's happening in our own back yard."

Woman Seeks To Take Monkey Into Restaurants For 'support' (AP)

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, September 17, 2006

SPRINGFIELD, MO. -- A woman from southwestern Missouri has asked the Springfield-Greene County Health Department to allow her to take her pet monkey into restaurants as a service animal.

The woman, Debby Rose, of Springfield, says Richard, her bonnet macaque monkey, provides emotional support that allows her to overcome an anxiety disorder and go out in public places. Rose said the federal Americans With Disabilities Act should allow the practice.

Health department officials met Friday with a local service agency, the Southwest Center for Independent Living, which is acting as an agent for Rose. The health department told the agency that Rose must produce some kind of federal ruling or certification that the monkey is a service animal under the ADA before it will consider allowing her to take the monkey into public places, said Kevin Gipson, director of health.

Family members said Rose's anxiety was disabling. Without her monkey, she's less able to manage normal tasks, such as grocery shopping and dining out, because of severe anxiety.

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman from the Justice Department in Washington, said that although the law was somewhat vague regarding emotional-support animals, they were covered.

"It's kind of a fine line, but the law errs on the side of protecting individuals that are disabled," she said.

Some Officials Say Voting Law Changes And New Technology Will Cause Trouble

An overhaul in how states and localities record votes and administer elections since the Florida recount battle six years ago has created conditions that could trigger a repeat -- this time on a national scale -- of last week's Election Day debacle in the Maryland suburbs, election experts said.

In the Nov. 7 election, more than 80 percent of voters will use electronic voting machines, and a third of all precincts this year are using the technology for the first time. The changes are part of a national wave, prompted by the federal Help America Vote Act of 2002 and numerous revisions of state laws, that led to the replacement of outdated voting machines with computer-based electronic machines, along with centralized databases of registered voters and other steps to refine the administration of elections.

But in Maryland last Tuesday, a combination of human blunders and technological glitches caused long lines and delays in vote-counting. The problems, which followed ones earlier this year in Ohio, Illinois and several other states, have contributed to doubts among some experts about whether the new systems are reliable and whether election officials are adequately prepared to use them.

In a polarized political climate, in which elections are routinely marked by litigation and allegations of incompetent administration or outright tampering, some worry that voting problems could cast a Florida-style shadow over this fall's midterm elections.

"We could see that control of Congress is going to be decided by races in recount situations that might not be determined for several weeks," said Paul S. DeGregorio, chairman of the federal Election Assistance Commission, although he added that he does not expect problems of this magnitude.

"It's hard to put a factor on how ill-prepared we are," said former Ohio governor Richard F. Celeste, a Democrat who recently co-chaired a study of new machines with Republican Richard L. Thornburgh, former governor of Pennsylvania, for the National Research Council. They advised local election officials to prepare backup plans for November.

"What we know is, these technologies require significant testing and debugging to make them work," added Celeste, now president of Colorado College. "Our concern -- particularly as we look to the November election, when there is a lot of pressure on -- is that election officials consider what kinds of fallbacks they can put in place."

The main focus is on whether people know how to properly use the machines, particularly the large army of volunteers who staff the polls at most precincts.

"We know the equipment works because it's been qualified to federal standards," said Kevin J. Kennedy, executive director of the Wisconsin State Elections Board and president of the National Association of State Election Directors. "The real challenge is to make sure our poll workers are trained and make sure voters have been educated so that we don't have an experience like Maryland had."

What is clear is that a national effort to improve election procedures six years ago -- after the presidential election ended with ambiguous ballots and allegations of miscounted votes and partisan favoritism in Florida -- has failed to restore broad public confidence that the system is fair.

To the contrary, litigation is on the rise. Rick Hasen, a law professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles and the author of Election Law Blog, found that the number of election challenges filed in court had risen sharply from 2000 to 2004 -- from 197 per year to 361. "Parties have become more willing to go to court," Hasen said.

In 2004, some Democrats alleged widespread voting irregularities in Ohio, including questionable vote-counting and problems with machines in Democratic-leaning precincts. Nonpartisan election experts have said the problems were not so severe to call President Bush's victory, by about 119,000 votes, into question.

This year, there are debates over standards for keeping voter registration rolls up to date; for the handling of "provisional ballots" used by people who do not show up on those rolls but believe they are legally qualified to vote; and for assuring the validity of electronic vote counts through the use of paper trails for all electronic machines. State legislation requiring state or federal identification for all voters has been challenged in courts.

One reason many issues are coming to a head this year is that the Help America Vote Act set the start of 2006 as the deadline for states to comply fully with its regulations.

Help America Vote does not mandate electronic voting, but it has greatly accelerated that trend. The law banned lever machines and punch cards to end debates about ambiguous "hanging chads" of the sort that occurred in Florida in 2000. What is clear is that electronic machines have their own imponderables.

In Montgomery County, the breakdown came when election officials failed to provide precinct workers with the access cards needed to operate electronic voting machines. In Prince George's County, computers misidentified some voters' party affiliation and failed to transmit data to the central election office. At least nine other states have had trouble this year with new voting technology.

During Illinois's March primary, poll workers in Cook County (Chicago) experienced problems at hundreds of sites with new voting technology, delaying results in a crucial vote for the county's board.

In Ohio, results from the May primary election were delayed for nearly a week in Cuyahoga County (Cleveland) when thousands of absentee ballots were incorrectly formatted for electronic scanners and had to be counted by hand.

Twenty-seven states require electronic voting machines to produce a paper trail available for auditing during a recount, but an analysis of Cuyahoga County's paper trail by the nonpartisan Election Science Institute showed that a tenth of the receipts were uncountable.

So far, none of these problems has prompted lingering legal challenges. But experts say turnout in general elections is much higher than in primaries and will put new stresses on the election system.

Although Help America Vote imposed national standards, it did not impose a uniform system. There are different styles and brands of equipment in use, with the potential for different bugs. The main systems are optical-scan machines and touch-screen machines. The potential problems election officials cite include machines breaking down or paper ballots not being read by optical-scan machines.

Beyond technical bugs, questions remain about whether the machines are vulnerable to vote fraud by hackers.

For several years, prominent computer scientists have taken aim at the electronic voting machines, which in essence are computers. In analyses of the software that runs widely used models of the machines, and in tests on specific brands, the scientists have shown how they could manipulate the machine to report a vote total that differed from the actual total cast by voters.

Machine vendors and some election officials have said that, while changing vote totals may be possible for someone with sophisticated technical knowledge in a controlled experiment, it is highly unlikely in a real election, given the security and oversight.

In the wake of Help America Vote, Congress has appropriated more than $3 billion to states to upgrade equipment, and Vermont Secretary of State Deb Markowitz, the president of the National Association of Secretaries of State, said many states have met all of Help America Vote's requirements. Backers credit the law with making voting easier for the disabled and people for whom English is not a primary language. And they say that when machines and databases work properly, they make voting more accurate.

As Election Day nears, however, states remain embroiled in legal disputes growing out of Help America Vote's requirements for centralized voter databases and for some first-time voters to show identification at the polls. The Justice Department has sued New York state for failing to comply with Help America Vote requirements, such as upgrading machines and building a central voter database.

Democrats and Republicans remain at odds over voter registration rolls. The Brennan Center for Justice, a liberal advocacy group, recently showed that properly registered voters in Florida, New Jersey and Kentucky were being removed from voter databases through electronic purges.

"Voter suppression doesn't happen with intimidation on Election Day, but rather through silent and sometimes secret government actions in the weeks leading up to an election," said Michael Waldman, the center's executive director.

Republicans have pressed for laws requiring voters to show a state or federal identification card -- a requirement Democrats say could disenfranchise low-income and minority voters.

A handful of states have passed expansive laws requiring voters to show state or federal ID at the polls. On Thursday, a circuit court judge in Missouri struck down as unconstitutional that state's ID requirement. That ruling followed a similar decision by a court in Georgia. A court in Indiana, however, upheld the requirement.

Further clouding the election process is the fact that, in many states, the administration of elections remains in political hands -- run by secretaries of state or other officials who run for office with partisan affiliations and who often have designs on higher office.

Robert Pastor, director of a commission on election reform organized by American University and headed by former president Jimmy Carter and former secretary of state James A. Baker III, said this tradition should be abandoned.

"The Carter-Baker commission identified 87 steps that need to be undertaken," he said. "Regrettably, almost none of them are being done right now. I would start by establishing statewide, nonpartisan election administration."

Md. Election Problems Fuel Push For Paper Record (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

After Primary Day Fiasco, Some Area Officials and Activists Say Electronic Voting Systems Need Backup

The primary day debacle in Montgomery and Prince George's counties will add momentum to regional efforts to ensure that election systems create a paper record of each vote, according to some elected officials and activists critical of paperless balloting.

They say the crisis at the polls in Florida during the 2000 presidential race, which prompted many states to switch to electronic voting, forced the adoption of overly complex systems that now must be simplified.

An aide to Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), who is seeking reelection in November, said heightened concerns about electronic voting in last week's primary would strengthen calls for a return to a paper-based system.

Precinct judges in Montgomery and Prince George's counties have reported various machine-related problems, including computers that misidentified the party affiliations of voters, electronic voter registration lists that froze and voting-machine memory cards whose contents could not be electronically transmitted. The electronic voter lists, or "e-poll books," were used for the first time in Maryland.

Ehrlich remains "wary about the use of these machines in the upcoming elections," said policy adviser Joseph M. Getty, though the governor has announced he will take whatever steps are necessary to protect the security and reliability of the state's voting system.

Activists in Virginia said they hope Maryland's problems will inspire renewed efforts to require that all voting systems in the commonwealth produce a paper record of each vote. The voting in Virginia's June primary went smoothly, and Jean Jensen, secretary of the State Board of Elections, said she has not felt "a lot of unease in the population" over electronic voting.

Jensen said she is worried that opponents of electronic voting will exploit Maryland's troubles, which were partially the result of human error, and "turn this into a machine issue."

The District has a dual system in which voters at each polling station have a choice between voting electronically or casting a paper ballot that is read by an optical scanner. There were no significant problems at the polls Tuesday, but community activist Dorothy Brizill said she hopes the Board of Elections and Ethics will still conduct a review.

In Maryland, Ehrlich has requested that Linda H. Lamone, the administrator of the State Board of Elections, appear Wednesday before a three-member panel that includes the governor. Ehrlich, who has clashed frequently with Lamone, told her in a letter that last week's problems "raise questions about insufficient training, management and oversight of Maryland elections."

Deputy Administrator Ross Goldstein said Lamone "is reviewing the letter and will respond."

The outcomes of primary races for a congressional seat and two General Assembly seats remain undetermined as a result of voting irregularities.

In Montgomery County, where primary day began in chaos after election workers forgot to provide the plastic cards needed to access the machines, 10,000 to 12,000 voters had to use provisional paper ballots. The counting of provisional votes statewide will begin tomorrow and in Montgomery could take two or three days because of the volume, county officials said.

Meanwhile, Donna Edwards, who ran against Rep. Albert R. Wynn for the 4th District Democratic nomination, has said she will file a lawsuit because of concerns about the security of voting machines that were not returned promptly to the Prince George's Board of Elections.

Wynn leads by fewer than 3,000 votes in a district that stretches from Prince George's into a slice of Montgomery.

Both candidates in the close race for the Democratic nomination for Prince George's executive -- the disappointed challenger, Rushern L. Baker III, and the victorious incumbent, Jack B. Johnson -- also have called for an investigation of the county's voting process.

Kevin Zeese, an independent candidate for Maryland's open U.S. Senate seat and a longtime critic of electronic systems that do not provide a "paper trail," acknowledged that many problems in Maryland were caused by human error. Even so, he said, "the real problem [with electronic machines] continues. We can't tell whether the result really reflects the will of the people. There's no way to audit an electronic count."

Ehrlich pushed legislation this year that would have required Maryland to adopt paper ballots and optical scanners, but the measure died in the state Senate.

Several efforts to institute a paper record also died in the Virginia legislature this year. Carrie Nixon, a lawyer who leads the New Electoral Reform Alliance for Virginia, a nonpartisan group that has pressed for changes in the commonwealth's election system, said she hopes that Maryland's problems will give the initiatives another life.

Virginia's elections have run well in recent years, but Nixon said volunteer lawyers participating in an election-monitoring program organized by the Democratic National Committee in 2004 reported 117 problems with individual machines at about 600 polling stations. "These types of problems do give people pause with respect to the integrity of the system," she said.

Jensen said that not a single vote was lost in 2004 and that 8,000 to 10,000 voting machines were in use on Election Day.

In the District, voters have been able to choose between casting electronic and paper ballots since 2004, said Alice P. Miller, executive director of the Board of Elections and Ethics. Most voters still prefer paper, she said, but the number opting for an electronic ballot has risen with each election.

Brizill, the community activist, said she has visited polling sites where the electronic voting machine "sits vacant and not used, all day long."

Missouri, Other States Grapple With New Voting Requirements (SLPD)

By Bill Lambrecht And Adam Sichko, POST-DISPATCH WASHINGTON BUREAU

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON In the Arizona primary election last week, some Navajo Indians who don't drive and have no use for U.S. government-issued photo IDs didn't vote because of a new state law requiring identification to vote.

"Probably in the future, a lot of our elders just won't show up, and they're dedicated voters," said Isabelle Walker, the Navajo Nation's deputy chief of staff.

But in Macon, Ga., which tested Georgia's controversial photo identification law for the first time last week, only one voter of more than 200 who turned out for a school board special election lacked a picture ID — even though he had driven to the polling place.

"It went well. We feel like voters are grasping the idea," said Twiggs County Election Superintendent Marette Fair.

Missouri — where a judge last week struck down a new state photo ID law — is not alone in grappling with new voting requirements. More courtroom maneuvering is expected over the Missouri law, which requires voters to produce a valid Missouri drivers license, nondrivers ID, U.S. passport or military ID.

In at least eight states, political activists are squaring off over new rules requiring photo IDs as well as proof of citizenship and other identification for voter registration. In most cases, Republicans are supporting the restrictions, and Democratic-leaning groups are fighting them.

In Georgia, a federal judge ruled last week that voters in his state will not have to produce picture IDs in 30 special elections next week. But the ruling doesn't prevent Georgia from moving ahead with its new photo-ID law in November.

Other voting glitches

Ongoing confusion in several states is just part of the nation's unsettled election machinery less than two months before elections that will decide control of Congress.

Some states still are struggling with federal legislation requiring computerized voter registration lists. About one-third of the country — including parts of Missouri and Illinois — will deploy new voting machines for the first time in a general election. Serious glitches last week in Maryland's primary showed the need for well-trained poll workers in the new era of electronic voting.

The disputes over registration and voter identification add to pre-election anxieties.

In Florida, the League of Women Voters stopped registering voters earlier this year rather than risk penalties under a new state law putting requirements on civic organizations' voter drives. A federal judge intervened to stop the law — saying it "chills" First Amendment rights — and the league is back in the registration business and trying to make up for lost time, its president, Dianne Wheatley-Giliotti, said last week.

How much impact?

In Missouri and elsewhere, analysts say that the final outcome of the court challenges could have a bearing on close elections in November.

The voter ID requirements, along with the new registration rules "could have a potentially enormous impact on elections and could unquestionably swing the results of elections one way or the other," asserted Daniel Tokaji, an Ohio State University assistant law professor who writes a Weblog on election-law disputes.

Court cases have featured wildly varying estimates about who might end up not voting because they don't have photo IDs and lack the wherewithal or patience to get them. In Missouri, Secretary of State Robin Carnahan said that 240,000 voters could lack the necessary ID under the new law; the state Department of Revenue put that number at 138,000.

A St. Louis election-law attorney, Mark "Thor" Hearne, disputes that thousands of people will end up not voting.

Hearne, 45, who helped the Bush-Cheney campaign prevail in the Florida recount of 2000, has emerged as a key player nationally in arguing the case for voter ID laws. He is chief legal adviser to the American Center for Voting Rights, a northern Virginia advocacy group that has been a driving force in legislation demanding photo identification to vote.

"You get all these dire predictions of hundreds of thousands of people disenfranchised. But when they finally run an election, they find that it's no big deal," he said.

Hearne disputed those who say that the new laws fall unfairly on those least able to produce a photo ID, much the way poll taxes once kept people from the polls.

"This isn't singling people out," he said. "This is a feature of modern life. You need a photo to get on a plane, cash a check, receive government benefits."

Courtroom disputes

The ID movement is a product of outrages from voter fraud as well as the nation's post-9/11 security mind-set. The 2002 Help America Vote Act requires that first-time voters who register by mail produce government-issued IDs when they cast ballots.

The movement picked up steam a year ago when the Commission on Federal Election Reform, headed by former President Jimmy Carter and ex-Secretary of State James Baker, concluded that a uniform voter identification system could help rebuild confidence in voting.

The bipartisan panel added that such a system should not impede participation. Whether it does — and ultimately will — is the crux of courtroom disputes.

In Missouri, Cole County Circuit Judge Richard Callahan concluded that the ultimate effect of the law was an unconstitutional new qualification to vote. Supporters say it can be fixed with legislative tinkering.

Arizona is one state where the pro-ID forces have prevailed in court, much to the dismay of Indian tribes and partisans who relish the heavily Democratic vote from the 250,000-strong Navajo Nation.

Many older Navajo were born at home and don't have birth certificates, tribal officials said. And even if they can afford the IDs, some simply reject state dictates.

"It offended our elders very much. They say, 'Now you end up telling me I have to prove who I am to you?' That's not right given that we were the indigenous people of this country even before laws were created," said Leonard Gorman, a Navajo elections expert.

Joe Kanefield, state election director in Arizona, countered that tribes in his state were given special consideration, allowing them to show just one form of ID proving tribal membership, whether or not it had a photo.

Last week's election, he said, "went very smooth. There were very few problems, if any. . . . We don't think this law in any way discouraged people from voting."

Meanwhile, Marette Fair, the election head in Twiggs County, Ga., had this message for Missourians after hearing that her state's on-again, off-again voter ID law had been temporarily suspended.

"I hope your election in Missouri goes well and you don't get jerked around like us," she said.

City's Vote Recount Ends (MJS)

By Derrick Nunnally And Dave Umhoefer

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 17, 2006

46,500, not 80,000, people turned out, agency says

Milwaukee officials announced Saturday that after a three-day manual count of ballots, Tuesday's primary election brought 46,500 voters to the polls in Milwaukee, not 80,000 as the city previously reported.

City Election Commission chief Susan Edman said the ward-by-ward review of turnout confirmed the city's suspicion that a computer programming error by her office caused the misreporting.

The new turnout count, which still needs confirmation by county officials, means that 15.5% of the city's registered voters came to the polls.

The earlier report of nearly 27% turnout had generated confusion because it suggested that tens of thousands of people showed up to vote but ignored or voted incorrectly in the top races on the ballot, including state attorney general and Milwaukee County district attorney and sheriff.

The discrepancy was brought to the city's attention by the Journal Sentinel, which reported on it Thursday. Its cause, Edman said, was a double and triple count at polling sites containing multiple wards. The duplicated figures showed up in 198 of the city's 314 wards, the paper found. 2004 election

After consulting with state and county election officials, the city did a full ballot count to assure public confidence in the system. That confidence had already been shaken by highly publicized problems the city had in the 2004 presidential election.

"The public should be very pleased with the outcome of this joint canvass," Edman said.

The laborious manual review was not a recount of votes cast for individual candidates. Milwaukee Mayor Tom Barrett and Edman have said repeatedly that the computer error was isolated to total turnout and did not affect the reporting of results in any race.

Those statements seemed to satisfy all the candidates on the ballot except Vince Bobot, an assistant city attorney who lost a fairly close race for the Democratic Party nomination for sheriff. Bobot is considering seeking a recount of votes in the sheriff's race, for which the total vote tally - 39,285, including write-in votes - is in line with vote counts for other races.

The hand count was conducted by the city with help from the county at the city's warehouse on N. Hawley Road. The count was completed Saturday and turned up 46,413 ballots, compared with the original report of 80,064, a difference of 33,651.

Based on city officials' diagnosis of the computer miscalculation, city officials believe instead of 46,413 that 46,548 people actually voted last week. The gap of 135 between that machine count and the hand count is mostly due to 101 ballots cast at 53rd Street School, 3618 N. 53rd St., that were tallied the night of the election but could not be located for the hand count, Edman said. A search is under way.

The remaining variance of 34 ballots will be reconciled when city officials review polling lists and other election materials before turning its numbers over to the Milwaukee County Election Commission. The county does the official canvass of vote totals and reports that to the State Elections Board.

Edman said she was satisfied by the outcome of the unusual ballot count because of the small variance.

"It really confirms the fact that the system works," she said. Programming error

The programming error has been fixed and will not be repeated in the November general election, Edman said.

The city initially said the computer error had affected tallies at every ward located in a multiward voting site.

But in the city's original turnout report, seven wards at multiward polling locations did not show duplicated turnout figures, seemingly in contradiction to the city's description of the computer error. Edman said Saturday, however, that there was a simple explanation for that: in those seven multiward sites, more than one voting machine was present.

Janice Dunn, county Election Commission manager, said she expects to complete the canvass of Milwaukee and suburbs by the end of the week. From the Sept. 17, 2006 editions of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

Global Gun Rights? (NYT)

By Joshua Kurlantzick

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

In July, as rifle-wielding militias in Iraq slaughtered civilians, the United Nations held a conference on small arms. The conference aimed at creating an international treaty limiting the trade in small arms — weapons designed for personal use, which cause about a thousand deaths worldwide each day. But after intensive debate, and despite the support of many nations, even the normally sunny Kofi Annan had to admit that the conference had collapsed or, as he put it, had “ended without agreeing on an outcome.”

One group represented at the conference had reason to celebrate: the National Rifle Association, which in the past decade has been refining its own version of globalization. At first, the group openly fought gun control abroad, but that enabled gun-control advocates to accuse local gun lobbies of selling out to America. In Brazil, the N.R.A. tried a new approach. Brazil has the most gun deaths annually of any country, and last October it held a referendum on a nationwide gun ban. In the run-up to the vote, polls suggested that more than 70 percent of Brazilians supported the ban. Then the Brazilian gun lobby, which previously had emphasized the desirability of gun ownership, began running advertisements that instead suggested that if the government could take away the right to own a weapon (though Brazilians have no constitutional right to bear arms), it could steal other civil liberties. This argument took gun-control advocates by surprise, and on voting day, 64 percent of Brazilians voted against the gun ban. "We gun-control groups failed to anticipate this idea of focusing on rights," admits Denis Mizne of Sou da Paz, a Brazilian public-policy institute. As a report in Foreign Policy revealed, the National Rifle Association lobbyist Charles Cunningham had traveled to Brazil as early as 2003 to impart strategy to local gun advocates, teaching them to emphasize rights instead of weapons.

Around the world, the N.R.A. is finding that a rights-based approach translates into many languages. As the N.R.A.'s executive vice president, Wayne LaPierre, says: "They made the rights argument [in Brazil.] They made the argument that this was being taken away from the people." He pauses. "It caught Iansa" — the International Action Network on Small Arms — "by surprise. They already had the Champagne on ice." In the mid-1990's, the N.R.A. became a nongovernmental observer at the United Nations and helped form a global coalition of pro-gun groups to match disarmament coalitions. At U.N. conferences, this coalition then uses success in national referendums to argue against global treaties. "The vote in Brazil on last Oct. 23 was a mandate," the head of one gun-advocacy group argued at the U.N. conference this July. "The international anti-gun community, especially powerful NGO's, was intimately and extensively involved in supporting the gun-ban referendum. They lost. They did not receive the mandate."

The N.R.A. is in the conservative vanguard: in recent years many conservative groups have been increasingly willing to engage abroad. Going global has several advantages. Organizations get more leverage over U.S. policy: conservative groups' growing knowledge of H.I.V. issues in Africa has given them more say over America's global AIDS policies, leverage that conservatives have used to press abstinence as a leading strategy. Going global also can provide a defense against the influence of international law, which judges like Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer have increasingly introduced into American courts. Conservative legal organizations like the Alliance Defense Fund have headed to countries like Sweden to combat international precedent on issues ranging from human cloning to home schooling. And conservatives now realize that by co-opting the language of rights, traditionally employed by the political left, they can export their own ideas of universal rights, whether that means the White House's democratization program or a universal right to bear arms.

Lee Hospital Deal Scrutinized (FMNP)

By Jennifer Booth Reed

Fort Myers (FL) News-Press, September 17, 2006

The state attorney general is looking into Lee Memorial Health System's acquisition of Southwest Florida Regional Medical Center and Gulf Coast Hospital.

"We are aware of this potential merger, or purchase, and we're in the process of reviewing the situation," spokeswoman JoAnn Carrin said.

In the 1990s, the attorney general had filed an amicus brief on Lee Memorial's behalf during the system's bid to acquire Cape Coral Hospital. At that time, the Federal Trade Commission was challenging Lee Memorial, saying the purchase would have given Lee Memorial too much control of the market.

District and appeals courts rejected the FTC argument and ruled Lee's status as a public hospital exempted it from antitrust action and the FTC did not have jurisdiction over the matter. The FTC dropped its complaint because Health Management Associates, or HMA, purchased it.

Cape Coral Hospital ultimately merged with Lee Memorial in June 1996. At the time of that merger, the state was seeking to block Hospital Corporation of America from taking over Cape Hospital because it would have too much power.

"The theory of antitrust is to protect the public," said Charles Bigelow, a retired attorney who used to work for Lee Memorial and is familiar with its status as a public agency. "If you apply antitrust to a public hospital, you're protecting the public from itself."

Carrin said there had been changes to the law in 2000, and state lawyers are looking to see whether those amendments have impact on the previous court rulings in Lee Memorial's favor.

"If we see an issue we would contact the parties," Carrin said.

U.S. Says Plan To Expand Alaska Oil Drilling Should Proceed (BLOOM)

By Jim Efstathiou Jr.

Bloomberg, September 17, 2006

Sept. 16 (Bloomberg) -- The Bush administration said a Sept. 27 sale of oil drilling leases in Alaska should go forward and rejected a court's objections that environmental effects have not been properly addressed.

The U.S. Interior Department said in a court filing yesterday that the impact of expanded drilling on air, water, wetlands and wildlife had been properly considered in the plan to expand drilling in the National Petroleum Reserve.

Earlier this month, U.S. District Judge James Singleton in Anchorage ruled that an environmental impact statement prepared by the agency failed ``to adequately address the cumulative effects" of drilling.

``Depending on the resource or activity, the cumulative impacts throughout the entire North Slope are discussed," the Interior Department said in the filing. The agency ``conducted the required `hard look' at those impacts given the limited nature of information available at the leasing stage."

Singleton's preliminary decision threatened plans to proceed with the lease sale and drew praise from groups including the National Audubon Society. The sale includes 400,000 acres around Teshekpuk Lake, an area environmental groups consider a critical Arctic wildlife habitat.

Expanding domestic oil and natural gas supplies was a cornerstone of the energy plan President George W. Bush unveiled early in his first term. Bush has so far failed to persuade Congress to allow drilling in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, 300 miles to the east of the petroleum reserve.

Teshekpuk Lake

The 23-million acre National Petroleum Reserve, on the Beaufort Sea between Barrow and the Colville River, was established in 1923 as a source of oil for the U.S. Navy. Environmental groups and some lawmakers oppose drilling in the area between Teshekpuk Lake and the Beaufort Sea.

Thousands of geese gather to molt in the area, and caribou birth their calves there, according to the National Audubon Society. Two oil spills from BP Plc pipelines this year further east in Prudhoe Bay have stirred concern about drilling for oil on Alaska's tundra.

The leasing plan acknowledged environmental concerns by imposing limits on surface structures and drilling activity during periods when wildlife could be impacted, the Bureau of Land Management said. The bureau oversees oil and gas drilling on federal lands for the Interior Department. Drilling would not be permitted in Teshekpuk Lake.

Prudhoe Bay Spill

The entire petroleum reserve could hold 9.3 billion barrels of crude, a 2002 U.S. Geological Survey report said. About 87 percent of the petroleum reserve has previously been available for drilling. The planned Sept. 27 lease sale would boost that to 95 percent.

BP in March reported the largest-ever oil spill on Alaska's North Slope, and last month the company partially shut Prudhoe Bay, the largest U.S. oil field, after discovering pipeline leaks and corrosion.

BP, the world's third-biggest oil company, neglected its Prudhoe Bay oil pipelines for years and may have suppressed worker complaints, U.S. lawmakers said at a Sept. 7 hearing in Washington. Senate Republicans who support expanded drilling in Alaska last week said BP's problems may set back efforts to tap Alaska's resources.

A Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times poll of 1,321 people in June found that 61 percent blamed Bush for high gasoline prices. In a July survey of 1,011 people, 32 percent said they have been forced to cut spending in other areas and to conserve energy. In the same poll, 51 percent were opposed to drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge while 45 percent were in favor.

Gulf Oil Discovery Adds Pressure To Offshore Drilling Debate (FLSUNSEN)

By William E. Gibson, Washington Bureau Chief

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Discovery of a vast oil deposit deep under the Gulf of Mexico has put additional pressure on Congress as it considers legislation on whether to allow offshore drilling closer to the Florida coast.

The undersea oil field 270 miles southwest of New Orleans, which could expand U.S. reserves by as much as 50 percent, provides new arguments for both sides of a contentious debate over legislation to expand offshore drilling.

Proponents say the discovery shows the great potential for tapping the Outer Continental Shelf closer to shore to boost energy supplies.

Opponents contend it proves energy companies have plenty of tracts to explore without moving into more environmentally sensitive areas near Florida, California and other states dependent on clean beaches and tourism.

Opponents already are on the defensive because of a rising demand for supplies amid high fuel costs, though prices have eased lately. They fear the discovery will prompt Congress to allow exploration in areas where drilling now is banned.

``It gives us [drilling opponents] a steeper hill to climb, now that the news of the size and scope of this find has been all over the country," said U.S. Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fort Pierce. ``This is welcome good news for energy independence and gives us new capacity. But I remain troubled by the prospect of putting more rigs in vulnerable areas along the main path of hurricanes."

The discovery comes as Congress is grappling over conflicting offshore drilling bills, written to boost domestic supplies and reduce U.S. dependence on foreign sources of oil and natural gas.

Most Florida leaders are rallying around a Senate-passed bill that would open 8.3 million acres of the Gulf to energy production but keep rigs more than 125 miles from the state's shores. Most drilling proponents prefer a House-passed version that would allow exploration as close as 50 miles from shore.

Drilling forces immediately hailed the discovery in the central Gulf as proof that the Outer Continental Shelf contains much more oil and gas than previously suspected.

A trio of energy companies dug a test well into ultra-deep waters below salt formations to find an oil supply undetected by more superficial seismic testing. The test well is spouting 6,000 barrels of oil a day, prompting estimates that the area contains 3 billion to 15 billion barrels.

``It's a big deal and very important," said Allan Pulsipher, executive director of the Center for Energy Studies at Louisiana State University. ``It will enable the U.S. to maintain its domestic supply of oil and gas at a level similar to where we are now. We'll still be dependent on oil imports, but less dependent than if this reserve were not there."

While significant, even 15 billion barrels would be tiny compared to Saudi Arabia's reserves of 250 billion barrels. The U.S. currently imports about 60 percent of its oil supplies and consumes about 20.6 million barrels a day, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration. Fifteen billion barrels would cover the nation's petroleum needs for about two years.

Proponents say expanding oil exploration could reveal there is much more than 3 billion to 15 billion barrels beneath the Gulf.

``This shows us the potential is there for America to not be so dependent on foreign sources," said U.S. Rep. John Peterson, R-Pa., a leading proponent of natural gas drilling.

Peterson has taunted Florida, whose members represent the biggest obstacle to his drilling plans, in the House debate. He once exhorted the White House to ``get its head out of the Florida sands" rather than accommodate the state's concerns.

``Florida has carved out a position that is actually thwarting America's opportunity to become energy self-sufficient," he said in an interview. ``The OCS is a safe place to produce. It's not a threat to Florida tourism or its beaches."

Foley and many environmentalists remain unconvinced, pointing to other recent developments that show vulnerabilities in oil drilling and distribution.

DOJ_NMG_0064712

These include leaks found in an Alaska pipeline and a federal report citing 124 spills from offshore rigs and pipelines in the Gulf last year caused by Hurricanes Rita and Katrina. Most of the 124 spills were minor, but all told, they spewed 741,384 gallons of toxic petroleum into Gulf waters.

``This new find will alleviate some of our dependence," Foley said, ``but at what cost and what risk?"

Hunt For Source Of Bad Spinach Carries On (NYT)

By Julia Preston And Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

SALINAS, Calif., Sept. 16 — Packaged spinach salad disappeared from store shelves across the country Saturday, as investigators searched for the source of bacterial contamination that has now sickened more than 100 people.

Officials said Saturday that the number of people affected by the E. coli outbreak now stood at 102, up from 94 the day before. Dr. David Acheson, director of food safety at the Food and Drug Administration, reported no additional deaths beyond one that had occurred in Wisconsin.

At this point, Dr. Acheson said, federal officials do not know how or when the spinach was contaminated.

"We advise consumers not to eat fresh spinach or fresh-spinach-containing products until further notice,'' he said Saturday night. The advice applies to food purchased at restaurants and supermarkets, he said.

Officials at the F.D.A. announced Friday that they had detected an "epidemiological link" between the outbreak of infections of E. coli O157:H7 and spinach produced by Natural Selection Foods, a company that grows and packages fresh greens in San Juan Bautista, Calif., and is best known for its organic Earthbound Farm brand.

But company executives and health officials emphasized Saturday that no E. coli bacteria had been found in Natural Selection plants or on any salad the company had distributed.

Federal officials initially advised consumers not to eat fresh spinach that had been packed in plastic bags. But Dr. Acheson said consumers should avoid eating fresh spinach in general because it might have come from such packages before it was displayed or served.

"Consumers may not be aware that the spinach available to them was prepackaged,'' he said.

With the wide publication of the Earthbound Farm name in connection with the outbreak, consumers wondered whether organic farm practices were implicated in the contamination. But no conclusive link has emerged between the infection and organic farming, Natural Selection executives and organic farming experts said.

Natural Selection distributes many products grown by its farmers that are not certified organic, and it has a large business packing fresh greens for other nonorganic growers, including Dole.

Growers and scientists were beginning to grasp the serious difficulties the F.D.A. faces in trying to pinpoint the source of the bacteria and eliminate it from the food supply. Health and agriculture experts said E. coli could creep into fresh leafy food at many points, from the field to the packing plant to the store.

In response to a question, Dr. Acheson said water used to irrigate spinach and lettuce fields was a possible source of the latest contamination, though he said officials had no evidence for or against that hypothesis.

"E. coli resides in the intestinal tract of cattle,'' he said. "When cattle manure gets into the water system, it can spread and contaminate anything the water gets into contact with.''

Natural Selection packs produce from 150 organic farmers in four states who are its direct partners in Earthbound Farm, and from farmers whose produce sells under at least two dozen other brands.

The 102 cases of illness have been reported from 19 states. In 16 of the 102 cases, Dr. Acheson said, patients developed a form of kidney failure called hemolytic uremic syndrome.

Natural Selection has issued a voluntary recall of all its products containing spinach carrying "Best if used by" dates from Aug. 17 to Oct. 1. F.D.A. officials said a number of people who were infected had reported eating spinach salads from brands that the company packs. But officials warned that their investigation could still point to other companies.

In California, growers said virtually all harvesting and production of spinach products, whether bagged or canned, had come to a halt.

Growers said the complexities in the process of farming, picking, washing and packing fresh leafy greens could make the contamination extraordinarily difficult to detect.

"To trace this you can go from the ground up," said Tim Chelling, a spokesman for Western Growers, which represents 3,000 growers and shippers in California and Arizona. "Testing the soil and the growing area would be the first possible point of entry."

Farming procedures in conventional, nonorganic fields are not regulated by the government. The production process, Mr. Chelling said, involves a host of people, like pickers and produce stockers, as well as many kinds of farm equipment and cleaning machinery.

Earlier this summer, the F.D.A detected a pattern of E. coli bacteria in fresh leafy vegetables, primarily lettuce, and focused its attention on the Salinas Valley in California. Since August, officials have been inspecting lettuce farms and packing plants in the valley, said Patti Roberts, a spokeswoman for the California Department of Health Services.

On Thursday and Friday, F.D.A. inspectors examined the huge Earthbound Farm packing plant, set among long rows of leafy vegetable crops, and found no evidence of bacteria, company executives said.

"Earthbound Farm has been making fresh salads for more than 20 years, and there has never been a safety problem associated with any of our products," Myra Goodman, a founder and vice president of the company, said Saturday. "Any association with this tragedy is obviously devastating to us."

Natural Selection's association with the infection was to some extent a result of its own success. Founded in 1984 on a three-acre farm, Natural Selection Foods now distributes produce farmed on 26,000 acres of certified organic fields in Arizona, California, Colorado and Washington.

Even within its organic operations, the company generates substantial sales of nonorganic products, Ms. Goodman said. As the organic food market expands, the company is converting new fields to organic farming, which does not use chemicals and pesticides. A field must be farmed organically for three years before its produce can be certified organic. During the transition, Natural Selection markets produce under nonorganic brand names.

Growers said they had set up rigorous safety systems, especially in the fresh produce industry. But contamination remains a constant challenge. "You can't just boil bacteria," said Hank Giclas, vice president of Western Growers. "It will kill the bacteria, but it also will kill some of the desirable features of the product."

Department Of Billion-dollar Bungling (TIME)

By Douglas Waller, Washington

Time, September 17, 2006

How the Interior Department managed to lose about $2 billion of the public's money. Can this mess be cleaned up?

Complaints are beginning to pile up against the U.S. Interior Department. And they're coming not just from outside critics but also from people in the agency. The problems surfacing are serious: managerial incompetence, bureaucratic snafus that are costing taxpayers billions of dollars, and a pervasive forgive-and-forget attitude toward senior department officials who cross ethical lines.

The Project on Government Oversight, a private watchdog group, released a study this week charging that Interior's Minerals and Management Service (MMS) has become far more lax the past four years in collecting unpaid royalties from the land it leases to oil and natural gas companies. From 2002 to 2005, MMS's auditing and compliance division collected $48 million not paid on mineral leases, which is "less than half the average $115 million collected annually in the division's first 20 years," according to Beth Daley, the watchdog organization's director of investigations. The drop in collections, Daley says, came after the auditing and compliance division cut its staff by 26% and began relying more on a computerized checking system of the leases "based upon information provided from the industry."

But the watchdog group's beef with Interior is tepid compared with the blast delivered a day earlier by the department's own inspector general, Earl Devaney. In scorching testimony before a House Government Reform subcommittee the no-nonsense Devaney charged that during his seven years as Interior's IG his revelations of misdeeds and foul-ups have been routinely "disregarded by the department." Numerous IG reports on regulations circumvented, procurement irregularities, project failures and bureaucrats being awarded bonuses despite their failures have been met with "vehement challenges" by Interior officials "to the quality of our audits, evaluations and investigations," he told lawmakers.

One of the most expensive examples of "bureaucratic bungling," according to Devaney, was a department program in the late 1990s to encourage oil-company exploration in deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico, where it's more difficult than it is on land to extract the crude. Those leases exempted the companies from having to pay royalties to the federal government. The agreements, however, were supposed to have a clause in them that lifted the exemption if oil prices shot past $36 a barrel. (Oil currently sells for more than $60 a barrel.) But because of a foul-up in drafting the deepwater leases, 1,000 of them issued in 1998 and 1999 didn't contain the language lifting the exemption for higher prices. And, Devaney says, mid-level Interior bureaucrats kept their superiors in the dark about the omission for five years. The Government Accountability Office estimates that the mistake has so far cost taxpayers $2 billion in lost royalty revenue and that number could eventually soar to $10 billion.

Rather than heads rolling for infractions, the Cabinet agency has become a fault-free zone, Devaney claims. "Short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of Interior," says the former Secret Service agent. "Ethics failures on the part of senior department officials—taking the form of appearances of impropriety, favoritism, and bias—have been routinely dismissed with a promise 'not to do it again.'" In numerous instances top officials who leave the department under a cloud, said Devaney, "are sent off with a party paying tribute to their good service."

A case Devaney found particularly troubling was that of Steven Griles, Interior's deputy secretary in George W. Bush's first term. Devaney in 2004 referred 25 possible ethics violations by Griles to the Office of Government Ethics outside of Interior. That office cleared Griles of 23 of the violations but referred the remaining two to then-Secretary Gale Norton for a decision. Devaney says Norton refused, over his objections, to take any action against her deputy.

Griles, who left the department in January 2005, says he was cleared because all the allegations investigated by the IG were "conclusively and unquestionably proven to be false." Norton tells TIME that of the two potential violations the ethics office kicked back to her, "one was about a dinner Steve Griles had in the home of a lobbyist (which Griles paid for), and the other was a question about the definition of a 'particular matter' under federal ethics guidelines. On that latter point, I simply viewed Mr. Devaney's interpretation as legally incorrect."

Meanwhile, Dirk Kempthorne, who replaced Norton as Interior Secretary last July, insists he's taking Devaney's "allegations concerning issues dating back to 1998 very seriously." Kempthorne points out that his first day on the job he sent a letter to Interior employees titled "Our Ethical Responsibilities." Since then, the new Interior chief says he's been preaching to his workers that when they're unsure whether something is ethical or not, "if in doubt... don't."

Congress, however, wants to see more than employee pep talks. "The Interior Department breached its fiduciary duty to the American people," says Republican Rep. Darrell Issa, who chairs the government reform panel's Energy and Resources Subcommittee. "It is charged with holding our natural resources in trust." Instead, he complains, the department "squandered billions."

Issues Of Ecology, Theology Collide (KCS)

By Rick Montgomery

The Kansas City Star, September 17, 2006

Before watching the end of the world, hundreds of movie viewers bowed their heads.

“Guard us against the historical arrogance of our own species,” a Methodist minister prayed recently at the Glenwood Arts Theatre in Overland Park. Then lights dimmed for the Midwest premiere of “The Great Warming.”

The documentary on the man-made dangers of global warming is being released for church groups to review before the Nov. 7 elections. While its plot is an easy sell to this invited crowd — more left than right, plenty of hybrid cars parked outside — the film raises spiritual questions that could carve up evangelical voting blocs in new ways.

Is protecting Earth a moral value, an act of stewardship?

Seeking to nudge more social conservatives into the ecological fold, bumper stickers are asking, “What Would Jesus Drive?”

DOJ_NMG_0064715

"This movement in the last six to nine months has mushroomed," said Chuck Gillam, a one-time Republican who is a representative to the Sustainable Sanctuary Coalition, an interfaith group that meets monthly in Prairie Village. "Global warming could be the one thing where you can get a united front between the secular and religious."

Cracks are appearing within evangelical communities once inclined to dismiss environmental protection as a scientific rush to big government. Many conservative pastors remain skeptical — not because the science is wrong, but because they say their congregations would rather take on abortion, stem-cell research and same-sex marriage.

The harmful effects of those issues will "come kicking at our door far quicker than global warming will," said the Rev. Jerry Johnston of First Family Church in Overland Park.

But in February, an unlikely coalition of church, corporate and seminary leaders called for the U.S. government to aggressively curb greenhouse-gas emissions. Their TV ad campaign urged Americans to "stop global warming for our kids, our world and our Lord."

Backers of this so-called Evangelical Climate Initiative include Rick Warren, author of the best-selling book The Purpose-Driven Life, and leaders of the National Association of Evangelicals — a group comprising 60 denominations representing 45,000 churches.

In July, an opposition group fired back.

More than 100 Christian pastors, economists and climate researchers calling themselves the Interfaith Stewardship Alliance signed a 12,000-word manifesto debunking the science that blames global warming on human activity and the burning of fossil fuels.

Saying that global warming exists but probably by natural causes, the group questioned whether humans can or should do anything to correct it.

"It is immoral and harmful to Earth's poorest citizens to deny them the benefits of abundant, reliable, affordable electricity and other forms of energy," the policy statement noted.

Still, groups such as Green Cross International and the Evangelical Environmental Network hope "The Great Warming" will prompt some social conservatives to slide left on this one topic.

The campaign aims to schedule special screenings for large churches nationwide before the film hits theaters in late October. About 500 pastors have been asked to give Earth-friendly sermons and urge their flocks to quiz candidates on environmental positions.

"There are socially conservative business leaders frustrated with the current administration when it comes to energy policy," said Troy Helming, a "green Republican" and founder of Lenexa-based Krystal Planet Corp., a renewable-energy company that is backing the film.

"Some feel they can't speak up without alienating themselves."

A crossover issue

An August poll by the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life found global warming was considered a serious problem by 79 percent of Americans — and 68 percent of "white evangelical Protestants."

Nearly half of white evangelicals who responded to the poll said stricter environmental laws were "worth the cost," still less than Catholics, mainline Protestants and "secular" respondents.

"There's a real potential for this to become a crossover issue," said John Green, a Pew Forum fellow.

"White evangelical Protestants are much more sympathetic to environmental problems than other people might think," Green said. "It could be that their attitudes are changing. It could be they're just beginning to form opinions as more becomes known" about global warming.

The Rev. Richard Cizik pushes "creation care" — a crusade against climate change. Cizik, the former head of the National Association of Evangelicals, calls ecological degradation "an offense against God."

Weighing in last month in The New Republic was Harvard University biologist Edward O. Wilson, the winner of the National Medal of Science and two Pulitzer Prizes.

"Despite all that divides science from religion, there is good reason to hope that an alliance on environment issues is possible," Wilson wrote in an open letter to an imagined Southern Baptist pastor.

"While the Old Testament God commands humanity to take dominion over the Earth, the decree is not … an excuse to trash the planet."

That was the broadside attack in 1967, when historian Lynn White Jr. wrote in Science magazine that Christianity "bears a huge burden of guilt" for raping the planet. He blamed a dominion theology spelled out in the book of Genesis for allowing centuries of misuse of the environment.

"You don't hear those arguments about dominion anymore," said Bill Stancil, the chairman of the theology department at Rockhurst University.

However, Armageddon and the end of days remain popular concepts, evidenced by huge worldwide sales of the Left Behind series of novels by Tim LaHaye and J.B. Jenkins. Those beliefs may work against efforts to spur Christian conservatives to rally against climate change.

After all, said Stancil, "what instigates the second coming of Christ is the world getting worse, not better."

'A matter of priorities'

Says Johnston of First Family Church: "I doubt you'll have more than a small handful of churches that will get on this global-warming bandwagon." Johnston is the host of a conservative radio show and leads a congregation of 6,000.

It is not so much a matter of religion versus science, said Johnston. "It's a matter of priorities. On the list of priorities of most evangelical churches, it would be way down the ladder," he said of global warming.

At a meeting of the Sustainable Sanctuary Coalition last week at Village Presbyterian Church, a dozen volunteers from 10 congregations discussed how best to spread the bad news about God's green Earth. Many weren't sure their pastors were willing to extol a message that some churchgoers may see as too political.

And their own politics?

Only one coalition member professed to be Republican. Another proudly flashed a sticker thumping the GOP as the "Grand Oil Party."

None who spoke up agreed with the Bush administration's position on the Iraq war or the president's ban on funding embryonic stem-cell research.

Meet the religious right's alter ego — the social-justice left. Beyond politics dividing the two, theological differences can lead to stalemate.

"The fork in the road is when you question whether the world is unfolding according to God's plan or we're just messing it up on our own," said coalition leader Margaret Thomas.

There is one sure way to end the conversation, said Stancil, the Rockhurst theologian.

"We've become so polarized, the easy thing is to fall into group think: 'That's your group's issue — not my group's issue.' "

Alabama Guns In Criminal Hands Across Country (BN)

By Carol Robinson, News Staff Writers

The Birmingham News (AL), September 17, 2006

Lenient laws blamed for supplying black market of crime weapons

Guns, bought easily and legally in Alabama and other states, are landing in the hands of criminals elsewhere, drawing the ire of leaders who have sued to stop the flow and pledged to fight what they say is a deadly export.

Alabama's role as a Top 10 supply state for "crime guns" - weapons purchased legally here but transferred illegally to others and sometimes used in crimes - is undisputed.

New York City police say that 5 percent of the guns recovered at crimes in the first half of 2005 were last sold at retail in Alabama.

"Alabama ranks, along with some other Southern states and some Midwestern states, in being a supply state because of its traditionally more lenient lifestyle and gun laws," said Jim Cavanaugh, who supervises ATF operations in portions of the South. "Guns are more readily available, more easily traded, plentiful. It's real."

Guns trafficked out of Alabama have turned up during all kinds of investigations in other locations - robberies, assaults, sex crimes, drug crimes and at least 10 homicides - in the past several years, according to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Special Agent Eric Kehn said Alabama guns have shown up from coast to coast: from Landover, Md., to Los Angeles; from Chicago to cities throughout Florida.

New York City has sued in Georgia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and Virginia - and pledged to sue wherever needed - alleging a handful of gun dealers have created a public nuisance and are negligent in selling weapons that eventually land in the hands of criminals.

Outlined in the suit is the purchase of 60 weapons in Ohio and Alabama, including some guns later sold in the New York City's Mott Haven public housing community.

The New York City actions and scrutiny of crime guns have set off a congressional fight about the release of information used to trace the weapons, data compiled by the ATF. While the bureau continues to provide trace information in criminal cases, it has been blocked by special amendment in Congress from making the information public.

28 Alabama cases

ATF concentrates its investigations on firearms traffickers who divert guns from lawful commerce into the hands of criminals. Nationally, ATF investigations resulted in the convictions of 1,448 firearms traffickers in 2005. Alabama had 28 cases and 29 convictions that year, mostly from the greater Birmingham area, Kehn said.

Two 2005 Alabama cases accounted for hundreds of firearms.

ATF said a Hazel Green man and a man and wife from Huntsville were sentenced for dealing firearms without a license, obliterating serial numbers and conspiracy. The cases - involving the illegal sale of several hundred weapons - included guns recovered in New York, New Jersey, Florida and elsewhere.

Also in 2005, ATF and 20 other law enforcement agencies cooperated in Operation Flea Collar, an effort to stop illegal arms sales at flea markets and gun shows in Collinsville, Dutton and Birmingham. Eleven people were indicted and 556 weapons seized. The investigators recovered guns previously purchased from the defendants in Texas, Illinois, New York, Michigan, California, Georgia and North Carolina, according to the ATF.

Joe Vince Sr., former chief of gun analysis at ATF and now a partner in a firm called Crime Gun Solutions, said 86 percent of all firearms dealers never have a crime gun traced back to their business. The New York City suit, citing ATF research, says only about 1 percent of gun dealers are responsible for 57 percent of illegally possessed guns nationwide.

Easy smuggling

ATF's Cavanaugh said traffickers choose Alabama because they can get guns easier here than in other states.

"Cities in the North create stringent laws so a black market is created," Cavanaugh said. "Criminal firearms traffic doesn't have to cross a national border. So the smuggling across state lines becomes easy for a criminal to do. He's not going to run into border checkpoints and be questioned. Once he acquires the guns, he has an unfettered route."

New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg not only had his city file suit but also has formed a coalition that has drawn more than 80 mayors to share information about guns and to fight for stricter controls and reporting.

"This is not a question of ideologies or a referendum on the Second Amendment," Bloomberg said when the group was formed. "This is about public safety and making sure that illegal guns never make their way into the hands of criminals and onto our streets."

Gun-ownership Case Is Going To Trial In Wyoming (AP)

By Ben Neary, Associated Press

AP, September 17, 2006

State aims to help some domestic abusers regain right

CHEYENNE — Arguments are scheduled next month in a case in which Wyoming is seeking a federal court ruling affirming its authority to help some people convicted of misdemeanor domestic violence regain their right to own a firearm.

DOJ_NMG_0064718

Federal law prohibits people with such convictions from owning guns.

U.S. District Judge Alan Johnson is scheduled to hear arguments in the case Oct. 6 in Cheyenne.

The state alleges that the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives acted illegally when it threatened to disallow about 11,000 concealed weapons permits the state issued as a substitute for federal background checks for firearms purchases.

The federal agency threatened to take that step unless the state repealed a 2004 law that allows people to expunge a first conviction for misdemeanor domestic violence.

State Sen. Cale Case said he and former state Rep. Mike Baker, both Republicans, sponsored the Wyoming expungement law after Case heard from a constituent who had lost his right to own firearms because of a misdemeanor domestic violence conviction and then discovered there was no way to appeal.

"I just look at it as constitutional; it is the Second Amendment," Case said. "And to me, one of the fundamental rights in society shouldn't be lost for anything less than a felony conviction."

Wyoming Attorney General Pat Crank says the current lawsuit comes down to an issue of states' rights. The National Rifle Association and the Gun Owners Foundation in Washington, D.C., have both filed briefs supporting the state's position.

"We believe that Congress has very explicitly said that you look to state law to see if someone's firearms rights have been restored," Crank said.

Federal officials, however, say the issue is more narrow. They contend the state law fails to meet the legal standard for expungement.

Although the law allows people to petition in court to expunge a first misdemeanor conviction, it specifies that the record of that first conviction remains on the books for purposes of enhancing penalties for any subsequent crime.

"The nuts and bolts of the government's position is that an expungement of a conviction wipes the slates clean, and that an expungement erases a conviction," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Carol A. Statkus, one of the lawyers representing the ATF. "The Wyoming statute that's at issue in this case doesn't do that."

Mike Blonigen, the district attorney in Casper and vice president of the Wyoming Prosecutors Association, said the state needs to know either way whether its expungement law is valid in the eyes of the nation.

"I feel very uncomfortable telling people they're OK, when we don't know that they are," Blonigen said. "That's the biggest thing we're worried about: We do the expungement, they think they're OK, and they get into trouble in another state."

Case, however, says the lawsuit has become "a test case for the entire nation, and boy, I'm glad to have a small part in that. If we can get the constitutional rights remedied, that would be a great thing."

Daniel Webster, co-director for the Center for Gun Policy and Research at Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health in Baltimore, says he worked on a national study that found that the risk women face of being killed in an abusive relationship increases approximately fivefold when their male partners have access to guns.

Webster said Wyoming's effort to restore gun rights to people who have been convicted of domestic violence "suggests that there's greater value being placed on guns than on individual's lives, and I think that's very sad."

A School Day Of Reckoning Over Steroids? (WP)

By Fay Vincent

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

It was a long time ago, but the memories of those first days of football practice linger with me the way the taste of sweet little cakes did with Proust. For me, the smell of freshly cut grass does it. I am immediately drawn back to a time some 50 years ago when I would stretch out on the field at my little New England college doing what we called "grass drills."

Next to us was a river, and beyond, a display of autumn foliage so stunning that it became a major distraction for young players trying to focus on the guttural directions of their coaches.

I remember looking at that scene and having a distinctly religious experience. I knew God was somewhere in those hills. And then I was back on the grass pushing my 18-year-old frame against a classmate and trying to learn how to block and tackle.

For a lineman, there was only so much to the skill part of football. The bulk of it was a function of size, which I had, and strength, which I had in some lesser measure. For I was a 6-foot-2 tackle weighing 230 pounds, which in those days meant I was considered a big guy.

Not anymore. The other day I went down to my old college field to watch the current generation begin to get ready for their season, and the size of the kids was astonishing. Not only were they enormous, they were also exceptionally muscular. As they stood there with shirts off, I could see the effects of all their weight training -- even on the smaller backs and receivers. Some of the linemen were obviously pushing 300 pounds -- and it wasn't fat.

My immediate thought was how fortunate I was to have played when I did. For while I may envy today's players their youth, I have to wonder about their size. Is it all diet, exercise, training? Or is some of it attributable to chemicals?

Another former player at my college, who went on to a distinguished career in medicine, marvels at the size of even Division III players. (That's the NCAA division where they don't give athletic scholarships.) He told me he was certain some of these kids were taking supplements to reach the sizes they did at such young ages. "You cannot get that big eating your Wheaties" is how he put it.

It got me thinking of the possible consequences of what has been going on the past few years with young athletes in virtually all sports. If, as seems likely, many of this generation have been taking such things as steroids and human growth hormones, they have been doing so with the benign neglect of their coaches and school officials. It is inconceivable that the people who are around these kids a lot don't know, or at least suspect, that something is going on.

And yet we are doing little to educate young athletes to the risks of using such chemicals. Perhaps some of us believe we're excused because we have no hard data on the long-term medical consequences of taking whatever these kids have been taking. But I wonder about the risks for the schools.

Let us shift forward several decades. Now the players are returning to their old fields, as I did to mine, to sit in the shadows of advancing age and watch others sweat in the grass. I wonder whether they'll feel as warm and fuzzy about their colleges and their experiences on the field as I do. Or will some be coping with serious medical ailments and disabilities -- problems they now attribute to the failure of others to have warned them against using chemicals that inflated their bodies but also injured them and distorted their genes?

Will our universities and colleges be like the tobacco companies, forced to argue in court that these kids knew, or should have known, that the substances they were using weren't good for their health? I wonder whether the schools will be faced with lawsuits based on the mounting numbers of former athletes who might allege that they were victims of neglectful abuse by their onetime educational mentors.

And I wonder whether those former athletes taking their alma maters to court might not have a pretty good case.

IMMIGRATION:

Contractors At Federal Detention Facility Detained -- For Fake Immigration Documents (MH)

The Miami Herald, September 17, 2006

Immigration officers have detained 15 foreign nationals and accused them of using fake documents while working for a company doing roofing contract work at a federal detention facility in South Miami-Dade, ICE said Friday.

Barbara Gonzalez, the agency's spokeswoman in Miami, said the 15 men were detained Sept. 7 after officers from the bureau of prisons at the Federal Correctional Institution stopped three of them because they suspected their immigration documents were fraudulent.

Gonzalez said the officers contacted ICE, which dispatched investigators. Gonzalez said the three detained initially were scheduled to work at the facility with a roofing contractor.

"Further information developed by ICE agents revealed that 15 individuals working as contractors were illegal aliens," Gonzalez said. ``They had fraudulent immigration documents."

Gonzalez said 13 of the detained men came from Mexico and the other two came from Guatemala. Twelve of the men had fraudulent green cards, and three had fraudulent Social Security cards, she said.

All were transported to the Krome detention center in West Miami-Dade and put in deportation proceedings, Gonzalez said.

Disclosure of the Miami detentions came three days after two alleged leaders of a nationwide "employee-leasing conspiracy," allegedly involving hundreds of undocumented foreign nationals, pleaded guilty in Fort Lauderdale before U.S. District Judge Kenneth Marra, who sentenced a third defendant in the case.

The Justice Department and ICE said Jaroslaw Sawczuk, 39, a Polish citizen formerly of Coral Springs, and Jozef Bronislaw Bogacki, 43, a Polish-born naturalized U.S. citizen living in Clearwater, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy to transport, house and encourage undocumented immigrants to remain in the United States, commit visa, wire, mail and tax fraud, and money laundering.

Marra sentenced a third defendant, Pavel Preus, 39, a Polish citizen residing in Pompano Beach, to 37 months in prison and 36 months of supervised release. He pleaded guilty to similar charges on Wednesday, the agency said.

Three other Slovak defendants -- Lucia Kanis, 31, Ivan Kanis, 39, and Andor Pikali, 37 -- are at large and believed to be abroad, the agency said.

Day Laborers' Lawsuit Casts Spotlight On A Nationwide Conflict (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

WHITE PLAINS, Sept. 14 — The 36-year-old Mexican man has lived in Mamaroneck for eight years, trekking each morning to Columbus Park near the village center to wait for contractors who might pay him $10 an hour at best. But the village closed the hiring site in the park in February, and after that, he testified in court here last week, the police often chased away the employers with tickets, and the workers with fear.

"An officer stands very close, sometimes within a foot or 18 inches, to where I or a group of day laborers stand," the man told a judge, speaking through a Spanish translator. "He crosses his arms and stares at us for long periods of time until we eventually feel compelled to change our location.

"Sometimes," he added, "he places his hand on his gun while he stares at us."

The man, identified in court as John Doe No. 6, is one of six anonymous day laborers whose federal lawsuit against the Village of Mamaroneck could set a new national standard for the way local governments deal with the fast-growing influx of day laborers in their communities. For a week, Judge Colleen McMahon in Federal District Court heard testimony in a nonjury trial from the laborers, the police, contractors, merchants and village officials. Lawyers in the case said they hoped a decision would be reached by mid-October.

The case accuses village officials of harassing the workers as part of a "deliberate and coordinated" campaign to drive them off the streets, and rests on the workers' 14th Amendment claim that they are discriminated against because they are Hispanic. At the start of the trial, they dropped their original First Amendment claims — that the village had violated their rights to free speech and free association — out of concern that it would force them to reveal their immigration status. The plaintiffs say they are remaining anonymous because they fear retaliation from the authorities. Their lawyer said some of the workers were here legally, while others are not.

"If we lose, the signal that is being sent is that towns and villages can aggressively enforce ordinances in a way that might make it impossible for the day laborers to find work," said Cesar A. Perales, president of the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund. "That's what's being tested here."

Across the country, the proliferation of day laborers has yielded disjointed responses, both in traditional immigrant hubs such as Texas and California and in suburban communities like Mamaroneck that have experienced sudden and sharp increases in immigration. Advocates and local officials place the blame, in part, on the federal government's inconsistent enforcement of immigration policies.

In Burbank, Calif., local officials required a new Home Depot store to build a day labor site, but five miles to the southeast, the City of Glendale passed a law barring day laborers from soliciting work from curbs. In May, a federal judge sided with the laborers in Glendale in a suit claiming that the law violated their free speech rights; the city has appealed the decision.

Fort Worth opened an official hiring site to get the workers off street corners and out of shopping center parking lots. In Herndon, Va., a Washington suburb, a similar move last year drew protests from the Minutemen Project, a group intent on fighting illegal immigration.

After years of recoiling in the face of opposition, the laborers are now fighting back, in court and on the streets. In Freehold, N.J., for example, after officials shuttered a hiring site two years ago, the workers filed a class-action suit, and though they now lack a place to gather, they have organized to keep daily lists of everyone seeking jobs.

"The day-laborer issue is very controversial and emotional," said Edwin Meléndez, a professor at Milano The New School for Management and Urban Policy and co-author of a recent study of day laborers.

"These workers are highly visible, which makes them an easy target. And then you have the neighbors complaining that they drink, loiter, urinate in public. When you have this equation that your safety is being threatened and your quality of life is being affected, the sort of knee-jerk reaction is to conclude that the day laborers have to go."

Here in Westchester County, day laborers had flocked to Mamaroneck, a village of 19,000 on the edge of Long Island Sound, for at least a decade, turning the parking lot of Columbus Park into an unofficial hiring site. Many worked regularly for the same contractors; many of the contractors relied on them during the hectic summer months.

Two years ago, the Hispanic Resource Center in Mamaroneck proposed building a hiring site on a piece of village-owned land near Interstate 95, but residents objected, saying it would clog traffic on an already busy strip. Instead, village officials soon decided to formally designate the parking lot as a sanctioned hiring spot. On warm days, as many as 200 men converged at the park, coming from across Westchester County and from as far south as the Bronx.

Residents charged that the workers urinated in public, defecated, fought with one another, littered and slept in the park overnight. Parents bringing children to a nearby day-care center told the police that the men's presence made them feel uneasy, and a developer of luxury condominiums being built across from the park urged officials to make the laborers go elsewhere.

In August 2004, the Police Department began posting two patrol cars at the park, which the laborers said scared away the contractors. At a public hearing in January, one village trustee compared the laborers to locusts, and then joined in a 3-2 vote to shut down the site on Feb. 1, 2006. In April, Mamaroneck's mayor, Philip J. Trifiletti, defending the decision, accused the workers of "trashing" the park and straining village finances.

The workers moved to the streets after that, and the police followed them, particularly along Mamaroneck Avenue and Van Ranst Place, where most of the men gathered between 7 and 10 a.m. every day but Sunday, according to court testimony. At times, the laborers said, police officers used words or gestures to order the workers to move; other times, they just stared.

Two contractors testified that they were ticketed for minor traffic violations after picking up workers in Mamaroneck, suggesting it was retaliation for supporting the day laborers. None of the workers have been arrested or ticketed. But the village's police chief, Edward E. Flynn, a defendant in the lawsuit, along with Mayor Trifiletti and the village itself, said his officers were simply enforcing the law by citing drivers who violate traffic regulations. "At no time was the police presence ever undertaken to restrict or impede laborers from soliciting or obtaining work," Chief Flynn testified.

He said he had gotten complaints from residents about laborers running across the street and blocking traffic or sticking their heads into cars to solicit work. "There was definitely increased police activity in that area, but that was because of the complaints we had received."

The village's lawyer, Kevin J. Plunkett, added, "What they're trying to do now is beat up our Police Department, and we're simply not going to allow that."

As the trial progressed through the week here, day laborers continued to pace the streets six miles away in Mamaroneck, searching for work.

Testimony for two of the plaintiffs had to be postponed because they were working when they were scheduled to be in court. "What choice to I have?" asked one of those plaintiffs, a 24-year-old man from Guatemala. "I have a family to support at home, and I still have to pay my rent."

Guardsmen's Behavior Called Isolated Incident (HC)

By John W. Gonzalez

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

•'Operation Jump Start' is dealt a setback after gunfire at cookout

EAGLE PASS - Nobody said it would be a thrill for National Guard troops to help the U.S. Border Patrol with administrative and other tasks, allowing scores of patrol agents to resume law enforcement duties.

But the two-year military mission known as "Operation Jump Start" wasn't supposed to be such a tedious assignment that highly trained troops would bide their off-duty time with beer-fueled joyriding and reckless gunfire.

That's what may have happened here earlier this month in an incident that has disappointed Texas National Guard officials during an otherwise successful deployment.

Three soldiers from North Texas, at least one of whom had served in Iraq, were arrested the evening of Sept. 6 on felony deadly-conduct charges after several shots were fired from their private vehicle as it passed a family cookout in a modest Maverick County subdivision, officials said.

Several adults and children "hit the dirt" fearing a drive-by attack, Sheriff Tomas S. Herrera said, but no one was targeted or injured by the gunshots and no property damage was reported.

"Apparently the family was having a carne asada outside and they saw this vehicle drive by, stop in front of the residence and shoot several times. Then they took off and made a U-turn and came back and did the same thing," Herrera said.

Reputation damageTwo cases of beer — minus three brews — were found in the car when the suspects were located at a convenience store soon after the gunfire was reported to sheriff's dispatchers, Herrera said.

None of the soldiers appeared intoxicated upon arrest, Herrera said. The 9mm pistol, owned by one of the soldiers, and several spent shells were in the car, the sheriff said. The suspects took turns firing, he added.

After being held nearly a week on $50,000 bond each, the suspects were freed Tuesday after bond was reduced to $15,000. Charged were Pfc. Brandon Leland Jones, 23, of Saint Jo; Pvt. David Wayne Hampton, 23; and Spc. Corey Lydell Sampract, 24, both of McKinney. Their cases may be submitted to a grand jury later this month, the sheriff said.

Damage to the Guard's reputation still was being assessed last week.

"Obviously we're very disappointed. We're addressing this as an isolated incident where three individuals made some really, really bad choices," said Guard headquarters spokesman Chief Master Sgt. Gonda Moncada at Camp Mabry in Austin.

"We are praying that this does not reflect on the overall view our citizens have on what the Texas National Guard does, because we have 20,000 folks doing the right thing," she said.

Investigation continuesAfter posting bond, the soldiers, who could face military sanctions, were reassigned to Camp Mabry while the sheriff completes his investigation, Guard officials said. Military prosecutors await the same findings.

So far, it looks like a case of boredom getting the better of young troops far from home, Herrera said.

"They were not on duty at the time. They were not in uniform. The weapon they used was not a field weapon that belonged to the federal government. They were just bored from not doing anything and decided to go out on a joyride," Herrera said.

Lodged in motels, the troops were among 1,500 soldiers stationed along the Texas border since June to bolster the Border Patrol while it trains new agents. Barred from enforcing immigration laws, the troops handle jobs from surveillance to truck repair, serving tours of duty usually spanning several months.

In training, troops learn about the communities where they're stationed and are reminded of the conduct expected, officials said. With ample volunteers for the border operation, Guard officials insist they assign soldiers who are best suited for the mission.

No change in trainingThe way troops prepare for border duty won't dramatically change as a result of the arrests, which captured the attention of Guard leaders, said Capt. Dick Jinks, spokesman for Operation Jump Start in Texas.

"I don't see any impact on our training per se, but I can tell you that the chain of command for all of Texas Operation Jump Start is taking this very seriously and addressing it at every level, reiterating to the soldiers about responsibility," he said.

"With 1,500 people over a given amount of time, you're going to have small things here and there," he added.

County Judge Jose A. Aranda Jr. agreed the arrests were "isolated," but he said they were puzzling because the community has welcomed the troops, even though some residents disapproved of their presence.

Options are limitedAranda, who opposes the deployment, sympathizes with soldiers assigned here because entertainment options are limited to restaurants, bars, the Kickapoo casino and the Mexican border town of Piedras Negras, he said.

"You send in a group of people who are actually trained to do something else, you put them behind a desk, you've got them stashed away in a hotel. They're bored and they were out having fun," Aranda said.

Renewing his claim that troops wouldn't fully appreciate border culture, Aranda said the soldiers' random gunfire in the Deer Run subdivision showed insensitivity.

"They don't understand how our neighborhoods are, and you're not supposed to be out there shooting on the roads. That can lead to something," Aranda said.

Guarding The Country From The Border Line (BSUN)

In Ariz., Maryland National Guardsmen keep watch in the immigration fight -- even on sovereign land

Sells, Ariz. -- Even from this height, almost 100 feet above the cactus-covered desert floor and armed with high-powered binoculars, Spc. Donald Neuer struggles to identify the small black dots scurrying down the Baboquivari Mountains near the Mexican border.

Cattle? Horses? People?

The 21-year-old Maryland National Guard soldier immediately radios in a report to the U.S. Border Patrol. His confidence grows quickly: There are more than 30, he concludes, and they're human. He quickly tags them as UDAs -- undocumented aliens.

And they are still running, heading toward the thick mesquite brush along a bone-dry streambed known as a desert wash. He's about to lose them in the twilight.

"We're going after the guy with the tan shirt. He gave us, uh, the gesture," Neuer says.

In a few minutes, before day folds into night, Border Patrol agents swing into action.

Guided by Neuer and his fellow soldiers, they storm the darkened site about a mile away with an armada of ATVs and motorcycles and their noisy helicopter hovering over it all.

Neuer and 120 fellow volunteers from the Maryland National Guard have been dispatched to the Sonoran Desert as part of a stopgap interdiction measure announced in May by President Bush.

Critics have questioned whether sending up to 6,500 part-time soldiers to watch the southern border is wise for a National Guard still saddled with commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan. They asked whether the Guard should be engaged in a seemingly extracurricular homeland security mission when its leaders struggle to recruit more soldiers and retain the guardsmen in their ranks today.

Before Sept. 11, 2001, signing up for the National Guard largely meant spending weekends doing training exercises, protecting communities during natural disasters and answering a rare call to defend abroad. Now, those who join could be serving in wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and standing on the Mexican border.

Watching the flow of people crossing the border every day, some of the Marylanders admit, has been eye-opening and disturbing, causing some to question the nation's immigration policies. Several guardsmen here are still waiting to become citizens and sympathize with those seeking to come to America.

Feel like strangers Moreover, the Marylanders say they sometimes feel like strangers in a strange land, conducting operations in the country's second-largest Native American reservation.

But they also believe their efforts are paying off. Their presence, they said, also gives the Border Patrol extra time to train 6,000 new agents over the next two years.

"I think the biggest surprise was the level of activity of people crossing the border and what the Border Patrol agents have been up against for the last several years," said Capt. Brian Perez, commander of the Maryland unit here. "The number of people coming across daily is just incredible."

More than a million suspected illegal immigrants were caught last year along the southwest border alone. The Border Patrol does not estimate how many its agents failed to catch.

The guardsmen knew their assignment would take them to south-central Arizona for about 60 days, a tour that ends later this month. Once they arrived in early August, the guardsmen learned more about their unusual destination: All of their surveillance outposts are within the independent Tohono O'odham nation.

Bordered by Arizona to the north, east and west and to the south for 74 miles with Mexico, about 14,000 Native Americans, live on these traditional lands that match the size of Connecticut and straddle the U.S.-Mexican border.

Its sparsely populated and unforgiving topography -- with miles to go before reaching a town or city, much less a decent drink of water -- has turned the Tohono O'odham lands into one of the deadliest illegal border crossings. In parts, its plains stretch out unmercifully, littered with empty water bottles and discarded clothing. This year, 56 immigrants have died here.

"We found some of them hanging who committed suicide," said the tribe's assistant police chief, Joseph Delgado. "One time, we found they were close to death and they had buried themselves in the dirt because of the heat."

Sgt. Tobias Nez joined the Nation's police department 25 years ago when it had about 20 officers. Today, inundated by illegal immigrants, his department has 70 officers.

While most illegal immigrants only seek safe passage, he said, tribal members have also seen their homes broken into and occasionally have become victims of assaults and kidnappings. Last year, Tohono O'odham officials estimate its tribe spent $2.7 million in border-related expenditures, from death investigations to drug-smuggling cases.

Still, not every tribal member was pleased about the Guard's arrival. Their legislative body unanimously passed a law this summer to permit the Guard, but the legislation contains restrictions governing how and where the soldiers can operate.

In addition to the soldiers, about 800 American border guards swarm over traditional Native American lands.

"By militarizing the border, the federal government is violating the sovereignty of the Tohono O'odham nation in the name of homeland security," James Riding In, associate professor of American Indian studies at Arizona State University, told Indian Today in July.

Officials also worry that some tribal members benefit from the illegal migration.

"People need to acknowledge that some of us make money from the smuggling that goes on here," said David Garcia, 54, a former member of one of the tribe's 11 district legislative councils in Itak.

The soldiers say they try to tread softly while carrying their M-16s.

They walk as gingerly around the spindly ocotillo plants as they do around the flutter of pink flags that tribal members use to mark their sacred sites. A Native American ecologist warned them to enter sensitively and leave their rocky observation posts as they found them.

A seemingly random pile of rocks, according to tribal archeologists, might in fact be a burial marker or the crumbling wall of an ancestral ruin.

"It's definitely been a learning experience," Perez said. "There have been a number of cultural challenges. It's not where we normally go. Once again, they own this land, they govern this land. ... They have been really wonderful."

Because the tribe's traditional boundaries stretch across the U.S.-Mexico border, armed Border Patrol agents are empowered to stop residents and request that they produce papers proving their citizenship.

"It's a unique challenge for the Border Patrol," said Gustavo Soto, a spokesman for the Border Patrol's Tucson sector.

Critics inside the Nation sometimes complain that agents rotate in and out so often they don't get to know who are the legitimate tribal members. They also point to the accidental road death of a young O'odham man who was struck and killed by a border agent's vehicle in 2002.

How well the Maryland guardsmen perform could help determine how long tribal leaders support the president's strategy. For now, it's seen as a successful but uneasy alliance.

DOJ_NMG_0064725

'We live in fear' "We live in fear," Tohono O'Odham Nation Chairwoman Vivian Juan Saunders says. "It's why tribal members have taken a position that they would not have 10 or 15 years ago. We're continuing to improve our communication. The Guard has many troops coming and going. We're trying to keep track of them."

So does Perez.

In 24-hour shifts, his soldiers in four-man teams occupy seven hilltops with sweeping views of the desert plain: Little Egypt, Topawa, North and South Animos, Chi Chi, Cow Hill and No Hair.

Before heading into the desert, soldiers stop about 20 miles from their Tucson hotel at the local armory of the Arizona National Guard, where soldiers sit at long tables, check and clean their weapons and slide their rounds into M-16 magazines.

They also take night-vision goggles, thermal detectors and infrared flashlights to aid their search for immigrants who regularly travel under the cover of night.

Electronic sensors along the border alert agents to crossers, but hundreds a day escape capture.

From their rocky vantage points, Maryland's citizen soldiers sleep under the stars, swat away buzzing flies and try to stay cool under large blue tarps when the temperature tops 100 degrees. The Maryland Guardsmen largely expressed support for their assignment.

"I figured my family came up here the right way, why can't they?" said Pfc. Colin Dawkins, 19, of Silver Spring. His mother is Guyanese, and his father hails from Jamaica.

Sgt. Dan Atkinson, a 38-year-old landscape contractor from Millsboro who likes to stand on top of his Humvee and scan the horizon here for hours, however, said it was common and distressing to see illegal immigrants in his industry.

"They're poor people, and employers are taking advantage of them," he said "I think it should be a little easier for them to get into this country legally."

The deployed Maryland soldiers are largely drawn from the Annapolis-based 1st Squadron, 158th Cavalry of the 58th Infantry Brigade Combat Team. They also include members of an Olney-based infantry company just home from a year in Iraq.

"Compared to Iraq, I don't have to worry about IEDs," said Spc. Sergio Cruz, 33, of Gaithersburg, referring to improvised explosive devices. "We have to worry about drug smugglers."

New perspective The Peruvian carpenter said he understands the well-meaning Mexicans who yearn to cross the border for a better life.

But he and his friend, Spc. Doug Wildenberg, 34, of Towson, both believe any letdown in the security of the border would also encourage criminals to enter the country.

"You have to remember national security," said Cruz, who served in combat before he became an American citizen.

"It's given me a whole new perspective," Wildenberg said. "I mean, I think I appreciate more why people would want to come. But they need to come the right way."

Despite the challenges, the Border Patrol praises the Guard's effort, saying its soldiers have sent out a clear message to potential crossers to stay away.

So far this year, apprehensions are down about 9 percent in the Tucson sector, which includes the Tohono O'odham Nation.

"Personally, I feel that they are needed out there," Delgado of the Nation's police department says. "In the short time that they have been out there, I think we've seen a decrease in the UDAs out there and the amount of time the Nation police department is spending dealing with illegal immigration."

As Perez describes it: "We've gotten into a groove."

18 Wheels And Countless Dangers (DMN)

Trucking companies often put non-English speakers, felons, addicts in driver's seat, but rarely take blame in fatal crashes

DOJ_NMG_0064726

SMILEY N. POOL/DMN Traffic moves along State Highway 114 near Paradise. On this stretch of road, Kim Hughes, Shiloh Hughes, Afton Hughes Royse and Joyce Watkins were killed in an accident involving a gravel truck in December of 2002.

First of three parts

On a sunny December afternoon, Kim Hughes turned onto State Highway 114 in Wise County and headed west toward home in Paradise. Christmas was eight days away. Four generations were crammed into her GMC Yukon after a morning of holiday shopping.

In the cab of an 18-wheeler leased to TXI Transportation Co., Ricardo Rodriguez drove east on Highway 114, riding herd on 73,000 pounds of truck and a trailerload of sand. An illegal immigrant from Mexico, Mr. Rodriguez had used a fake Social Security number to get a Texas commercial driver's license six years earlier. He had found steady work around North Texas driving rock trucks and other 18-wheelers, his history of immigration arrests and truck safety violations ignored or overlooked.

Just east of Paradise, on a flat stretch of road, the mom and the trucker met.

Mr. Rodriguez crossed the center line of the two-lane road and barreled head-on toward Ms. Hughes at 60 to 65 mph, a civil jury later concluded. With trees and a creek bed blocking her escape to the right, Ms. Hughes turned left, into the oncoming eastbound lane.

Just then, Mr. Rodriguez turned back toward his lane. Too late, Ms. Hughes swerved right. The Yukon struck the big rig on the driver's side, scraped along the trailer and spun off the back. A Ford pickup behind the truck smashed into the Yukon, injuring the pickup's occupants and nearly tearing apart the SUV.

Ms. Hughes' 14-year-old son, Shiloh, and 70-year-old mother, Joyce Watkins, died almost instantly. Ms. Hughes, 38, and her 17-year-old daughter, Afton Hughes Royse, pregnant with twins, died later in a Fort Worth hospital, without regaining consciousness.

502 people died in big-truck accidents in 2005.

•9,807 were injured last year.

•632 state troopers enforce truck safety on nearly 302,000 miles of roadway.

Amid the Christmas presents and holiday treats, the only sounds of life from the shattered SUV were the screams of Afton's 14-month- old son, Jagr Royse, and the frantic shouts of a female voice on Shiloh's cellphone.

Mr. Rodriguez climbed from his truck, uninjured.

Trucking companies in Texas often gamble on drivers such as Mr. Rodriguez, a seven-month Dallas Morning News investigation has found. They hire illegal immigrants who struggle to read road signs and communicate in English with police and emergency personnel. They hire felons, drunks and drug addicts. Sometimes, they make only cursory checks of work history and driving records, then put the new hires behind the wheel of rigs with the destructive potential of guided missiles.

When accidents occur, trucking companies defend their drivers and often blame the other vehicles – and in many cases the dead occupants – regardless of the evidence. They typically fight any release of information about their drivers and vehicles, and wage protracted legal battles to avoid blame.

Beyond that, the companies suffer few consequences, in part because the soaring number of trucks on Texas highways are overwhelming regulators and law enforcement officers. Mr. Rodriguez was never ticketed by the Texas Department of Public Safety or charged with a crime. Federal immigration authorities didn't deport him. State officials didn't suspend his license.

DPS never took action against TXI for its role in putting Mr. Rodriguez on the road that day and continuing to employ him, even after he admitted under oath that he entered the U.S. illegally, exaggerated his truck-driving experience on his job application and had a fake Social Security number. Mr. Rodriguez continued driving for TXI for at least another six months after he made those disclosures in front of a company lawyer.

DPS did not even subject TXI to a compliance review – a procedure by which trucking companies can be fined or forced out of business for failing to comply with rules and one which regulators say promotes greater road safety.

Ultimately, Mr. Rodriguez and TXI, part of Dallas-based Texas Industries Inc., were held accountable by the recourse of last resort for many truck accident victims: a lawsuit.

On May 13, 2004, a Wise County civil jury unanimously found Mr. Rodriguez, TXI and the owner of the leased truck, Aurelio Melendez, negligent: Mr. Rodriguez for his operation of the rock truck, Mr. Melendez for entrusting the rig to him, and TXI for hiring the truck and its driver. The jury awarded $23.5 million in damages to the victims' families.

TXI, which under federal regulations is responsible for the damages against Mr. Rodriguez and Mr. Melendez, is appealing the verdict. It contends the dead driver, not the trucker, caused the accident.

"We had an experienced driver with a good driving record with good equipment," said Mark Stradley, a Dallas attorney who represents TXI in the Wise County lawsuit. He described the 46-year-old Mr. Rodriguez as a hard-working father of three.

Randy Hughes, who lost his ex-wife and children in the accident, feels betrayed by the trucking industry that once was his livelihood and by authorities responsible for enforcing trucking regulations.

"It feels like you've been let down, that people didn't do their job right or he wouldn't have been here and maybe my family would," he said. "I think every day, how many more is out there that's like this guy was? Whose family is he going to run over?"

Profits soar, safety drops

More than 5,200 people died in accidents involving large trucks in the U.S. last year – 502 in Texas. The state consistently leads the nation in fatalities, in part because it has more roadway miles and the second-highest number of registered trucks.

The state's fatality rate, measured in truck crash deaths per 100,000 people, was 24th nationwide. California, the only state whose volume of truck traffic exceeds Texas, ranked No. 38. Another 10,000 people, on average, are injured in Texas each year in crashes involving big trucks.

Responsibility for these accidents is hotly contested; DPS investigators typically don't assess blame. Even the department's database refers only to "contributing factors" not "cause."

The most comprehensive national study, released in March by the U.S. Department of Transportation, found that truck drivers were at fault in at least 44 percent of all accidents between cars and big trucks. The American Trucking Associations, which represents the industry's biggest companies, says trucks cause only about 25 percent of fatal accidents involving cars.

When trucking companies are to blame, records show, it's because truckers drive too fast, don't pay attention, work too many hours or take to the road in poorly maintained equipment – sometimes with the knowledge and encouragement of their employers.

Many Texas trucking companies and their drivers also flout safety laws with little fear of punishment. Only about 1,000 of the state's more than 64,000 registered trucking companies faced compliance reviews last year. And only about 37 percent of the trucks inspected in Texas last year underwent the most thorough inspection, known as a Level 1. The majority of those were done on Mexican trucks that travel only a few miles north of the border before returning home.

Nationwide, the rates of fatal crashes and fatalities have declined about 24 percent in the last decade, in part because of rising seat-belt usage and safety innovations, such as airbags and anti-lock brakes. But the number of deaths in large-truck accidents is about the same as it was in 1994 because more trucks are on the road, driving more miles than ever.

"If you have enough trucks on the road, I don't care how confident your safety director is and how closely you adhere to the guidelines, you're going to have accidents," said Tom Fee, a Dallas lawyer who defends trucking companies. "It's unfair to paint with a broad brush that this is a dirty industry that is cutting corners just to put money in their pocket. But there are bad apples, fly-by-night operators that spoil the whole apple cart."

In Texas, the number of intrastate carriers increased 43 percent in the past five years, with a similar increase in the number of interstate carriers based here. The number of registered large trucks in the U.S. increased 24 percent from 1994 to 2004.

Business is so good, in fact, that U.S. trucking companies reported a record year in 2005: They generated $623 billion in revenue while hauling nearly 70 percent of the nation's freight.

Trucking boom costly

The Dallas-Fort Worth area is both an important hub for the nation's trucking companies and a crossroads in the movement of goods. On the streets and highways of Dallas and surrounding counties, long-haul, interstate trucks moving food, appliances and other commodities vie for space with short-haul, intrastate trucks carrying rock, sand and gravel to area construction sites.

The trucking industry's growth has overwhelmed law enforcement agencies. The problem is especially acute in Texas, where U.S.-based trucks pick up loads at the Mexican border and fan out across the country. U.S.-Mexico trade has more than doubled since the North American Free Trade Agreement was implemented in 1994, according to federal data. About 68 percent of truck traffic from Mexico enters the U.S. at the Texas border.

In the late 1990s, DPS asked the state Legislature for additional enforcement officers to keep weigh stations open and conduct roadside inspections. The Legislature cut in half one department request. Two years later, it slashed DPS' request for 127 more troopers to five.

Since then, DPS has had to rely on federal money for additional truck inspectors, almost all of whom have been assigned to the border. That has left staffing throughout the rest of Texas stagnant, at slightly more than 300 inspectors.

"The whole attitude is the industry will regulate itself," said Alan Powers, a Decatur attorney who represented victims in the TXI accident.

Maj. Mark Rogers of the DPS Commercial Vehicle Enforcement service in Austin said his force had no permanent presence in 128 of the state's 254 counties.

He also said some trucking companies openly taunt the state's overwhelmed commercial vehicle officers.

Trooper Randy McDonald, based in Decatur, northwest of Fort Worth, said that when he recently ticketed a big-rig driver for a local oil company, the trucker passed on a message from his boss: The troopers could write all the tickets they wanted, but it wouldn't change anything. The company was willing to break truck weight limits and other safety rules to maximize profits.

"I've been here a long time," said Maj. Rogers, "and they've been saying that same thing for a long time."

Pressures of low pay

One of the chief legacies of the federal government's deregulation of shipping rates in the early 1980s, which made it possible for virtually anyone with a truck to go into business, is that trucking has become fiercely competitive. The vast majority of trucking companies operate along the margins of profitability, and about 40,000 go out of business every year, said Jerry Donaldson, senior research director for the nonprofit Advocates for Highway and Auto Safety.

Corporate America has leveraged this competition to push shipping rates even lower. It has also put more pressure on trucking companies to deliver loads at a specific time, as part of "just-in-time" inventory management that lets companies keep fewer products and spare parts on hand and use trucks as rolling warehouses. Late drivers can lose a load, money, even a customer.

In response, trucking companies push their truckers hard.

"The managers, the owners of trucking companies unquestionably put the dollar above the safety of the traveling public," said Frank Branson, a Dallas plaintiff's attorney who has handled hundreds of truck accident cases. "They treat mutilations and deaths as the cost of doing business."

Trucking companies say a shortage of drivers, not safety shortcuts, is the biggest problem facing their industry. Long-haul trucking companies need 20,000 additional drivers, and that could exceed 100,000 drivers over the next eight years, according to a 2005 study commissioned by the American Trucking Associations.

Industry experts and independent truckers say the problem is a lack of drivers willing to work for such low pay in a business notorious for long hours, extended time away from home, delivery deadlines that don't accommodate bad weather or traffic and unpaid downtime waiting for loads.

Some of the biggest carriers have tried to stem the declining pool of experienced drivers by increasing wages and benefits. They pay drivers by the hour rather than by the load or mile, a practice safety experts say encourages drivers to speed and drive fatigued.

Drivers for J.B. Hunt Transport Inc. had fewer accidents after the Arkansas- based company increased driver pay in 1997, University of Michigan researchers found. A 1 percent increase in pay rate resulted in a 1.33 percent decrease in crash risk, said Daniel Rodriguez, one of the study's authors who is now a professor at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Lax vetting of drivers

Regardless of pay, companies are supposed to hire safe drivers and make sure they follow the rules.

Federal regulations require prospective drivers to disclose in writing such information as the previous three years' employers, motor vehicle accidents and traffic tickets, and the reason for leaving a job. The company is supposed to verify that information and check a driver's motor vehicle and safety performance records for the previous three years. Although the law doesn't require companies to do criminal background checks, it does ban truckers convicted of certain crimes from driving for a period of time.

Every driver a company hires is supposed to read and speak English well enough to converse with the general public, understand highway traffic signs and signals, respond to official inquiries and make entries on reports and records.

Texas doesn't require intrastate truck drivers to speak English and doesn't enforce the English- language requirement on interstate drivers unless "it becomes a true safety issue," said Maj. Rogers. He said the law was never intended to be enforced in roadside inspections, rather by the companies themselves.

The employer's responsibilities also apply to leased trucks and drivers, which companies often use to lower overhead costs.

But some companies do nothing more than make a phone call or send a fax to one of the former employers listed, court documents reviewed by The News show. If the former employer doesn't respond, the company is supposed to make a note of that in the driver investigation file and report the failure to the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration, but that often doesn't happen.

Clay Miller, a Dallas lawyer who has sued trucking companies in dozens of wrongful death and injury cases, said inadequate vetting of drivers "is a huge issue," especially with smaller companies. Larger companies often subscribe to a service that does a cursory background check on a driver, he said, allowing companies to say they've fulfilled their legal obligations.

Trucking's day laborers

Driver vetting is especially lax in the sand and gravel hauling business, an industry crucial to North Texas' booming construction sector. Dallas County leads the state in the number of active gravel pits and rock quarries, with 40. Nationally, Texas ranks second to California in construction sand and gravel sold or used.

Many sand and gravel haulers are the trucking industry's equivalent of undocumented day laborers. Paid by the load, they are frequently hired by homebuilders and construction contractors, even though they often lack proper insurance or registration.

"You can sit outside any rock quarry in Texas and find them," said Bill Webb, former president of the Texas Motor Transportation Association, the state's largest trucking industry group.

Questions about a trucker's training and experience surfaced soon after Wise County resident Pamela Nielsen sued Aggregate Haulers Inc. in 2002, two years after being seriously injured when one of the company's 18-wheel rock trucks forced her off the road on Highway 114 between Boyd and Paradise.

The truck driver, Esteban Hernandez, was ticketed for an improper lane change at the accident scene. He testified in a deposition that he had driven a bus for the El Conejo line in Texas before buying a big truck and signing an exclusive lease agreement with Aggregate Haulers to transport sand and gravel.

The San Antonio-based company hired Mr. Hernandez in violation of its own guidelines that required drivers to have a minimum of two years of verifiable experience, Ms. Nielsen's attorneys argued in court filings. Mr. Hernandez testified he had only 10 months of experience driving a rock hauler in the U.S.

Aggregate also didn't verify his previous three years' experience, as required by federal law, but played down the importance of that requirement.

"We don't get responses very often, in fact, and we put people to work every day that we get absolutely no response from previous employers," testified Jay Griffin, Aggregate's director of safety. "The fact of the matter is we still put them to work. We still feel confident that we're putting a safe driver on the road."

The company contended that Ms. Nielsen caused the accident by suddenly passing its truck in the right lane. But in October 2003, it agreed to pay the woman an undisclosed amount and to set up $100,000 trust funds for each of her two daughters. The company did not admit liability.

JTM Materials of Denton broke no laws in employing Jerry Lee Largent as a rock hauler under a lease agreement with Hammer Trucking Co., but was apparently unaware of his criminal record and traffic violations, court records show.

In his job application for JTM, Mr. Largent noted his 15 years of experience driving rock trucks for small Wise County companies. He disclosed that he had been involved in a fatal accident in November 1993, had received a speeding ticket in June 1996 and temporarily lost driving privileges for not having insurance on his personal vehicle. He checked "no" beside the question: Have you ever been convicted of a crime?

JTM used a private service to obtain a driver's record report that stated Mr. Largent's driving record contained "no reported convictions or accidents" in the three years preceding Sept. 12, 1996.

The trucking company didn't obtain a DPS report on Mr. Largent's driving record or run a criminal background check on him, according to court documents. If it had, JTM would have learned that Mr. Largent had been arrested for burglary in the early 1970s, convicted of driving while intoxicated in 1980 and convicted of methamphetamine possession in 1984 and sentenced to three months in jail. He was charged with driving while intoxicated in February 1994 but pleaded guilty to reckless conduct, received deferred adjudication and was sentenced to community service. He also had been ticketed five times between 1982 and 1990 for driving without liability insurance, a DPS report showed.

Mr. Largent was hired in September 1996 to haul crushed rock from a JTM quarry in Wise County to Dallas-area construction sites. Late one Saturday evening two months later, Mr. Largent's 18-wheeler collided with a car driven by Grant Morris on a Bridgeport street. Mr. Morris was seriously injured; Mr. Largent pleaded guilty to driving while drunk. After a protracted legal battle, Mr. Morris received a $1.9 million settlement.

Cutting corners

An attempt to require quarries and concrete plants to check the insurance and state registrations of trucks picking up loads failed last year when sand and gravel producers used their political clout in Austin to defeat legislation proposed by the Texas Motor Transportation Association.

Leading the effort to kill the legislation were the Texas Aggregates and Concrete Association and the Associated General Contractors, said Mr. Webb.

"When we start talking to them about policing the unregistered trucks, they say they can't do it – it would drive up their costs," he said.

Jennifer Newton, a spokeswoman for the Associated General Contractors in Austin, said she was unfamiliar with the legislation cited by Mr. Webb and would have no comment on it.

Michael Stewart, executive director of the Texas Aggregates and Concrete Association in Austin, said operators of quarries and concrete plants already check the insurance and registration of haulers to protect themselves from liability. "If they don't they're foolish, and they're playing Russian roulette with the system," he said.

Maintaining big trucks also drives up costs, so some companies try to run the rigs as long as possible between overhauls. They seek maximum mileage from tires. They ignore worn brake pads or maladjusted air brakes. They overlook or miss loose lug nuts and cracked trailer frames, as seen in recent spot truck inspections in Wise County.

State and federal inspectors ordered off the road about one-third of the trucks they stopped in each of three recent crackdowns. Some drivers said they had reported the maintenance problems to their employers but were told to keep driving.

With an 80,000-pound rig, the consequences of ignoring a problem are sometimes deadly.

In March 2002, Nelta Osborn was driving her rig for Celadon Trucking Service Inc. west along Interstate 30 in southwest Arkansas when another trucker radioed that a hose on her trailer was dragging the ground. Ms. Osborn pulled over and found a tiny hole had been worn in one of her air brake hoses. Her co-driver, husband Tom Osborn, stuck a toothpick in the hole and wrapped it with electrical tape, according to court records.

Back on the road, Mr. Osborn described the fix to a Celadon dispatcher. The dispatcher advised the trucker to get the hose fixed at a garage but remarked on his ingenuity: "Were you a Boy Scout?"

As they roared southwest along I-30 into Texas, the Osborns passed truck garages where they could have had the brake hose repaired or replaced, but they drove on. Just west of Texarkana, the hose failed, and the air brakes locked. The 18-wheeler screeched to a stop in the interstate's passing lane. Matthew Giuliano, a 23-year-old newly commissioned Army second lieutenant driving to Fort Hood for his first assignment, slammed into the back of the truck and was killed.

"If you look behind the curtain, you tend to see an industry that is paying truck drivers less because of the fierce competition," said Fort Worth attorney Steve Laird, who represented the Giuliano family in a lawsuit against Celadon. "And when truck drivers are not paid as well as they once were, they feel that there is an incentive to not only push the envelope but to sometimes break the rules."

In April 2005, a Waco jury found Indiana-based Celadon at fault and awarded the Giuliano family $17.5 million. Celadon settled the case by agreeing to pay the family $1.25 million, with no admission of liability. After the jury trial, Celadon chairman and chief executive officer Steve Russell extended condolences to the family and defended his company's business practices.

"This tragic situation was an isolated incident and is not reflective of the way our company does business," he said in a statement. "The owner-operator team involved was immediately suspended after the accident and never drove for the company again."

A history of problems

In the December 2002 accident that killed four members of the Hughes family, investigators determined the TXI-leased truck was properly maintained. Driver log records showed that Mr. Rodriguez was under the state daily driving limit of 12 hours at the time. His driving record wasn't even particularly alarming by rock hauler standards: He overturned an 18-wheeler leased to TXI and got three speeding tickets in the late 1990s.

The case against TXI came down to whether the company had fulfilled its legal obligations to check the driver's qualifications and prior work history. Regulations didn't require TXI to road-test Mr. Rodriguez.

There were several problems with the application Mr. Rodriguez filled out for TXI. For starters, he didn't say why he had left three trucking jobs in three years, as federal regulations required. There were also questions about his experience.

Mr. Rodriguez later testified he had 20 years of experience in trucking and had driven for "many, many companies" in Mexico over several years. But he could identify only one by name.

On his TXI application, Mr. Rodriguez listed a series of truck-driving jobs in the U.S. dating to 1994. However, he told U.S. immigration officers on two occasions that he didn't enter the U.S. until 1996. He testified in his civil trial deposition that he had worked in the U.S. in the 1980s and returned in 1996. But state records showed he didn't obtain a Texas commercial driver's license until October 1996.

TXI's transportation manager, Jonathan Kennemer, testified that he believed the company had tried, but failed, to confirm Mr. Rodriguez's claim to have worked for a Coronado Trucking in Dallas from 1994 to 1996. "If I remember correctly, they were out of business," said Mr. Kennemer, who recently left the company.

Mr. Rodriguez also stated that he had driven for a company called Data Documents from February 1996 to January 1997. It turned out he had worked at the company, but not as a truck driver. And he had claimed to have driven a truck for Aggregate Haulers from December 1999 until May 2001; Aggregate later informed TXI that Mr. Rodriguez had driven for the company for only three months, according to court records.

Mr. Rodriguez also stated on his job application that he left a job with Aggregate Haulers for a better paying job, when actually he had been deported by U.S. immigration authorities.

Mr. Kennemer would later describe Mr. Rodriguez's job application as "incomplete," but said it didn't raise concerns.

The trucker testified that he used the fake Social Security number to take his commercial driver's license test in Texas in 1996. Under state law, he was allowed to take the test in Spanish. Even in his native tongue, Mr. Rodriguez failed the general knowledge and air brake tests on his first try, according to DPS records.

His shaky knowledge of trucks and spotty English didn't hurt his ability to find work driving 18-wheelers in the Dallas area. After six years of driving, interrupted only by two arrests by U.S. immigration authorities as he went back and forth to Mexico, Mr. Rodriguez went to work driving trucks for a Dallas man named Aurelio Melendez in 2002.

Mr. Melendez owned nine trucks at the time, all leased to TXI. He testified that he road-tested Mr. Rodriguez but didn't make any record of it, as federal rules require. He also testified that he wasn't familiar with the Texas Motor Carrier Safety Regulations, which govern trucking companies.

Mr. Rodriguez was hauling his last load of the day to a construction site in Richardson when he collided with the Hughes family. He told the lead DPS investigator that the SUV was in his lane and that he tried to avoid it by steering to the right. Mr. Rodriguez was the only eyewitness. The trooper working the case had never been lead investigator on a fatal accident, and she accepted Mr. Rodriguez's version of events as fact. The trooper found Ms. Hughes at fault, and no charges were filed.

TXI stands by its driver

Attorneys for TXI and the plaintiffs continue to contest most of the key facts as to what happened, and an appeal is pending.

TXI blames Ms. Hughes, suggesting that she crossed the center line either because she was eating, talking on a cellphone or had a tire blow out.

The judge hearing the civil case, however, rejected the company's request to introduce phone records showing that Ms. Hughes' ex-husband had called her around the time of the accident. The court ruled there was no evidence that a phone call might have caused the accident.

Attorneys for the family said Ms. Hughes' son, Shiloh, was the only person in the Yukon on a cellphone at the time of the accident. When a motorist approached the Yukon to render assistance, she heard Shiloh's friend screaming through the open line.

Another crucial point of dispute is who crossed the center line first. At the accident scene, and in a later deposition, Mr. Rodriguez said it was Ms. Hughes. He said he steered to the right "for two or three seconds" in an attempt to avoid the Yukon. The DPS investigator and experts for the plaintiffs and TXI all agreed that a gouge mark 6 inches inside Mr. Rodriguez's lane was a point of impact. But they disagreed over whether it was the initial point of impact.

Plaintiffs' attorneys argued that if Mr. Rodriguez had steered to the right for two or three seconds, or even one second, and if initial impact was just 6 inches inside his lane, he must have started his turn on the wrong side of the center line.

Mr. Rodriguez changed his statement when he took the witness stand, now saying he had turned to the right for only one second. Under questioning from plaintiffs' attorneys, Mr. Rodriguez testified that he never crossed the center line while driving, on this or any other day.

Mr. Rodriguez continued driving for TXI after the accident, using his fraudulently obtained commercial driver's license. DPS and U.S. immigration didn't file charges against him, and the state didn't revoke his license.

In July 2003, as part of a broader security check following the 9/11 terrorist attacks, DPS notified Mr. Rodriguez by form letter that the Social Security Administration had noticed a discrepancy in the number he used to obtain his commercial driver's license and asked him to report to his local driver's license office to verify his information or risk losing his license.

Mr. Rodriguez didn't respond, DPS spokeswoman Tela Mange said.

In July 2005, Mr. Rodriguez went to a Dallas-area DPS office to renew his commercial driver's license. But he could not verify his Social Security number and was denied. He was allowed to renew his regular driver's license, which according to DPS is valid until May 2, 2011. The News tried to find Mr. Rodriguez at four Dallas addresses listed for him in public records but was unsuccessful.

TXI's attorney said Mr. Rodriguez stopped driving for TXI in late May or early June 2004 after the company was convinced he was in the U.S. illegally.

"I think everybody would have assumed that he would be deported," said Michael Simpson, the attorney who represented the victims' families. "But he kept driving, just like nothing occurred."

Partisan Battle Trips Up Popular Tax Benefits (LAT)

By Joel Havemann, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Both parties want to extend a package of credits and deductions. But lawmakers are deadlocked over the bill it's attached to.

WASHINGTON — Just about every lawmaker in Congress favors extending a batch of popular tax benefits approved during President Bush's first years in office and authorized through 2005.

But in a case study of the tortuous process that can surround even the most highly regarded proposal on Capitol Hill, extension of the tax benefits appears to face an uphill road as Congress nears adjournment.

The benefits, claimed by more than 10 million taxpayers last year, give those who live in states without income taxes a deduction for their state sales taxes. They allow a deduction for some college tuition. Teachers may deduct the costs of buying supplies for their classrooms. And a research and development tax credit — hugely popular in the business community — is also part of the package.

But so far, these and 43 other tax benefits have become ensnared in a partisan battle over a minimum-wage increase, which Democrats and some moderate Republicans want, and a sharp reduction in the estate tax, dear to the hearts of conservative Republicans.

In July, Republicans thought they had scored a strategic coup when they stitched the minimum-wage increase and the estate tax cuts into a single bill that, they hoped, offered something for everybody to love. The trouble was, there was also something for almost everybody to hate.

So to sweeten the pie — and appeal to lawmakers of both parties — Republicans added an extension of the expiring tax breaks.

The maneuver was to no avail; the bill containing these disparate elements was derailed. And two months later, the tax benefits are still hanging as wrangling over the other issues continues.

Some lawmakers, including at least one powerful Republican, are pushing for Congress to break the deadlock.

"Taxpayers could miss out on valuable benefits through no fault of theirs," Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the tax-writing Finance Committee, said last week. "I urge the House and Senate leadership, both Republican and Democrat, to take this problem seriously."

Grassley warned that time is of the essence, saying that Internal Revenue Service officials have told him Congress must approve the benefits extensions by Oct. 15 if the changes are to be included in 2006 tax forms. That means Congress, which plans to adjourn at the end of this month to campaign for the November elections, has only two weeks to act.

Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, the top Democrat on Grassley's committee, recently accused other lawmakers of "ineptitude" for not having acted sooner on the tax benefits.

Baucus also decried the continuing GOP reluctance to allow a separate vote on the extension effort, noting that Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) was quoted in the Wall Street Journal characterizing the tax benefits as "hostage" to the estate tax dispute.

Baucus responded: "It is time we end these threats and get back to the business of legislating."

But when Baucus tried to bring to a vote a bill focused only on the extension of the tax benefits, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) blocked him.

Frist said he wanted to preserve the option of a second chance for the full Senate to vote on the estate tax cut, the minimum-wage increase and extension of the tax benefits as a package.

The most expensive benefit is the tax credit businesses can claim for research and development conducted in the United States. A two-year extension would cost $16.5 billion.

The most widely used benefit — claimed on more than 8 million tax forms last year — is the deduction for state sales tax payments in places with no state income taxes. The cost of extending this provision for two years: $5.5 billion.

Nearly 2.7 million teachers who paid for classroom supplies out of their own pockets took a maximum deduction of $250 last year. Extending this provision would cost less than $400 million in 2006 and 2007.

Altogether, extending the miscellaneous tax benefits, most of them for two years, would cost $38 billion.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Your Money: Pentagon Travel System Under Attack (ABC)

By John Cochran

ABC News, September 17, 2006

Critics Say It's Actually Cheaper to Book Travel Outside the Program

Sept. 16, 2006 — - The Defense Department is the world's biggest purchaser of airline tickets -- so the Pentagon bought its own online booking system called the "defense travel system," which was supposed to save money on travel agents and paperwork.

The defense travel system was also supposed to buy only the cheapest seats. But many in Congress say the system is a disaster -- four years behind schedule and $200 million over budget.

"It will take 200 years to ever pay back the cost of this contract in terms of that savings," Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., told ABC News, "especially when you consider they're not getting the best price."

Four years ago, the Pentagon's inspector general recommended killing the defense travel system altogether, but it survived. Investigators say 70 percent of Pentagon travelers refuse to use DTS because of faulty software or because they believe they can get a better price elsewhere.

"In many cases," said Tom Schatz of the private group Citizens Against Government Waste, "they're simply finding it easier to pick up the phone and call the travel agent and say, 'I'd like to go from here to there. Can you do this for me?' "

In fact, critics say the Pentagon could get cheaper air fares simply by using discount online travel sites that many bargain-hunters use -- such as Travelocity or Expedia.

But Northrup Grumman, the company that devised the defense travel system for the Pentagon, said that's not true. Darryl Fraser of Northrup Grumman told ABC News the system will be up to speed sometime this fall.

"This is a program that the American taxpayer [and] the Department of Defense can be proud of," he said. "It is actually being deployed. It is being used, and it is going to save the Department of Defense money."

The company says part of the problem was that some Defense employees were reluctant to use DTS, and were more comfortable using the old travel system. That has changed, said the company, as more workers have gradually become more familiar with the new system and realized it is better.

Sen. Coburn is not buying that, and said it is time to kill a failed program.

"There are other systems out there," he said. "There's a better way to do it. We should not perpetuate this hoax on the American taxpayer."

Congress is deciding now whether to spend another $60 million toward the defense travel system, for a total cost of $474 million.

Inner Circle Taking More Of C.D.C. Bonuses (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

Top officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention received premium bonuses in recent years at the expense of scientists and others who perform much of the agency's scientific work, agency records show.

Those inside the office of the centers' director, Dr. Julie L. Gerberding, have benefited the most, the records show.

Using the Freedom of Information Act, The New York Times requested records of all cash awards of $2,500 or greater granted to current and former C.D.C. employees from 2000 to mid-2006. The most recent awards are dated July 21.

Dr. Gerberding, whose leadership of the agency is the subject of an inquiry by the Senate Finance Committee, was not immediately available for comment, said Tom Skinner, a spokesman for the centers.

From 2002 through mid-2006, William H. Gimson III, the agency's chief operating officer, received bonuses totaling $147,863, which included seven cash awards of more than $2,500. Mr. Gimson's bonuses were about twice the amount granted to any other C.D.C. employee, the agency's records show.

Mr. Skinner said Mr. Gimson was not immediately available for comment.

Mr. Gimson's deputy, Barbara W. Harris, received six premium bonuses of $2,500 or more from 2002 through mid-2006 for a total of $84,894, agency records show.

Mr. Skinner said Ms. Harris was also not available for comment.

Mr. Gimson and Ms. Harris are part of the federal government's Senior Executive Service, a cadre of top civil servants whose salaries are generally among the highest in government. The salaries of Mr. Gimson and Ms. Harris were not included in the records requested by The Times.

The increase in bonuses to these officials was part of a decision by the Bush administration to make transformation of the management of the centers a top priority, said Glen Nowak, chief of media relations at the centers. "If we want to retain people, we need to recognize them," Mr. Nowak said Friday in an interview. "We are operating in a highly competitive environment."

Before Dr. Gerberding's appointment, members of the C.D.C. director's inner circle rarely received premium bonuses of $2,500 or more. After her arrival, in July 2002, such cash awards increased, the records obtained by The Times show.

In 2000, officials in the office of the director, Dr. Jeffrey P. Koplan, received bonuses totaling $30,000, which included eight premium bonuses of $2,500 or more. The bonuses represented 0.4 percent of all bonuses granted within the centers that year.

In 2005, the records show that officials in Dr. Gerberding's office received 60 premium bonuses totaling $515,075, or about 4 percent of all bonuses granted within the centers.

Because bonus money is limited — about 1.5 percent of the total personnel budget, Mr. Skinner said — the growing share of premium bonuses for Dr. Gerberding's closest advisers has meant less money is available for some scientists and other workers.

In an e-mail message on Friday afternoon, Dr. Gerberding informed workers at the centers that information about the agency's bonus program might soon be made public.

"It is important to remember one thing, though: that those of you who have received a monetary award, or will in the future, received it for your superior performance and special acts, which merit these awards," Dr. Gerberding wrote.

The agency's Executive Leadership Board recently voted to create a committee to review the cash awards process and address "any shortcomings," she wrote.

In addition to those within Dr. Gerberding's inner circle, the increase in large cash awards within the centers has mostly benefited employees in the agency's financial, computer and human resources departments — not its scientists.

"You have the administration signaling that these are the areas that they want to see significant improvements on, and they want that to happen as quickly as possible," Mr. Nowak said.

The administration also made security a priority, Mr. Nowak said. He said that helped to explain $41,485 in premium bonuses given since 2002 to William T. Porter, the agency's head of security.

"I'm sure Bill Porter's peers in the corporate world are being paid at a higher level," Mr. Nowak said.

Members of the Public Health Service are not eligible to receive cash awards, Mr. Nowak said. That is part of the reason so few scientists appear among the top recipients of premium bonuses, he said.

Soon after arriving at the centers, Dr. Gerberding began a comprehensive reorganization of the agency. In its wake, many of the agency's senior scientists and leaders either left or have announced that they are planning to leave.

The Washington Post and The Atlanta Journal-Constitution have reported on the turmoil at the centers in articles quoting disgruntled former senior scientists who said the changes had undermined the agency.

Five of the six former directors who led the agency in the past 40 years recently wrote a letter to Dr. Gerberding expressing concerns over the exodus of crucial administrative and scientific leaders and scientists, The Journal-Constitution reported.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa and chairman of the Finance Committee, has announced that the committee is trying to determine whether upheaval at the agency has jeopardized its scientific mission.

In another e-mail message, on Sept. 11, Dr. Gerberding noted the departures of top agency leaders and acknowledged that change was difficult.

"I respect those who don't believe these changes are needed, and I respect even more all those who are actively and constructively engaged in helping us find the best way forward," Dr. Gerberding wrote.

Among the other recipients of large cash awards since 2002 were James D. Seligman, the agency's chief information officer, who received $62,455 in premium bonuses; John C. Tibbs, director of the agency's financial management office, who received $52,880; and Kimberly S. Lane, a senior adviser to the Coordinating Center for Infectious Diseases, who received $50,565.

None could immediately be reached for comment.

Report: Most CDC Bonuses Go To Managers (AP)

AP, September 17, 2006

The employees at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention who get bonuses most frequently are not scientists, but instead are accountants, budget analysts, computer experts and other administrative managers, according to a published report Sunday.

The data appear to reinforce the findings of an internal CDC survey last year that found one of the top concerns among the agency's employees was a "loss of public health focus/mission in exchange for inappropriate business focus."

The 72 CDC employees who received five or more awards of at least $2,500 from 2000 through July 21 work primarily in non-science jobs, according an analysis by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution of agency data obtained under the Freedom of Information Act.

Some of those employees got $30,000, $50,000 and, in one case, more than $140,000 in cumulative bonuses during the period, the paper reported.

The CDC has about 9,000 employees, and 4,200 of them are considered scientific staff.

CDC officials said the agency is examining its system of awarding employees.

"We want to make sure that the system we have in place is equitable and that it rewards everyone, if in fact they are eligible for the award and if in fact they're deserving of it," spokesman Tom Skinner said.

In an e-mail to CDC employees Friday, in anticipation of the Journal-Constitution's report, director Julie Gerberding stressed that the agency was reviewing the program, Skinner said.

"You all work hard every day and often accomplish seemingly impossible feats within incredible time constraints," she wrote. "Without question, people at CDC who do exceptional work should be recognized with awards, including monetary awards."

Gerberding was not available to comment Saturday, Skinner said.

Skinner and other CDC officials said several factors may explain the frequent large awards skewed in favor of financial staff and administrative managers instead of core scientific staff.

One could be that not all front-line managers may be aware of or regularly use the awards. Another is that all federal agencies are being pushed to improve budget systems, technology and the like. There hasn't been such a push on the scientific side, said Glen Nowak, another CDC spokesman.

Also, about 800 of the CDC's 4,200 scientific employees are members of the U.S. Public Health Service Commissioned Corps, a uniformed service that operates under a different personnel system and is not eligible for the awards, CDC officials said. And about 600 distinguished scientists are in another classification that did not become eligible for annual performance awards until last fall, they said.

Cash awards given to CDC and other federal employees fall under two general categories: special act cash awards, which reward for a specific accomplishment or activity; and annual performance bonuses, tied to a percentage of the person's salary.

Since 2000, the CDC distributed about 2,500 special act and performance awards worth at least $2,500 to about 1,450 employees, the Journal-Constitution reported. About 560 received two or more of these awards, and 72 received five or more.

Three employees — a financial systems branch chief, a deputy director of budget and management, and another budget official — received 10 awards each. Their cumulative awards totaled $35,000, $34,326 and $32,000 respectively.

Five employees — working in facilities operations, budget, accounting and technical information — received nine awards each. Their cumulative totals ranged from $25,326 to $50,565.

CDC officials did not release copies of the award nominations or justification forms for the most frequent recipients.

Democrats Rap GOP For Medicare Rate Hike (AP)

By Andrew Miga, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Democrats say failed Republican policies are behind rising Medicare premiums that are leaving millions of older Americans scrambling for basic health care.

Democrat Chris Murphy, a Connecticut state senator who is challenging 12-term Republican Rep. Nancy Johnson, criticized the GOP for failing to embrace the reforms needed to give seniors a break from increased health care costs.

"It's time for new leadership in Congress, to take on President Bush's bad plan and take the Medicare drug program in a new direction," Murphy said Saturday in his party's weekly radio address.

Murphy warned that unless Democrats can step in with new ideas, such as allowing the government to negotiate for lower Medicare prescription drug prices, health costs will continue rising for seniors.

"The Bush administration announced this week that Medicare premiums will be going up again, and could even carry a new, expensive monthly fee," Murphy said. "This new tax on seniors will affect millions of Americans, and thousands of people in Connecticut."

Most elderly and disabled people on Medicare will see their premiums rise to $93.50 a month next year, a 5.6 percent increase that is much lower than had been anticipated.

"Being healthy should be a right, not a privilege available only to those that can afford it," said Murphy. "Over the past decade, seniors in this country have been hit with more and more bad news. They face confusing rules, added fees and now higher premiums. What's worse, Republicans in Congress have done nothing to ease the burden on American seniors."

Johnson, a major player in Congress on Medicare and other health care issues, is among three GOP House incumbents in Connecticut whom national Democrats have targeted in hopes of gaining the 15 seats they need to control the House.

"My opponent, Nancy Johnson, deserves part of the blame," said Murphy. "She wrote the confusing Medicare law in 2003. She is also one of many Republicans who opposes allowing Medicare to negotiate for lower drug prices — a Democratic idea, and more importantly, a good idea."

The new Medicare prescription drug benefit is the biggest change since the health program's beginning. Under the program, elderly beneficiaries enroll in plans administered by private insurers. Seniors had dozens of plans to pick from, leaving many of them confused and frustrated when the program was launched.

Medicare Part B Fees Head For A Sliding Scale (LAT)

Kathy M. Kristof Personal Finance

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

All recipients will pay more next year to adjust for inflation, but those with higher incomes will face bigger increases.

High-income retirees may be in for an unpleasant surprise this winter.

It involves the monthly premiums that older Americans pay for Medicare Part B, which helps pay the cost of doctor visits, diagnostic tests and other routine care. The premiums, which are automatically deducted from Social Security checks, are currently $88 a month.

In January, everyone's premiums will go up to adjust for healthcare inflation, but higher-income recipients will see even larger hikes.

As a result, a single retiree with an annual income of $80,000 or less (and a married person earning less than $160,000), could pay $98 a month next year, according to estimates, while a single person earning $81,000 would pay $110 a month. And under the same scenario a single person earning $200,000 would pay $170 a month — or 73% more than lower-income Medicare recipients. (See chart for more details.)

Medicare will calculate your premium based on your income in your most recent tax return.

Congress approved tying premiums to income to raise money to offset some of the cost in 2003's Medicare Modernization Act, which ushered in prescription drug coverage for seniors.

The sliding scale phases in over three years. As a result, those in the highest-income group will find their premiums soaring to more than three times the fees paid by those in the lowest-income group.

Of the 40 million Medicare beneficiaries, about 2 million will be adversely affected by the sliding scale.

But they will officially receive that news only a few weeks before their Social Security checks are docked for the higher cost.

"We will be notifying participants later in the fall — late November or early December," said Mark Lassiter, a spokesman for the Social Security Administration.

And, experts warn, some of those paying more will not necessarily be wealthy.

One-time events, such as the sale of stock or rental property, can temporarily knock otherwise lower-income retirees into a high-paying group, said Paul N. Van de Water, vice president for health policy at the National Academy of Social Insurance in Washington.

So could converting a traditional individual retirement account to a Roth IRA, or taking a lump-sum distribution from a retirement account.

"This is really a big deal," said Jill Allagood, a certified financial planner at Tarbox Group in Newport Beach. "It's pretty easy to kick over the top of the threshold if you're not careful."

Consider Susan, a hypothetical retiree with $49,000 in taxable income who converted a $100,000 traditional IRA into a Roth last year. This one-time event boosted her 2005 taxable income to $149,000. So, instead of paying $98 a month in premiums next year, as she would have if her 2005 income had remained at $49,000, she will pay $130 a month, about 30% more. If she instead converted the IRA in 2007, she would pay $245 in 2009, almost doubling her cost.

The law does give retirees with "a major life-changing event" the option to dispute their premiums. But it's too soon to say how this dispute process will work or whether premium adjustments would be slow, swift, partial or full.

The government currently pays 75% of the cost of Medicare Part B, with recipients picking up the rest of the tab through their premiums. Under the new formula, higher-income recipients will pay 28% to 80% of the cost of their coverage under Part B.

The flat monthly premium of $88 this year reflected a 13% increase from 2005. If medical cost inflation remains at 13% a year, even beneficiaries in the lowest-income group will pay $98 a month in 2007 and $125 a month in 2009, Allagood calculated. But with the sliding scale, those who earn more will pay $175 to $400 a month in 2009.

AARP Begins Ad Blitz For Foreign Rx Drugs (MH)

The Miami Herald, September 17, 2006

The AARP is launching a $500,000 ad campaign today in 14 states pushing for Senate action on legislation that would let consumers buy U.S.-made prescription drugs from Canada and other countries.

David Certner, legislative policy director for the advocacy group, said the campaign focuses on the home states of senators who have shown some openness to letting people buy U.S.-made medicine shipped abroad.

"This is going on right now regardless of the law. People are going outside the country to buy their medicine," he said. ``We want to make sure the system is as safe as we can make it."

The bill that AARP supports, written by Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., has bipartisan support from 31 co-sponsors. It would allow consumers to buy U.S.-made prescription drugs from Canada and eventually from other countries such as Australia, Japan and nations within the European Union.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

SENATORS AGREE TO FEMA COMPROMISE

Senators have agreed on a compromise to restructure and expand the Federal Emergency Management Agency, restoring some of its responsibilities.

The FEMA director, currently David Paulison, would have direct access to the president in a crisis, but the agency would remain a part of the Homeland Security Department. The compromise will be included in a budget bill Congress is scheduled to vote on this month.

Republican Sen. Susan Collins of Maine, who heads the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, worked out the compromise late Friday with Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the committee's top Democrat.

The plan, which now goes to House-Senate negotiators, includes stricter requirements for who could serve as FEMA director.

GRANDMOTHER PLEAS FOR BABY'S RETURN

UNION -- A grandmother of a newborn girl stolen from a rural home pleaded Saturday for the baby's safe return, as authorities searched for an abductor who stabbed and seriously injured the infant's mother before fleeing with the child.

"The family's in agony," Raylene Ochsenbine said at a news conference. ``Just give her back."

The attacker walked into the home, told Abby Woods' mother, "I'm here to take your child," then slashed the young mother's throat and fled with the 1-week-old child.

Stephanie Ochsenbine, 21, was in stable condition Saturday following surgery. She told police she did not know her attacker.

GUARD TO REMAIN IN NEW ORLEANS

NEW ORLEANS -- National Guard troops and state police will patrol the city through December, Gov. Kathleen Blanco said Saturday at a summit of law enforcement officials and crime experts called to address a spate of killings marring the recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

Police are on pace to recover as many illegal firearms this year as they did in the two previous years -- even though half as many people live in the city now, said Robert Browning, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

But in a positive sign, court and prison repairs should be done next month, an official said, which means the city's crippled criminal justice system will be able to process its influx of suspects more efficiently.

ORGANIC GROWER UNDER SCRUTINY

SAN JUAN BAUTISTA -- Earthbound Farm, the country's largest grower of organic produce, is facing unwelcome scrutiny after federal officials linked a nationwide E. coli outbreak to its bagged spinach.

The company, also known by its legal name Natural Selection Foods LLC, recalled and stopped shipping all its spinach products after E. coli outbreaks killed one person and sickened more than 100 others in 19 states.

Earthbound officials were working with state and federal health inspectors to pinpoint the source of the contamination, spokeswoman Samantha Cabaluna said.

The Backdrop (WP)

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

The House is considering a bill, crafted by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), to give the District a representative with full voting rights. The bill would add two seats to the House, one for the District and one for the state next in line to expand its congressional delegation based on population -- currently Utah. A House subcommittee held a hearing on the matter on Thursday.

Congress Has The Authority To Do Right By D.C. (WP)

More than 40 years ago, the Supreme Court declared that "no right is more precious in a free country than that of having a voice in the election of those who make the laws under which, as good citizens, we must live." And yet, for more than 200 years the citizens of the District have been denied this right because they have no voting representation in Congress. To its credit, Congress is taking steps to begin correcting this longstanding injustice.

Specifically, the House Government Reform Committee has approved, and the House Judiciary Committee is considering, a bill that would give D.C. residents the right to full voting representation in the House. While conferring this right is surely the right thing to do, a legitimate question has been raised concerning Congress's authority to confer the right by simple legislation, rather than through constitutional amendment. We have carefully considered this question and believe for three reasons the bill is within Congress's authority: It is consistent with fundamental constitutional principles; it is consistent with the language of Congress's constitutional power; and it is consistent with the governing legal precedents.

First, interpretation of Congress's Article I legislative authority should always be guided by the fundamental principles upon which the nation and the Constitution were founded. Those principles include a commitment to a republican form of government and to the proposition that the laws enacted by the legislature should be based on the consent of the governed. There is nothing in our Constitution's history or its fundamental principles suggesting that the Framers intended to deny the precious right to vote to those who live in the capital of the great democracy they founded.

Second, Congress's specific power over the District of Columbia is one of the broadest of all its powers. In the words of the Constitution, "Congress shall have power . . . to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" over the District. In a 1984 case decided by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, on which we both sat, Judge Abner Mikva noted that through this constitutional provision, the Framers gave Congress "a unique and sovereign power" over the District. In that same case, Judge (now Justice) Antonin Scalia wrote that the broad language of the power gave Congress "extraordinary and plenary" power over our nation's capital. And in another case, that same court held that this broad power gave Congress authority to "provide for the general welfare of citizens within the District of Columbia by any and every act of legislation which it may deem conducive to that end." It is hard to imagine a broader, more comprehensive congressional power than this; and it is also hard to imagine that the power could not be used to advance a fundamental principle of our Constitution -- that the right to vote should be extended to all citizens.

Finally, and equally important, the most analogous legal precedent addressing Congress's authority over the District confirms that Congress can act now to give the vote to D.C. residents. That precedent concerned the fact that Article III of the Constitution confers on federal courts jurisdiction to hear suits brought by citizens of different states against each other. But the Constitution did not give any such express jurisdiction over suits brought by or against citizens of the District of Columbia. As a result, Congress, relying on its broad Article I power over the District of Columbia, remedied that unfairness through legislation that extended the right to District residents. In a 1949 case called National Mutual Insurance Co. v. Tidewater , the Supreme Court upheld that extension and also said that Congress was entitled to great deference in its determination that it had power to address this inequity. The logic of this case applies here, and supports Congress's determination to give the right to vote for a representative to citizens of the District of Columbia, even though the Constitution itself gives that right only to citizens of states.

It is not a surprise that our Constitution, ratified in 1789, contemplated that the right to vote would be enjoyed only by "the people of the several states." After all, in 1789, all U.S. citizens lived in a state. It was not until 1801, when the process Congress authorized by statute in 1791 to create the District out of lands ceded by Virginia and Maryland was completed, that District residents lost their federal voting rights. There is no reason to believe the Framers intended for this to happen. And in any case they gave Congress power to address the problem. Congress has initiated a process to do so, and we urge it to quickly complete the task. As George Washington said in his first inaugural address, the American people are entrusted with "the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty and the destiny of the republican model of government." It is time to extend that model to the citizens of the nation's capital.

Astronauts Allowed Extra Hour Of Sleep (AP)

By Seth Borenstein, Ap Science Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

With their hardest tasks behind them, space shuttle Atlantis' six astronauts got time to relax Saturday after almost a week of nonstop work adding a new 17 1/2-ton addition with wing-like solar power panels to the international space station.

NASA even let the crew sleep an extra hour before waking them with Jimmy Buffett's beach song "Twelve Volt Man."

"We said good morning to them, then a little housekeeping and then left them alone, gave them a chance to enjoy their time on orbit and wind down from what has been a very, very busy series of days on the flight," said flight director Paul Dye.

The astronauts were grateful and echoed Dye's description.

"We've been very, very busy so the chance to sleep in was very much appreciated," rookie astronaut Heide Stefanyshyn-Piper said during a news conference from space.

Saturday was the last full day at the space station for Atlantis' crew. Besides relaxing and enjoying the view from 220 miles above Earth, they still had to unload supplies for the space station, including 90 pounds of oxygen.

The Atlantis astronauts were to say their goodbyes to the space station's three crew members and undock early Sunday. Once undocked, the crew planned to fly around the space station to get the first complete view of the orbiting space lab in several years.

"We're leaving it in an entirely different configuration than it was when we arrived," said Atlantis pilot Chris Ferguson. "So it would be very good ... to get a good look at the overall configuration and condition of the station."

The Atlantis crew delivered to the space station a 17 1/2-ton addition and, during three spacewalks, hooked up the new segment and prepared it so the 240-foot solar energy arrays could be opened up. The solar arrays will provide a quarter of the space station's electricity when it is finished in 2010.

It was the first shuttle mission devoted to space station construction since December 2002. The Columbia accident in early 2003 halted all construction while NASA worked to fix problems with the shuttles' external fuel tanks.

Contrary to appearances, this past week's spacewalks were difficult, said astronaut Joe Tanner, who went on two of the mission's three spacewalks with Piper.

"I want to squash that bug right now," said Tanner when told by CBS News that he made the spacewalks look easy. "These (spacewalks) were not easy."

Also not easy was getting used to zero gravity for Atlantis' rookies, Ferguson and Piper, who said they kept banging into things.

"I feel really clumsy in space," Piper said. "Because you think ... you're going to make it from point A to point B, and you kind of go to point C, D, and E, getting to point B."

Even Tanner, 56, who had been on three previous space flights, said getting used to zero gravity again was more difficult than when he was younger.

However, despite their initial wobbliness in orbit, the crew earned high praise from the mission's flight director.

"I rate this crew 110 percent. They've done an outstanding job up to this point," Dye said. "We're not going to lose our focus until we get on the ground so we'll keep our game face on. But I suspect everything's going to keep going pretty darn well."

Losing It, 200 Miles Above The Earth (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

In space, junk can kill.

When two bolts slipped away from spacewalking astronauts last week, astronauts and controllers expressed concern that the small objects might have floated into the moving parts of the $372 million truss that had just been added to the station.

One astronaut, Joseph R. Tanner, sounding glum, described the trajectory of a lost bolt to mission control and fretted about its possible effects. “I just hope that bolt is on its way to Mother Earth right now and not hanging around” in the truss, he said.

Space junk is nothing new. During the first American spacewalk, in 1965, Edward White lost a glove — though not one that he was wearing, fortunately. It was a spare that floated out of his Gemini capsule. NASA also had astronauts toss away a solar array for the Hubble Space Telescope during a mission in 1993. (As it drifted off, one exclaimed, “It looks like a bird!”)

So when a bolt is lost in space, should anyone care? Once analysts determined that the bolts had floated away, they dismissed the incident as trivial. But NASA also recognizes that the thousands of pieces of debris in orbit are potential hazards.

The concerns tend to focus on the risk of collision with objects moving at high speed, however; the relative velocity of something that has simply drifted away is low. Still, NASA mission planners require tethers for tools and objects during spacewalks.

Despite those efforts, astronauts commonly lose small objects. During the last shuttle mission, Piers Sellers lost a spatula used to test repair techniques. “It was my favorite spatula,” he joked during the mission. John McCullough, the lead flight director for the station, said last week that on Russian spacewalks, “they throw things away all the time.”

They hit things away sometimes, too. A Russian astronaut is planning to drive a golf ball in a coming space walk, part of a marketing agreement with a golf club company.

Timely Transcripts At Last (WP)

The Supreme Court becomes a bit less bashful.

WHEN THE Supreme Court opens its term next month, it will finally begin making transcripts of its oral arguments available -- free, online and on the day of the arguments. That this represents a breakthrough shows how dramatically behind the times the justices are. But it is a breakthrough, nonetheless, that will dramatically improve the public's access to court proceedings.

Until now, the justices not only prohibited cameras and typically waited months to release audiotapes of arguments, they also waited weeks to release free transcripts. The public had to depend on the media to know in a timely fashion what happened. This was unfortunate, both because oral arguments are among the most majestic events in American democracy and because even excellent news stories often can't capture the full texture of arguments over complicated and nuanced points of law. For anyone interested in a particular case or the court as an institution, there is no substitute for knowing exactly what questions each justice asked and how counsel answered.

Timely transcripts are a half-measure. They imperfectly convey the atmospherics of an argument -- the tone a justice might strike, for example -- that sometimes indicate the court's direction more than dry words on paper. But given the implacable hostility some of the justices feel toward cameras, the move is a huge step forward.

Daydream Believers (NYT)

By Tim Weiner

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

A tremendous story is trapped inside this slim book: the triumph of technological fantasy at the Pentagon. The Defense Department controls the biggest and most inviting pool of public capital available to private contractors in the United States. Over the years, much of this 12-figure sum has gone down the drain in pursuit of wonder weapons. To take just one example, the Pentagon has so far spent roughly $100 billion on missile defense — which is serious money, levee-fixing money, cancer-curing money — but has produced only an insubstantial shield.

Almost no one says no to new weapons proposals nowadays — not Congress, not the Pentagon. As becomes clear from Sharon Weinberger's even-tempered "Imaginary Weapons," the planning process is beyond parody. The different branches of the armed forces conjure up dream weapons, setting technological requirements for them far beyond the state of science or the art of war. Once an idea is born, it goes through two stages of research and development: too soon to tell and too late to stop. Contractors cross their fingers while promising to fulfill the Pentagon's visions, whether or not those visions comply with the laws of physics. Occasionally the planned weapons are actually produced, though almost always at many multiples of their promised cost.

Weinberger, the editor of Defense Technology International, writes with enthusiasm and well-calibrated skepticism. She argues, irrefutably, that fringe science has reached ever greater heights in military circles. Since the United States has fewer and fewer real scientific experts in the government, fringe-science projects can receive the backing of the Pentagon without a semblance of peer review or the application of the scientific method.

"Imaginary Weapons" sets out to tell the story of one such project, the so-called hafnium bomb, a weapon that never existed and likely never will. Its progenitor, the book's protagonist, is Carl Collins, a physics professor from Texas who has been bumping around the lower echelons of military science for 35 years. Collins claimed in 1998 that he had used a dental X-ray machine to trigger the release of an enormous amount of energy from a trace of the isomer of hafnium-178. Isomers are atomic nuclei in an excited state. They hold tremendous potential energy. The trick is unlocking it.

If Collins was right, he was on the verge of a breakthrough in weaponry on the order of the invention of the catapult and the crossbow. A hafnium bomb the size of a hand grenade could have the force of a small tactical nuclear weapon. Better still, because the triggering was an electromagnetic phenomenon, not nuclear fission, a hafnium bomb might not be covered by nuclear treaties.

One small problem: the science properly belonged in The Journal of Irreproducible Results. As Weinberger writes, the breakthrough claimed by Collins could not be replicated. Nonetheless, the hafnium project received a $30 million budget — a pittance by Pentagon standards, but still a substantial amount — before it disappeared into justly deserved obscurity after five years of fruitless effort. In a nice piece of reporting, Weinberger quotes an expert's comparison of the military utility of the hafnium bomb to that of a jelly doughnut.

"Imaginary Weapons" wants to make the hafnium bomb a symbol of bad weapons science masquerading as good old American know-how at the Pentagon. It almost succeeds. Weinberger has talked to the right people and has done her homework on the hafnium bomb. And she valiantly translates the gobbledygook of Pentagon-speak and the jargon of physics into English, even if she has a tendency to leave a reader lost in minutiae and the repetition of minutiae. But a book about the Pentagon's scientific underworld requires a deeper analysis than a dissection of a single crackpot project.

The hafnium bomb was a very small example of a huge problem: the way the Pentagon wastes money on unworkable weapons. "Imaginary Weapons" leaps back and forth across years and decades, and performs loop-the-loops into projects like cold fusion and parapsychology (which are exemplars of bad science but have little or nothing to do with wonder weapons). Yet it never delivers a sense of the Pentagon itself, the institution that creates imaginary weapons. This is a little bit like writing "Moby-Dick" and leaving out the Pequod.

By focusing on one tiny target, Weinberger has missed the big picture. An array of military programs now under way is predicated on technological fantasy, the scientific equivalent of a wing and a prayer. A classic example is the Army's Future Combat Systems, with a cost well in excess of $100 billion. Weinberger could have asked why two generations of scientists and engineers have worshiped at the five-sided temple of the Pentagon, selling their genius for projects that have yielded very little of lasting value. That's a subject that will require a better book with a bigger bang.

Paulson Tells G-7 Not To Fret Over U.S. Housing Slump (BLOOM)

By Kevin Carmichael

Bloomberg, September 17, 2006

Sept. 16 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, making his debut at a meeting of Group of Seven economy chiefs, told his counterparts they needn't worry about a housing-led collapse of the world's largest economy.

``U.S. economic growth is settling into ranges more in line with our long-term potential," Paulson said in a statement after meeting G-7 finance ministers and central bank governors in Singapore today. ``The residential housing market is cooling from record unsustainable growth rates, but growth in the U.S. economy is being supported by other components."

Sales of U.S. existing homes have declined every month since G-7 officials last met in April, and the National Association of Realtors predicts house prices may decline in the remaining months of 2006, which would be the first year-over- year drops since 1993. The International Monetary Fund on Sept. 14 branded the slowing U.S. housing market a ``key risk" to global expansion.

U.S. economic growth slowed to an annual rate of 2.9 percent in the second quarter from 5.6 percent in the first three months of the year. Higher wages, ``strong" company profits and business spending will offset a weaker housing market, Paulson said. U.S. economic growth will average 3.4 percent in 2006, the median estimate of 80 economists surveyed by Bloomberg News Sept. 1 to 7.

Paulson, who replaced John Snow in July, said in the statement that protectionist pressures remain a ``serious threat." China needs greater currency flexibility to help even lopsided flows of trade and investment, reflected in the U.S.'s record current-account deficit, Paulson said.

No Currency Target

Paulson said he ``will listen" to China's government rather than just make prescriptions and it would be ``presumptuous" to set any type of target regarding a change in currency policy.

The U.S. would do its part to reduce the so-called imbalances by reducing its budget deficit. Europe and Japan must boost consumer demand, and oil exporters should invest more of their profits at home, Paulson said.

Like China, some of those oil exporters should permit greater currency flexibility, Paulson said, without naming particular countries.

Someone's Spoiling The Party, The Housing Market Says (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

DOJ_NMG_0064745

TO hear some people in the real estate industry tell it, one of the biggest problems with the housing market is what is being said about it in the news media.

Agents and industry executives say reporters, editors and news anchors are making a cooling market sound worse than it is. While the number of sales may have dropped from 2005 (which was a record-setting year, the end of a five-year run) and more homes stay on the market longer, real estate professionals note that sale prices in much of the country are still higher than they were a year ago.

Richard A. Smith, vice chairman and president of the Realogy Corporation, the nation's largest residential real estate broker, said there was a "constant flood of media that is so negative" that it was discouraging many potential buyers and sellers.

"Nobody wants to be foolish in this kind of market," he said. "No one wants to sell too low or buy too high."

The news media have always helped shape public perception of markets, whether for houses, stocks or tulips. But exactly how much the press influences mass consumer behavior is subject to debate.

Robert J. Shiller, the Yale economist and author of "Irrational Exuberance," said the news media played an important role in molding public opinion as markets both rise and fall. But he said he generally approved of the skeptical tone of many news reports about both the real estate boom and subsequent downturn. "The media has been pretty on top of this story, that this might be a psychological event," he said.

One of the industry's frequent complaints is that journalists do not put the current situation in context.

"The doom and gloomers out there are saying business is dropping 'x' percent," said Dave Liniger, chairman and co-founder of Re/Max, the real estate franchiser. "But you have to realize it doubled over the last five years."

Critics point to an article in Fortune magazine in October 2002 that they say illustrates how reporting can distort the market picture. The article, which was about housing on both coasts, argued that prices were rising so fast they were unsustainable, and that a bubble might be created that would inevitably burst.

An example of the problem, the article noted, was a San Francisco Victorian that sold for $285,000 in 1996 and was listed for $1.2 million in 2002. Coldwell Banker, which listed the home, complained that Fortune should have noted that the home had been significantly renovated, which would account for much of the price increase.

That year, in an interview with Real Trends, a trade publication, Alexander E. Perriello III, who ran Coldwell Banker then and now heads all five of Realogy's franchise brands, criticized the article. "I'm getting sick and tired of irresponsible journalism that attacks one of the few bright spots in the U.S. economy," he said.

But the real estate agent who listed the house, Al Rodriguez, said last week that home's value had soared even before it was put on the market in 2002. The couple that was selling it then had bought it the year before in a frenzied bidding war for $1.1 million.

Shawn Tully, who wrote the Fortune article, said in general it was the price of the land, not the homes, that was soaring. At any rate, he said, he wasn't sure what all the criticism was about. "If my story was so influential," he said, "why did the prices increase another 50 percent between 2002 and 2005?"

Indeed, home values climbed an average of 12.5 percent annually in the San Francisco area from 2002 to 2006, according to a government home price index.

Many journalists who cover the real estate market said they expected, and were not worried by, criticism from the industry. They said they were more concerned about whether the news media were skeptical enough about the boom while it was continuing.

"We were late to the savings and loan crisis and we were definitely late to the dot-com crash," said Bradley J. Inman, publisher of Inman News, a real estate news service, who said he believed that the news media have done a better job covering the housing boom.

Some critics say the news media did not include enough contrary viewpoints during the run-up in home prices.

"Obviously, people get carried away," said Dean Baker, co-director of the Center for Economic Policy Research in Washington, who runs a press criticism blog called Beat the Press. "But if there are voices that challenge it, it stops some people."

But Mr. Shiller said he was not so sure it did. In reviewing historical news clips, he said, he found that the press had frequently questioned the premise of booms, including the 1920's stock market boom. "Newspaper people do that more than their audience demands," he said. But it appears, he added, that people "read it blandly and it doesn't sink in."

A Fable, Adapted From Aesop (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

THERE is an Aesop fable about a man — Greek, of course — who sees a swallow fluttering about on an unusually warm winter day. Leaping to the conclusion that summer has arrived, the man sells his only coat to buy himself a good time.

Some economists say you merely need to replace the Greek with an American, and the coat with a house or condominium to understand the force powering the American economy during the recent housing boom.

In this updated version of the fable, Americans were intoxicated by the leaps in the value of their real estate. Assuming the good times were here to stay, they were unable to resist temptation, impulsively calling the mortgage broker to get another loan to pay for the plasma TV set, the Caribbean vacation and the three-burner barbecue grill.

Between the third quarter of 2005 and the first quarter of this year, home equity withdrawals were running at an annual rate of more than $850 billion, according to the Federal Reserve, and amounted to about 9 percent of disposable personal income. The personal savings rate declined into negative territory last year for the first time since 1933. And the economy surged.

In Aesop's world, winter set in again, the swallow died and the coatless man blamed the bird for his misfortune: "By appearing before the springtime you have not only killed yourself," he moaned, "but you have wrought my destruction, too."

Yet in American morality tales, it seems, spendthrifts aren't always punished. Winter has surely engulfed the housing market. But to the befuddlement of many economists, who had been expecting consumers to rein in their spending when the price of their homes stopped rising, America's happy consumers have so far eluded the payback.

"There is no sign of weaker consumer confidence raising the savings rate yet," wrote Charles Dumas, chief economist for the United States at Lombard Street Research, an economic research firm in London. "People have not yet started to pull in their horns in response to house price horrors."

Home prices have not yet fallen nationwide, but have declined in areas like Florida and California. And most other measures of housing activity look ugly. Sales of existing homes declined 11 percent over the last 12 months; mortgage lending fell more than a third since June 2005; construction of new homes has plummeted.

But consumers haven't blinked. Spending jumped 0.5 percent in July; the sharpest increase since December of last year, exceeding consumers' income by some $85 billion.

Of course, rising employment and income this year have helped keep spending afloat. But some economists are starting to question the magnitude of housing's impact on national habits of spending and thrift, concluding that the effect may be smaller than expected: tumbling home prices might not pull consumer spending into the abyss after all.

To begin with, much of the money extracted by Americans from their homes was never spent. Some was used to pay down liabilities like credit-card debt, a sound strategy when credit-card rates are about 8 percentage points higher than rates on a typical mortgage and mortgage interest payments can be deducted from income when paying taxes.

Money was put to other uses. One survey commissioned by the Federal Reserve of people who refinanced their mortgages in 2001 and the first half of 2002 found that only 45 percent had withdrawn any equity at all. About 26 percent of this money was used to pay down debt, 11 percent to buy stocks or other financial assets, 10 percent to buy real estate or make other business investments and 35 percent to finance home improvements. Only 16 percent of the money was used to finance consumption.

This doesn't mean that a decline in home equity extraction wouldn't hurt the economy. Residential investment would decline. Consumption would probably respond to declining house prices in indirect ways.

But relentless spending and a declining savings rate over the last few years seem mostly driven by other factors that occurred at the same time as rising home prices — notably, low interest rates — but were not caused by rising home prices. So the direct impact of falling home prices on spending is likely to be more muted than expected. "I think the slowdown will come," Mr. Dumas said. "But it is likely to be much more slow in operating than is being supposed."

In one recent study, Vladimir Klyuev and Paul S. Mills, two economists from the International Monetary Fund, suggested that the long-term decline in the propensity to save in the United States has to do primarily with financial innovations that have made borrowing easier and quicker, reducing the need for precautionary savings.

Mr. Klyuev and Mr. Mills untangled the effects of home equity withdrawals on savings from other factors, like inflation and interest rates, and found that for every dollar withdrawn from home equity, the savings rate declined by 20 cents in the short run but recovered in the long run.

LOOKING at it the other way around, they found that even if the amount of home equity withdrawal plunged from its current level of 9 percent of disposable income to 1 percent — its long-term average — savings as a share of income would rise by about 1.25 percentage points. Consumption might decline somewhat as a result, but that would hardly be a devastating blow. "There will be a pick-up in savings, but it won't be catastrophic," Mr. Mills said.

In America, the fable is likely to have a happier ending. It may no longer be the best of times, but consumers still own their homes and their barbecue grills — and the swallow still lives.

Who Bears The Risk? (NYT)

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

The housing boom would never have lasted as long as it did if mortgage lenders had to worry about being paid back in full. But instead of relying on borrowers to repay, most lenders quickly sell the loans, generating cash to make more mortgages.

For the past few years, the most voracious loan buyers have been private investment banks, followed by government-sponsored housing agencies, like Fannie Mae. The buyers carve up the loans into mortgage-backed securities — complex i.o.u.'s with various terms, yields and levels of risk. They then sell the securities to investors the world over, at breathtaking profit. The investors earn relatively high returns as homeowners repay their mortgages.

The process has encouraged homeownership and created wealth. But there is a downside, too, which demands attention.

As the boom thundered on, the pool of available credit grew larger than the pool of creditworthy borrowers, resulting in an explosion of risky mortgages with features like no money down, interest-only payments and super-low teaser rates. Investors — including mutual funds, pension funds, hedge funds, insurance companies and foreign central banks, to name a few — currently hold $2 trillion in mortgage-backed securities from investment banks, triple the amount from three years ago. Investors also own $4 trillion in mortgage-backed securities from government-sponsored agencies.

In a market so vast and dynamic, everyone knows that if mortgage defaults should rise, damage could reverberate throughout the financial system. So far, defaults have inched up. But many homeowners are at a dangerous juncture. Interest rates on adjustable mortgages are rising as home values are weakening, precluding for many the chance to refinance. Economists calculate that $750 billion of outstanding mortgage debt is now at measurable risk of default — about 7 percent of the total.

No one can predict the depth of the housing slowdown or its effect on the global economy. Even the Federal Reserve has taken, for now, a wait-and-see approach. Meanwhile, markets seems to take comfort in the belief that if housing hit the skids, the Fed would exert damage control by aggressively lowering interest rates. There is no guarantee, however, that interest-rate easing would have the same powerful effect it had in the past.

What if it didn't? Market makers and central bankers don't talk about that, for fear of unleashing a self-fulfilling prophecy. But we sure hope someone in charge has a fallback plan.

Balancing Act Begins With Bonds (WP/AP)

By Tim Paradise, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Interest Rate Volatility Brings Need for Equilibrium Into Focus

NEW YORK -- With some investors wringing their hands about inflation and the Federal Reserve's efforts to keep it in check, those with bond fund holdings could be forgiven for wanting to take their money and run. But while some market observers see volatility ahead, few are ready to call it quits.

DOJ_NMG_0064748

"I would say things are going to get a little bumpy here in September for the bond market, but I don't think it's the end of the world," said Jeff Tjornehoj, a senior analyst at Lipper Inc. He contends that there are still smart plays to be made.

Bonds have faced a more difficult environment in the past two years as the Federal Reserve raised interest rates 17 consecutive times before pausing last month. While the rate increases hurt bond funds, leaving some investors wary, sentiment changed in late June after Fed comments led investors to believe the rate hikes had come to an end.

Bond prices move in the opposite direction of their yield. So as interest rates rise, the prices of bonds often fall because investors are not willing to pay as much for a bond that has a lower yield.

"Investors are saying that the Fed is done raising rates, and so that's why you see people taking more risk now," said Jim Kauffmann, head of fixed income at ING Investment Management. He noted that it became more acceptable to take risk in areas such as high-yield bonds, which have lower credit-quality ratings.

Kauffmann said the Fed's comments turned investors' attention to growth from inflation, with the notion that if growth in the economy moderates, then so, too, will inflation. "Now that's a huge leap of faith for investors to make," he said.

Still, Kauffmann believes that if interest rates hold, bond funds should have an easier time showing the returns investors are looking for.

The amount of money invested in bond funds is about $1.41 trillion, or about 15 percent of the amount invested in mutual funds overall, according to the Investment Company Institute, the mutual fund industry trade group. Displeased with lackluster returns for intermediate to long-term bonds, investors snipped their bond fund holdings in 2004 after having added since 2001.

But the funds saw renewed interest last year, with investors adding $31.3 billion to the sector, according to the ICI. The group attributes the increased investment in part to growth in funds that snap up shares of other funds, such as life-cycle funds. These funds, which aim for a balanced investment portfolio, generally include bond funds.

This year has seen a mixed performance for bond funds, with many of the year-to-date gains occurring in the three months since investors interpreted that the Fed was done raising interest rates.

Through July, however, investors added an impressive $22.7 billion to bond funds this year, ICI figures show.

"The summer has been a great time for bond funds to get back on track," Tjornehoj said.

Kauffmann expects that the Fed won't adjust interest rates when it meets this week, but he remains concerned that the effects of the earlier increases haven't been fully absorbed by the markets.

"There still remains a significant question whether inflation is going to become a problem," he said. "Typically inflation does not peak until after the Fed is done" raising rates.

A cautious investor, perhaps someone closer to retirement, will likely be more comfortable investing in funds focused on shorter-term bonds, not those whose focus is bonds with 10- and 15-year maturities, said Steve Schoepke, vice president of research and product development at AIG SunAmerica Asset Management. Still, he said investors shouldn't necessarily shun longer-term maturities. He noted that as the Fed has tightened rates, short-term interest rates have advanced but longer-term rates haven't acted in tandem, therefore holding down how much some of these bonds pay out.

He prescribes diversification and, as an example, offered a strategy in which an investor's holdings are a mix of short-term and long-term maturities with few intermediate-term bonds. "It's certainly a strategy to mitigate risk and at the same time be positioned, maybe, if you're on the fence," Schoepke said.

Tjornehoj also preaches diversification. "I would want to have several maturities represented." He believes too many investors are convinced they need to be invested solely in funds that focus on maturities of a year or less.

He counsels investors to focus on funds that invest in high-quality bonds and to limit how deeply they venture into bond funds made up of tempting, but riskier, investments such as debt with lower credit quality or in developing nations. Such funds have shown strong performance but could suffer deep setbacks should there be a downturn in the bond markets. Too often, Tjornehoj said, he sees investors "chasing performance" and arriving late.

Rather than focusing on flashy emerging markets funds or high-yield bonds, he suggests that investors reexamine corporate and municipal bond funds. "I still think corporates are a pretty good play. I think they can finish the year out stronger than treasuries."

Diversification could simply help investors stomach swings that could occur as the markets await answers about everything from inflation and interest rates.

"We may be in for volatile times for the rest of the year," Tjornehoj said.

Retirement, Squeezed (WP)

As Traditional Plans Decline, Workers Face a Less Certain Future

Sean Schuback, a 15-year veteran of Verizon, arrived at work one morning last December to unsettling news: A company e-mail sent the night before announced that the telecommunications giant was freezing its pension plan.

In a instant, Schuback, 33, who joined the company as a phone operator right out of high school, saw the $469,286 pension payout he was told he could receive by working another 15 years sliced to $245,494, where it would stay no matter how many more years he put in.

"When I started, I thought, 'This is just a job for a while,' but the benefits were so good I stayed," said the Eastchester, N.Y., resident, who worked his way up to a managerial position. Now, his plan to retire early at 48 and work part time is dashed.

What happened to Schuback's pension is part of a long-running trend, as otherwise healthy companies -- not only Verizon Communications Inc., but also International Business Machines Corp. and, most recently, DuPont Co. -- freeze, terminate or alter the terms of their employees' retirement packages. Most of these companies increased other retirement offerings, which don't include fixed payouts.

Today, about 22 million workers, 19 percent of active private-sector employees, have traditional pension plans, compared with 39 percent three decades ago, according to federal government statistics.

Despite Schuback's financial setback, any retirement expert would say that Schuback should count his blessings as one of a dwindling number of U.S. workers who have a benefit that many say is quickly becoming a dinosaur.

"There's no doubt, if you have some guaranteed retirement from your employer, you are definitely in the lucky minority," said Jack VanDerhei, a professor in the business school at Temple University and a research fellow at the nonprofit Employee Benefit Research Institute.

He and other financial experts say workers fortunate enough to still have traditional pensions should not rely on them too much for retirement, as the long-term prospects of such plans are increasingly in doubt. While a new law signed last month by President Bush aims to shore up the private pension system by forcing companies to fund their plans more fully, some retirement consultants say the added expense may the trend of companies limiting their plans for existing employees or dropping them for new hires.

As workers make their retirement calculations, they should keep in mind the two, sometimes opposing, principles that govern the U.S. pension system and that the new law, the Pension Protection Act, reaffirmed: An accrued pension can't be wiped out, but companies can walk away from promised future benefits at any time.

That means workers who still have pensions will have to do more homework to determine how much money their plans are likely to provide, experts say. And they should be prepared for the worst-case scenario.

"It's always wise to cast a jaundiced eye on a pension and ask what happens if it doesn't deliver as promised," said James McGrath, a financial planner in Rockville.Changing Times

The traditional pension, also known as a "defined-benefit plan," is typically funded entirely by the employer and offers a steady monthly income, or a lump sum, upon retirement, based on a person's age, salary and years of service. Pension benefits typically accrue most of their value in the last few years of a 20- to 30-year employment cycle. Employers bear the risk and burden of properly investing the pension's funds to ensure full payout of promised benefits.

The costs of maintaining such plans have climbed sharply in the past six years because companies have been forced to put more money into pensions to compensate for lower-than-anticipated returns on investments stemming from low interest rates and declines in stock market values, said Matt Moore, senior analyst at the National Center for Policy Analysis, a nonpartisan think tank in Dallas.

As a result, employers are increasingly embracing other options, especially "defined-contribution plans," the most common of which is the 401(k). Under such plans, companies contribute a set amount each month, ask employees to bear the responsibility of deciding how that money will be invested and then hand over a check at retirement for whatever each account is worth at that moment. In 1978, only 17 percent of the workforce had a defined-contribution benefit. By 2003, the latest numbers available, it was 56 percent.

A smaller number have converted pensions to "cash-balance plans." They work like a pension because a worker gets a specified amount at retirement, but also like a 401(k) because the company puts in a set contribution for each worker -- regardless of age or seniority -- and specifies how the money will increase in value, for example at 1 percent above the interest on 10-year Treasury note. Thirty years ago, no pension plan had been converted to a cash-balance model. Today, an estimated 5.5 million people have converted to a cash-balance program.

Cash-balance plans appeal to a younger, more mobile workforce for two reasons, said J. Mark Iwry, a lawyer who is a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a one of the co-founders of the nonprofit Retirement Security Project. Benefits accrue steadily rather than accelerate sharply after a worker has been at one company for 20 or 30 years. And they are portable: Workers can take what they've accrued when they change jobs.

Those shifts mean that some workers with pensions have the added benefit of a second plan, such as a 401(k), though VanDerhei said that no one knows exactly how big the overlap is. Even so, a sudden drop in the future value of a person's traditional pension can change the retirement picture. Workers have only three options to close or at least narrow the gap between what they thought they would get and what they will get, financial planners say: Postpone retirement and work longer, save more to make up the difference, or accept a lower standard of living in retirement.Prepare for the Worst

The good news for workers with traditional pensions, retirement experts say, is that most plans are fully funded and will probably pay out as expected. And even if a plan isn't fully funded -- which means the employer has not set enough aside to pay all promised benefits -- there is a federally run safety net called the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., which ensures that workers owed a pension get at least something. If a firm goes into bankruptcy protection and is permitted under its reorganization to dump its pension, the PBGC will pay retirees a portion of what they are owed, up to an inflation-adjusted maximum of $47,659, for those who leave the workforce at 65.

Except for well-publicized instances, such as in the airline industry -- where pilots and others at carriers under bankruptcy protection have had to take a cut from the six-figure retirement packages they were owed -- 90 percent of workers paid by the PBGC get 100 percent of what they were due, said PBGC spokesman Randy Clerihue.

The bad news, though, is that no one can bank on a pension benefit continuing to grow as originally promised. So while many private-sector retirement experts say pension holders have many reasons to justify hoping for the best, they recommend preparing for the worst.

Pension holders should have sound estimates of how much they will need during retirement and how much they can expect from their pension, Social Security and personal savings, including 401(k)s and IRAs. Financial planners can help calculate that number and offer advice on how to adjust savings, if necessary. Internet-based retirement calculators are also available on the Web sites of many mutual fund companies and securities firms and some nonprofit consumer groups.

Retirement experts say workers often underestimate what they need. A paper published last week by EBRI concludes that an old rule of thumb that retirees need 75 percent to 85 percent of their pre-retirement income to live comfortably is outdated. A person today probably needs closer to 100 percent, said VanDerhei, the paper's author, because people are living longer and they need to include money for health care not covered by Medicare.

Workers also should check the financial health of their company's plan. The new law requires employers to send workers regular pension statements in plain English -- without misleading accounting tricks -- but not until the end of April 2009, according to the ERISA Industry Committee, a trade group representing the nation's biggest employers on benefit issues. Until then, workers will have to put in extra work to get a clear picture of their pensions. They should contact their company's benefits department for information, though it may be hard to decipher the numbers, retirement consultants say. Employees concerned about their company's plan might consider pooling resources to hire an outside pension consultant to analyze the data.

Clerihue, the PBGC spokesman, said workers also should remember that a fund that looks healthy today, even under the stricter requirements of the new pension law, can quickly fall behind, depending on the economy's, or an industry's, health. He said that in 2000, using an agency calculation that is more conservative than what most companies use, the PBGC had a $23 billion shortfall for about $1.3 trillion in owed pension benefits. Within three years, however, the underfunded amount had grown to $450 billion of $1.6 trillion owed.

Underfunded plans, even at a healthy company, are more likely to be frozen, financial experts say. The benefits consulting firm Watson Wyatt Worldwide Inc. said that last year, 113 of the 1,000 biggest companies in the United States had frozen or terminated a pension plan or had announced plans to do so, nearly double the number in 2004 and 2003 combined.

"If it's not being funded currently, you can expect problems sooner or later," said McGrath, the Rockville financial planner. "If it's healthy, you still need to see how well prepared you'd be if the pension were frozen today, in a year, in five years. It all depends on how old the worker is."Frozen Out

Pensions freezes can happen two ways, said Karen Ferguson, director of the Pension Rights Center, a nonprofit advocacy group. In a "soft freeze," benefits continue as usual for existing employees, but the pension is closed to new hires. In a "hard freeze," such as the one Schuback experienced at Verizon, everyone is affected.

Younger workers stand a greater chance of not getting all they were hoping to get from their pensions. But they have the advantage of having more years to work and save to make up for shortfalls under various scenarios, planners and other experts say. For example, the $223,792 drop in potential value of Schuback's pension isn't as devastating, largely because he's relatively young. And the $245,494 he is on track to get puts him way ahead of many of his peers: It's more than six times the average, $40,000, most people in their thirties have saved, according to EBRI.

Older workers are more likely to have accrued much of their pension benefits. But they will have less time to save for any shortfalls. Financial planners say this group should take full advantage of catch-up programs that allow workers over 50 to put more pretax money into 401(k)s and IRAs.

By assuming a worst-case scenario and bolstering personal savings to compensate, the worst that can happen, McGrath said, "is that you'll retire with too much money. Is that bad?"

Workers within a year or two of retirement who have worked at a company long enough to have locked in full benefits might find they can invest a bigger slice of their savings in stocks than conventional investment wisdom advises for older investors. For example, if a soon-to-retire worker has accrued a pension benefit of $50,000 a year, he might want to take a few bigger risks with other income -- investing in equities rather than bonds, for example, which could help a retiree stand a better chance of keeping up with inflation, McGrath and others said.

Those retiring should take special care when deciding whether to take a lump sum or monthly payments, experts say, because the interest rate companies can use to compute lump-sum payments can disadvantage a worker.

But no advice can help some older employees who have not locked in the full benefits of working two or three decades and did not factor in the possibility that their pensions would be curtailed. For this group, financial consultants say, a freeze or termination amounts to a pay cut. Verizon network services manager Margo Bryerton, 57, who has worked at the company for 18 years, estimated that the freeze lopped $300,000 from the retirement package she expected when she retires at 65. Now, she said, she will have to work past 65, take a second job or possibly sell her house to make up the difference.

"I based everything on faulty thinking. I assumed it would be there," she said. "I'm in that age group where I'm too young to retire but I'm too old to start over. It really is a pay cut for me."

Pension Plans On Ice (KCS)

By Gene Meyer

The Kansas City Star, September 17, 2006

More than 40 million Americans in the nation's nongovernmental work force are either covered by traditional pension plans or expect to be, authorities estimate.

Potentially, three things will happen to the lifetime income streams that these workers and current retirees are expecting after they leave the work force. And two of those — a pension plan being frozen or one being terminated — aren't pretty.

Congress passed, and President Bush signed, legislation last month to strengthen traditional pensions with mandates for employers to increase funding, faster repair requirements for underfunded plans, and some special provisions for troubled airlines with potentially whopping pension problems.

The new law also significantly improved many features of 401(k) plans and other similar products that increasingly have supplanted traditional pensions over the last two decades.

Although surviving pension plans will be stronger, many observers bet that employers will turn even more to 401(k) plans and shift an unprecedented share of the retirement funding load onto workers and their families.

"Of the traditional three-legged stool you use in retirement planning — your pension, your Social Security and your personal savings — you better look in the mirror hardest" to find your most likely source of retirement security, said Sandi Weaver, president of Financial Security Advisors Inc. in Prairie Village.

Some pension plans will be OK because employers will remain flush with funds and can cover the costs of running the accounts.

Having prepared wisely for longer-living retirees and rising costs, these companies will continue mailing out the monthly checks that help put gilt in their workers' golden years.

That's the best outcome. It also is becoming rarer.

Over the past 20 years, the number of traditional pension plans provided by companies — which generations of workers grew to count on — has declined about 73 percent, reports the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., the federally chartered insurer of last resort for the plans. The list of corporations turning to the guaranty corporation seemingly grows every week. Delta Air Lines is the latest notable casualty.

Alternately, a company might freeze its pension plan, a strategy that has become increasingly common. Freezing a plan, such as what happened at Sprint Nextel Corp., preserves the benefits that workers and retirees have earned, but requires employees to chip in more of their own money from then on to help provide secure retirements.

Freezing pensions hits hardest middle-tenure employees who haven't yet hit those peak earning years that plump up their retirement checks and may not have much time left to build big retirement stashes.

Stay ahead of the pain

"This is going to hurt a lot of people if they don't understand the benefits of a 401(k) plan," said Cindy Smith, 46, a Sprint Nextel worker.

In January, Smith's pension funds were frozen along with those of about 39,000 workers. Those workers were urged to enroll in a sweetened matched-contribution 401(k) plan.

Smith already was a 401(k) believer and plan participant when the freeze was declared. She said she didn't expect to feel pinched when her eventual Sprint pension check reflected only the benefits she earned in her first 10 years with the company. She said she thought that for her the enhanced 401(k) benefits Sprint was offering would make up the difference.

Others won't be so lucky.

Boston College's Center for Retirement Research calculates that a 50-year-old, $48,000-a-year worker with 10 years vesting a typical traditional pension plan might see a more than 17 percent reduction in retirement income, to $7,200 a month, if the plan were frozen and replaced with a 401(k).

Individual workers' results will vary widely because their work histories, their pension plans' benefit formulas and the performances of the 401(k) portfolios will differ.

"My dad's generation really counts on pensions, but we need to do more for ourselves," Smith said

Federal solution

Growing numbers of companies have cut back on their traditional pension benefits, either by freezing the plans or paying workers to walk away from the plans.

Others are going or have gone a step further and turned their plans over to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. to run.

Delta, for example, chose this month to end its plan and turn it over to federal insurers.

That's where the federal guaranty corporation steps in, often covering 50 cents or less of each dollar in originally promised benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0064753

That could be the most devastating scenario for workers and retirees, especially for lifelong workers who are relying heavily on pension checks for secure retirements, said Doug Black, a financial planner and president of Larson Financial Services Inc.

"There is no easy answer if you haven't been putting aside other funds too," Black said. "Pray, maybe."

Research shows that although Americans in general are abysmal savers, their behavior is all over the lot.

For example, more than a third of the nation's 18- to 44-year-olds have no retirement savings, but some 80 percent of 55-year-olds have at least something stashed away, a recent A.G. Edwards survey found.

Just under 52 percent of an estimated 53 million 25- to 64-year-olds whose employers offer retirement plans of any kind are participating in those plans, which is a nearly two percentage point drop from 2004, the Congressional Research Service reports.

Not money in the bank

Traditional pensions — or defined benefit plans, as they are more formally known — remain squeezed by rising costs, squishier investment returns and the pressure that sponsoring employers feel from global competitors.

"It really has changed the way I advise people," said Kevin Taylor, a financial planner with H&R Block Financial Advisors in Overland Park.

Ten years ago, Taylor might have presumed that pension benefits were like future money in clients' bank accounts, he said. Now he checks to see whether it's possible — and possibly more prudent — for clients to pull lump sums out of the pension now and invest them directly for income in the future.

Taylor and other planners increasingly consider "what if" questions.

What if your company, for example, freezes its pension plan and encourages workers to open 401(k)s instead?

Many planners say that, in general, workers younger than 50 win — if they start putting as much money as possible into the 401(k)s and especially if the employer sweetens those plans as Sprint did.

Workers older than about 60 should be OK too if they've built up enough pension benefits over a couple of decades that a freeze nips only a bit of their accounts. Workers in between are the ones facing the biggest challenge, a broad consensus holds.

Also, rolling lump sums from frozen pension plans into personally managed retirement accounts, as Taylor suggests, won't always be possible. Some plans might not allow that, or they may require you to quit work first.

New breaks

Pension legislation signed last month allows companies to amend their existing plans, if they choose, to allow 62-year-olds to take what are known as in-service distributions, or money from the plans while they remain at their jobs.

These potentially more liberal withdrawal rules also may apply to frozen pension money, though that isn't clear yet.

Be warned: Serious saving will be required to make up lost ground at any stage.

Richard Salmen, a senior vice president at GTrust in Overland Park, said that if savers aren't maxing out their 401(k) contributions already, at a minimum they should notch up savings with at least half of each future pay raise.

Terminated pensions, the ones taken over by the guaranty corporation, are trickier.

First, federal payouts are far less generous than those promised by the companies whose plans failed. Look for your pension check from a guaranty-corporation-run plan to be half or less of what you expected.

Second, the federal insurers have different priorities than the companies whose plans were taken over. Those broadly are to pay retirees who already were receiving benefits first, then split what's left among workers with future claims. .

So workers approaching retirement with lots of benefits in shaky pension plans need to consider staying with their employers until they become first in line for the reduced benefits that the guaranty corporation pays, Weaver said.

"Take a job sweeping the floors if you have to," Weaver said.

Surviving the cut
•Make up for your reduced pension benefits by putting as much as possible in 401(k) or other plans your employer switches to, and in IRAs.
•Consider rolling your accumulated pension benefits into an IRA if your plan allows that. Many won't allow it unless you retire or change jobs, however.
•You may need to postpone your retirement, scale back your expected retirement lifestyle or take a part-time job to make up for pension cuts.
•Pare down your current living expenses now to save additional money on your own for retirement later.

Visions Of The Golden Years Dim As Pension Promises Fade (BOS)

By Robert Gavin, Globe Staff
The Boston Globe, September 17, 2006
ESSEX JUNCTION, Vt. -- After the collapse of Digital Equipment Corp. cost him a 16-year career, Larry Millette started over, taking an entry-level factory job at the IBM plant in this Vermont village.
The pay wasn't great. But to Millette, then in his late 40s, IBM offered something more valuable: a generous pension. By working another 15 years or so, then cobbling together his IBM and Digital pensions, Millette figured he could yet enjoy a decent retirement.
But Millette's hopes have vanished in recent years as IBM all but abandoned the pension first promised to him. Today, after 11 years of 12-hour shifts, Millette has just $30,000 in his IBM pension account. He also has a new retirement strategy: ``Work until I can't work anymore."
Millette, now 59, is among hundreds of thousands of workers whose dreams of long, comfortable retirements are getting upended as US corporations shed both the costs and responsibilities of traditional pensions. Faced with intense competition in a global economy, and huge obligations as baby boomers retire, many of the nation's biggest companies are rewriting the social contract that for 60 or more years has bound them to workers.
Since last year, at least a dozen corporations with nearly 1 million US employees either froze pension benefits for current workers, eliminated pension plans for new ones, or both. Today, just over one-third of Fortune 100 companies still offer traditional pensions to new employees, down from one-half in 2002 and 89 percent in 1985, according to Watson Wyatt Worldwide Inc., an Arlington, Va., consulting firm.
The decline reflects a broader retreat by corporate America from its long-standing role as a provider of social safety net programs such as pensions and health insurance. Under pressure from investors to produce bigger profits and global competitors that don't provide similar benefits, US firms are withdrawing from these obligations and shifting risks, responsibilities, and costs to their workers.
The shift comes as both corporate profits and executive pay soar. Combined profits of the nation's 500 biggest public corporations are at record levels, having grown at double-digit rates for three years, according to Thomson First Call, a Boston research firm that surveys stock analysts and tracks corporate earnings. In about the same period, the average compensation of chief executives at these companies jumped more than 40 percent to $11.7 million a year, according to the Corporate Library, a research firm in Portland, Maine.

At IBM, for example, profits rose 7 percent in 2005, while Chief Executive Samuel J. Palmisano's pay jumped 29 percent to $11.4 million, including salary, bonus, and incentives, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings. Palmisano, 55, who has worked more than 30 years at IBM, will receive a pension of about $4 million a year when he retires.

Certainly, by today's standards, IBM remains a generous employer. For example, unlike many companies that neglected to set aside enough money to cover future pension payouts, IBM has contributed $6.4 billion in the past four years to keep its US plans well-funded.

IBM once epitomized the old social contract of employee loyalty and corporate paternalism, refraining from layoffs during the Great Depression. The company promised lifetime employment, cradle-to-grave benefits, and a relationship built on the principle ``Respect for the individual."

But in the tumultuous 1990s, battered by changing technology and fierce competition, IBM began to reduce pensions and to redefine its relationship with workers. During a major pension redesign in the late 1990s, company memos described the need to ``eliminate the concept of retirement to the extent possible" and ``not create long-term incentives to remain at IBM."

The traditional pension was the cornerstone of the old paternalism. Companies made contributions to pension funds on their workers' behalf; managed the investment of the funds; and assumed the risks of generating enough income to support retired workers until death. Regardless of market conditions, retirees got their pension checks each month.

Now companies are replacing traditional pensions with saving plans such as 401(k)s, which can cut companies' costs by as much as half. Employers make set contributions to individual retirement accounts, and they're done. Choosing investments, navigating the ups and downs of financial markets, and putting aside enough money to last through retirement become the problems of workers.

Given disciplined savings, smart choices, and especially time, 401(k)s can produce greater retirement income than traditional pensions. But for Millette and other workers nearing retirement, time is something they don't have.

Millette knew the world was changing when he joined IBM. His layoff from Digital had taught him that. Still, during his orientation at IBM, which included an entire day to explain benefits, Millette was assured he could yet find security.

``They kept telling us, `If you're a good employee, a loyal employee, and you do your job, you're going to get all these benefits'," Millette said. ``Then someone signs a paper, and you get almost nothing."

Pensions are born Millette works seven 12-hour shifts over the course of two weeks. He's on the manufacturing floor of IBM's semiconductor plant by 6:45 a.m., 15 minutes before his shift starts.

Dressed head-to-toe in a white ``bunny" suit, he spends 10 of the next 12 hours on his feet in an IBM clean room, shuttling between nine tools that plate silicon wafers used in computer chips. When Millette gets home shortly before 8 p.m, he can barely stay awake another hour.

Millette never had big plans for retirement. He just looked forward to puttering around his home in Milton, Vt., tending to the tomatoes, cucumbers, and peppers in his garden; pruning the fruit trees he planted; making wine from his home-grown fruit. He thought he'd see more of his four grandchildren, and maybe even take a trip with his wife of 31 years, Rose.

The idea of retirement as a time to relax, travel, and pursue interests put aside during working years is a modern phenomenon. A century ago, two of three men worked past the age of 64. The average age of retirement was 74. The average length of retirement: three years.

``If you look at people in the past, they continued to work in incredible amounts of pain," said Dora L. Costa, an MIT economics professor and author of ``The Evolution of Retirement." ``When they couldn't work anymore, they moved in with their children."

Social Security, enacted in 1935, began to change the nature of retirement. At the time, pensions were unusual. But with the outbreak of World War II and the drain on the labor force, more firms offered pensions, health insurance, and other so-called fringe benefits to attract and retain workers.

Meanwhile, high tax rates to finance the war made these programs attractive to both companies and workers, since firms could deduct their contributions and workers didn't have to pay income taxes on the benefits. The system eventually became institutionalized in company policies and union contracts. The result: Corporate-sponsored cradle-to-grave social insurance.

In 1950, the average retirement age was still 70. By 1983, it had slipped to 63, where it remains. Many analysts, however, now expect the age to rise as pension benefits dwindle and health-care costs increase.

Dreams of security Millette's views of retirement were shaped by his late father, Joseph, who worked for 35 years as a toolmaker at General Electric Co. in Burlington, Vt., retiring nearly 20 years ago with a pension, health benefits, and the economic security the next generation of workers would come to expect.

Millette grew up in Burlington, one of six children. He dropped out of high school to join the Army and spent four years in the service, including a tour in Vietnam. Stationed at a medivac hospital that came under regular mortar fire, he fought in the Tet Offensive, the fierce 1968 attack by North Vietnam that changed the course of the war. He returned home with two service medals, a general equivalency diploma, and a hearing loss that requires him to wear a hearing aid.

In 1977, after several modest jobs, he heard Digital Equipment Corp. was opening a plant in South Burlington. Like IBM, which had opened its Essex Junction plant in 1957, Digital boasted good pay, generous benefits, and a chance for the long-term security that Millette's father had earned.

``The attitude then was, `Thank you for working for us, for being a loyal employee,' '' recalled Millette, who still has his Digital badge, No. 61763, and proudly notes he was Digital's 62d hire in Vermont. ``I thought if I worked hard, did a good job, I wouldn't have anything to worry about.''

Millette started at $2.85 an hour, but double-digit raises came every six months as Digital grew rapidly. He was promoted from solderer to inspector, technician, supervisor, and manager. He bought a three-bedroom home on a half-acre, for $41,000.

At the time, Millette's brother, John, worked for IBM, making for explosive family get-togethers. The brothers would argue the superiority of IBM or Digital with the intensity of Yankees and Red Sox fans. Eventually, their relatives imposed a new rule: No more talking about work.

``We both thought we worked for the best companies in the world,'' John Millette said. ``I ate, slept, and drank IBM. It was all first-class. If you worked hard and kept your nose clean, you had opportunity. You had a job for life.''

Enter the `new economy' Thomas J. Watson Sr., a one-time traveling salesman, built IBM from a struggling conglomerate that made scales, time clocks, and mechanical accounting machines. Assuming the company's leadership in 1914, he forged IBM into a progressive employer, offering good pay, reasonable hours, safe conditions, and even vacations in an era before such policies were common. He once lectured executives that their prime duty was to employ people.

His son and successor, Thomas Watson Jr., brought the company into the computer age, stressing his father's principles of loyalty, dedication, and corporate responsibility. ``I wanted IBM to be recognized as one of the most generous employers in America,'' the younger Watson wrote in his memoir.

Watson Jr. retired as chairman and CEO in 1971. By the 1980s, IBM and its core product, the mainframe computer, were under assault from new technologies and new competitors, such as Microsoft Corp.

The ``new economy'' firms had different relationships with employees, market-based rather than paternalistic. Instead of security, they offer the chance of big payoffs through stock and stock options. Instead of the stability of traditional pensions, they offered the growth potential and mobility of 401(k) plans.

The 401(k), a tax-deferred savings plan, was created in 1978 and named for the section of the US tax code in which its rules are spelled out. A 401(k) is a ``defined contribution'' plan, because employers contribute a set amount to employee retirement, often tied to how much workers themselves contribute. Ultimately, this form of retirement plan depends heavily on workers' investment decisions and the performance of financial markets.

A traditional pension, on the other hand, is known as a defined benefit plan. Employers promise to pay workers a set benefit for life after they retire, based on earnings and years of service.

As the cost to companies has escalated, the number of defined benefit plans has fallen by half since 1980, while defined contribution plans have quadrupled, according to the Center for Retirement Research at Boston College. Sixty-five percent of workers with pensions were covered by defined benefit plans in 1980, compared to 30 percent in 2003, the most recent data available.

Several factors are driving the transformation. Many companies view 401(k)s as more attractive because workers, now more mobile, can take the money they build up with them to new jobs. A 401(k) typically costs less for companies. Perhaps most important, the costs, essentially fixed by contribution levels, are predictable.

That's hardly the case with traditional pensions. To meet long-term obligations, companies invest pension funds in stocks and bonds, and make additional contributions as needed. But the amounts can swing wildly, with rising markets reducing corporate contributions and declining markets having the opposite effect.

During the bull markets of the 1980s and 1990s, US corporations made average pension contributions of about $30 billion a year, according to the Center for Retirement Research. When the stock market crashed, the contributions jumped to $45 billion in 2001, and $100 billion in each of the next two years.

Many analysts expect the recently enacted pension reform law to accelerate the shift to 401(k)s, because the law requires bigger corporate contributions to underfunded pension plans and increases exposure to market swings.

``Firms want to get rid of uncertainty, and they're basically shifting it to employees," said Jack VanDerhei, a fellow at the Employee Benefit Research Institute, a think tank in Washington.

Handing out layoff notices In the early 1990s, the same competitive forces buffeting IBM slammed Digital Equipment Corp. After nearly 16 years at Digital, Millette had risen from the factory floor to a manager's office. Now, he was handing out layoff notices.

``What do you mean?" he still remembers stunned co-workers saying. ``I'm doing my job."

Millette's own layoff came at the end of 1992. A few months later, Digital shuttered its Vermont plant.

Millette was 45, and, for the first time in his life, worried about retirement. He had always counted on a 30-year career at Digital and the healthy Digital pension, so he hadn't saved a lot. His wife, then a self-employed hair dresser working in her own small shop in Burlington, had no pension at all.

Millette soon found a job in quality control at a pharmaceutical company in St. Albans, near the Canadian border. But two years later, when he heard IBM was hiring in Essex Junction, east of Burlington, he jumped at the chance.

The commute was shorter and he preferred working in technology. Most important, the entry-level job, although paying about half his last Digital salary of about $23 an hour, offered a pension that would help fund his retirement.

``You get to a point in life where you say, `I'm 40-something-years old, and I'm looking for a job,' " Millette said. ``I needed a bridge to retirement. IBM gave me an opportunity to recover from my layoff."

Changes begin at IBM

By the time Millette joined IBM in 1995, it was undergoing dramatic changes. Two years earlier, bleeding revenues, profits, and market share, IBM abandoned its no-layoff policy and began slashing tens of thousands of jobs. The company then turned to Louis V. Gerstner Jr. to save it from collapse.

Gerstner, the first outsider to lead IBM, arrived via RJR Nabisco Inc. He engineered what became a legendary turnaround. He also re-engineered the relationship with workers. In 1997, IBM launched a redesign of the employee pension plan that cut benefits, laying the groundwork for further reductions later.

As a February 1998 IBM draft memo explained, new retirement policies should ``move away from entitlement focus; eliminate the concept of retirement to the extent possible;" and ``not create long-term incentives to remain at IBM."

The memo was one of many filed as evidence in an age discrimination lawsuit brought by employees after IBM completed the pension redesign in 1999. A federal appeals court in Chicago recently ruled IBM's plan did not discriminate, but plaintiffs plan to appeal to the Supreme Court.

The revamped pension adopted by IBM is known as a cash-balance plan, which has features similar to 401(k)s. Companies essentially make annual contributions to individual employee retirement accounts, which grow at interest rates tied to short-term Treasury bills.

When workers retire, they can take their pension earnings as lump sums or convert them to annuities, which provide monthly payouts for life. As with 401(k)s, workers also can take these retirement accounts with them when they change jobs.

Employers, in turn, get more predictable costs, typically lower than traditional pensions. IBM, for example, estimated the cash-balance conversion would cut pension costs by as much as $472 million annually in the first 10 years, according to IBM memos filed in the age-discrimination suit.

IBM was one of several companies converting to cash-balance plans in the 1990s in the face of projections that pension obligations would balloon. Retirees were living far longer than they did when traditional plans were adopted, and the approaching retirement of some 78 million baby boomers only promised to add costs. What's more, the company was locked in competition with younger technology companies that had never offered traditional pensions.

The problem with IBM's pension plan, an undated memo argued, was that it provided ``benefits that substantially exceed'' IBM's competitors while continuing ``to reflect a lifetime employment model, which is no longer presumptively the right model.'' Instead, IBM needed to expose its workers to market forces, so they would ``share in the rewards and risks, along with IBM's shareholders,'' according to the February 1998 draft memo.

IBM executives also said they were competing for talent, and the portability of cash-balance would appeal to younger workers who didn't expect or seek lifetime employment. But, they acknowledged, it wouldn't be so good for older employees -- particularly those with short tenures, such as Millette, who could lose nearly half their benefits.

IBM officials declined to comment on the memos because the case is still in court. But generally, said Randy MacDonald, IBM's senior vice president for human resources, the company has changed benefits as the competition and workforce have changed.

Executive pay soars With a job at IBM, Larry Millette's life had at last stabilized. His performance ratings were high. Raises followed. His benefits seemed solid. He was perfectly content working on the manufacturing floor.

As he settled onto IBM's production line, taking less than one sick day a year, Millette had no idea executives were embarking on a course that would cut his promised pension in half. There was little reason to suspect it.

Gerstner's turnaround strategy had succeeded. Profits totaled about $20 billion from 1997 to 1999, and IBM's stock price hit new highs. The pension fund was healthy, too. At the end of 1997, shortly after IBM began efforts to cut pension costs, the fund had a surplus -- $8 billion more than needed to cover obligations.

The pension fund, in fact, was generating profits for IBM. Under accounting rules, pension fund investment returns that exceed current and some previous costs increase a company's earnings, just as investment returns that fall short of such costs reduce earnings. By 2001, excess returns grew to 13 percent of IBM's profit, up from 8 percent in 1999, when the cash balance plan was put in place.

The impact of pension income on IBM's bottom line was important to company executives, whose compensation was increasingly based on IBM's financial performance. Gerstner believed executives should face the same risks as shareholders, and tied compensation to profits and stock price through bonuses, stock options, and other incentives.

During his tenure, the top five executives, Gerstner included, were awarded options for around 6 million shares, valued at the time between $300 million and $900 million, depending on possible appreciation, according to SEC filings. These executives received the most options in 1997, just as the project to cut pension costs got underway.

Gerstner, through an IBM spokesman, declined to be interviewed. MacDonald, the human resources executive, said potential stock gains for executives never played a role in pension changes. ``To suggest a quid pro quo is completely irresponsible,'' he said.

Still, surging executive pay in boardrooms across America has likely played a role in the erosion of traditional pensions, said Alicia Munnell, director of the Center for Retirement Research. Employee pension plans cap benefits at about four times average wages to qualify for federal tax breaks. But as CEO pay soared to nearly 400 times average wages, these benefits became inconsequential to executives.

``The conventional pension system is really not something they relate to,'' Munnell said.

Many companies, including IBM, created separate executive pension plans to provide retirement benefits above the cap, further disconnecting corporate officers from employee pensions, Munnell said. In Gerstner's case, his $1.1 million-a-year pension was negotiated in his contract, and unaffected by changes to the employee and executive pensions.

Gerstner retired from IBM in 2002, at 60, having engineered one of the greatest corporate turnarounds in history. On top of his pension, he was granted 125,000 shares of IBM stock, with an estimated value of about $14 million, and a 10-year consulting contract that gives him access to IBM perks, such as corporate cars and aircraft. As a consultant, he gets daily fees based on his final salary of $2 million a year. He also held nearly $150 million in unexercised stock options.

`The rules have changed' IBM unveiled the cash-balance plan in 1999, but it sparked such outrage among employees that the company allowed those over 40, with at least 10 years of service, the choice of keeping the old pension. Millette, with only four years at IBM, didn't get the choice. He was 52.

Today, seven years later, Millette's pension is changing again, and he's not sure it's for the better. In January, IBM said it would freeze pension benefits at the end of 2007 and put in place one of the nation's most generous 401(k) plans, more than doubling IBM contributions to employee accounts.

The company projects that that move and changes in other countries will cut pension costs by as much as $3 billion through 2010. MacDonald, the human resources executive, said IBM faces competitors from Asia and Latin America with far lower costs. If IBM fails to control costs, MacDonald said, the company risks the fate of US steelmakers, automakers, and airlines, which have plunged into or near bankruptcy, slashed tens of thousands of jobs, and, in some cases, abandoned pension obligations altogether.

``We have to evolve with our competition," MacDonald said. ``In the end, our employees understand, this is all about their employment security."

The 26,000 employees still in the traditional-type plan feel the greatest impact from the freeze. But IBM estimates 401(k) contributions -- up to 10 percent of pay -- and investment returns will offset benefit losses. Most of these workers will lose 5 percent or less of their retirement benefits, IBM said.

For employees in the cash-balance plan, IBM will contribute the same amount to their retirement -- up to 8 percent of pay -- but all of it will go into 401(k)s, instead of being divided between cash-balance and 401(k) accounts.

But not ending up worse is cold comfort to Millette, who lost about half his promised pension in the cash-balance conversion.

Millette's retirement problems really began with his Digital layoff. Traditional pensions are structured to gain their greatest value in the final few years of a 30- or 35-year career, so Millette never had the chance to earn those benefits. And he could never make them up.

When the IBM pension freeze goes into effect at the end of next year, Millette will be 60. Using his current earnings of about $40,000 a year, and assuming an annual rate of return of 8 percent, Millette would have to work at least 12 more years before IBM's additional 401(k) contributions equal the benefits he would have received at 65 under the pension he was first promised. That would make him 72.

Millette once thought he might be able to stop working at 62 or 63, but not anymore. Still, he considers himself lucky. He at least has some pension benefits coming from IBM as well as nearly $800 a month from his Digital plan. He has also boosted his 401(k) savings to 17 percent from 15 percent of his pay.

Still with his retirement increasingly dependent on Wall Street, it's hard to feel very secure, Millette said. In addition, health care costs are surging, and could very quickly gobble up retirement income.

``We're comfortable and I'd like to keep this same comfortable feeling," said Millette's wife, Rose, 56. ``I'm worried we won't be able to."

Sitting in the living room of their home, Millette recalled his early days at Digital, when everything seemed secure, and the day he was hired at IBM, when it seemed all right again. Today, Millette says he feels lucky to have a job at all.

IBM laid off hundreds of workers in Vermont a few years ago, and has shed some manufacturing operations. Last year, for example, IBM sold its personal computer unit to Chinese computer maker Lenovo, which later cut 1,000 jobs.

IBM arrived in Essex Junction a half century ago, providing new hope to a community reeling from the shutdown of three textile mills. A job at IBM quickly came to mean good pay, expansive benefits, and lifetime employment.

In recent months, as Millette pulled into work in dusk of early morning, he was reminded how much things have changed. Stretched at the entrance of sprawling complex, a sign advertised for temporary manufacturing workers. Length of job: No more than three years.

``My father, he was in the generation where you worked for a company your whole life, and everything was taken care of," Millette said. ``But all the attitudes have changed. All the rules have changed."

In Campaign Ads For Democrats, Bush Is The Star (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

WASHINGTON, Sept. 16 — From Rhode Island to New Mexico, from Connecticut to Tennessee, President Bush is emerging as the marquee name in this fall's Congressional elections — courtesy not of his Republican Party but of the Democrats.

A review of dozens of campaign commercials finds that Mr. Bush has become the star of the Democrats' advertisement war this fall. He is pictured standing alone and next to Republican senators and members of Congress, his name intoned by ominous-sounding announcers. Republican candidates are damned in the advertisements by the number of times they have voted with Mr. Bush in Congress.

Not surprisingly, given that Mr. Bush's job approval rating continues to hover around 40 percent, it is hard to spot the president in any of the Republican advertisements that were reviewed. In what may be taken as an indication of changing Republican tastes, Senator John McCain of Arizona is popping up everywhere.

There is Mr. Bush on television screens in Colorado, in an advertisement urging the election of Angie Paccione, a Democrat, leaning over to plant a big kiss on the forehead of Representative Marilyn Musgrave, a Republican.

There is Mr. Bush on the television screens in New Mexico, standing on a stage shoulder-to-shoulder with Representative Heather A. Wilson, a Republican struggling to keep her seat. "Heather Wilson supports George Bush on the war in Iraq with no questions asked," the announcer says, in an advertisement for Patricia Madrid, the Democrat.

The White House has entered this campaign season looking to seize control of the political dialogue by moving the debate away from issues like Iraq and to Mr. Bush's role in the campaign against terrorism. The decision by Democrats to invest in advertising directly attacking the war in Iraq, the administration's war on terrorism and the once overwhelmingly popular president is a marked turn from how they handled these issues in 2002 and 2004.

The emergence of this recurrent theme in Democratic advertising is not a coordinated push by the legions of consultants, party leaders, campaign managers and candidates. Democrats said using advertisements involving Mr. Bush was almost an obvious thing to do, given his lack of popularity, and reflects the effort by many in the party to turn this election into a national referendum on Mr. Bush.

"In certain districts he's exactly who we want to pivot off," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat leading the effort to win the House. "I tell all the candidates: Him and his agenda are on the ballot this year."

Evan Tracey, chief operating officer of the Campaign Media Analysis Group, a firm based in Virginia that tracks advertising, said Saturday that candidates and independent issue groups had already spent $900 million on statewide and national campaigns this year. Mr. Tracey said he expected that by Election Day, the spending would be $1.6 billion, a new record. At a minimum, millions are being spent by the Democrats on ads featuring Mr. Bush.

The strategy has risks. In part, the goal of the Democrats' advertisements is to rile up their base. But Glen Bolger, a Republican pollster, said that the constant attacks on Mr. Bush appeared to be accomplishing something Republicans had been unable to do: riling up Republican base voters.

"One thing we are seeing in our polling is that the Democratic campaign is helping to jazz up Republican voters," Mr. Bolger said. "There are two concerns among Republicans: Is our base going to turn out, and how are we going to get out swing voters. The Democrats are taking care of our first concern."

Many Republicans, and some Democrats, say it will be hard for Democrats to win unless they go beyond attacking Republicans and offer a program of their own. And Ken Mehlman, the Republican national chairman, said the Republicans' own experience in politics suggested that running against someone who is not on the ballot is challenging. "The last time this kind of morph ad was tried was in '98 when we tried to nationalize the races against Clinton and it didn't work," he said.

Kenneth M. Goldstein, an associate professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin who studies campaign advertisements, said the focus by Democrats on Iraq and security was a sharp shift from what he had observed in the last two election cycles. Then, Mr. Bush was far more popular and public opinion on the war had not changed, but Mr. Goldstein argued that the Democrats still might have made a mistake in not trying to at least challenge Republicans on the war.

"If you're running a campaign, you try to engage on a subject or change the subject," Mr. Goldstein said. "The Democratic strategy in 2002 and 2004 was very much to change the subject."

This time around, Mr. Bush can be found in Democratic advertisements running in Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Arizona, Tennessee, New Jersey and other states.

In New Jersey, Senator Robert Menendez, a Democrat facing a tough election battle, strode along the New Jersey waterfront, attacking the president — rather than, say, the Republican he is running against this fall, Thomas H. Kean Jr. — as failing to improve security in the nation's ports.

"Five years after 9/11, President Bush still doesn't get it: homeland security starts here," Mr. Menendez says.

In Rhode Island, Sheldon Whitehouse, the Democratic challenger to Senator Lincoln Chafee, turns to a room of voters and says, "I want to make it absolutely clear that we need to effect a responsible deployment of our troops out of Iraq." In South Florida, Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr. is pictured between photographs of Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, under the words, "Shaw votes for the Bush/Cheney agenda 90 percent of the time." The announcer says that Mr. Shaw, who is facing a tough challenge from Ron Klein, is "refusing to question their handling of the war in Iraq."

Howard Wolfson, a Democratic consultant, produced a television advertisement for Kirsten Gillibrand, the Democratic challenger to Representative John E. Sweeney of New York, that opens with the image of Mr. Bush saying, "We are making good progress in Iraq."

"You wouldn't have done that two years ago," Mr. Wolfson said.

Republicans have responded with advertisements attacking Democrats for raising taxes and as being weak on national security. And they have invoked their own political totems: In Indiana, Republicans use a picture of Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader who would probably become the next speaker should Democrats take the House, in an advertisement attacking Brad Ellsworth, a Democratic sheriff running a very threatening challenge to Representative John Hostettler.

"Pelosi and other Democrats want to raise your taxes, cut and run in Iraq and give amnesty to illegal immigrants," the announcer says.

The Republicans have turned to images of Mr. McCain in ads, including one for Mr. Kean in New Jersey.

But for sheer star power, nothing matches a president, as Republicans certainly demonstrated in 2002 and 2004, when Mr. Bush was a constant presence in almost all the Republican campaigns. Mr. Bush's image this fall is being invoked by Democrats as a proxy for Americans who want change in Washington; who oppose the war in Iraq; who think Mr. Bush has not done enough to protect the nation from future terrorist attacks; or who are angry with changes Mr. Bush has pressed in Medicare.

"It's not just photos," said John Lapp, who runs the Democratic campaign committee's independent advertising program. "It's statements and actions and votes that show a pattern of people being with Bush."

Steve Murphy, a consultant whose firm made the Iraq advertisement for Ms. Madrid of New Mexico, said: "The war is a dominant issue. For all these Republican candidates who are going through gyrations to distance themselves from Bush — well, if they support Bush on the war, there is nothing more illustrative of the fact that they are in bed with Bush."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat leading his party's campaign to take back the Senate, said: "In 2004, people were still happy with Bush's course in Iraq. Now they are not."

That shows in terrorism, too. Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democratic candidate for Senate in Tennessee, walks through an airplane as he criticizes the administration's efforts in protecting the nation from terrorism, and mocks any suggestion that the White House deserves credit for the arrests in Britain of a ring of terror suspects accused of plotting to bomb airlines headed for the United States.

"Thank God the British stopped them," Mr. Ford says, adding: "Today our ports and borders remain vulnerable to terrorists."

Is The Incumbent Too Close To Bush? Or Not Close Enough? (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

In this television commercial, Patricia Madrid, a Democrat from New Mexico running for the House of Representatives, highlights a theme of her campaign: that her opponent, Representative Heather A. Wilson, a Republican, is too close to President Bush on Iraq and other issues.

THE SCRIPT "It's a simple choice. Heather Wilson voted for the Bush-Cheney energy plan. She voted for their Medicare plan that gives pharmaceutical companies $139 billion, instead of requiring Medicare to negotiate lower prescription drug prices. And Heather Wilson supports George Bush on the war in Iraq with no questions asked. If you agree, you should vote for Heather Wilson. But if you want change in Washington, Patricia Madrid for Congress."

ON THE SCREEN The spot opens with a picture of Ms. Madrid, the state attorney general, in what appears to be a courtroom. It then shows drilling operations and a pharmacy counter, with headlines that say "Elderly will have to pay for government's sellout'' and "Insurance, drug industries will benefit most from bill." When the commercial focuses on Iraq, it shows Ms. Wilson standing shoulder to shoulder with Mr. Bush.

ACCURACY In 2005, Ms. Wilson voted for an omnibus energy bill that followed the general outlines of Mr. Bush's energy program, emphasizing greater production of oil, gas and coal. In 2003, she voted with most Republicans for the bill that added a prescription drug benefit to Medicare. Republicans say the new Medicare program has been a boon to older Americans. Under the law, Medicare officials cannot negotiate prices with drug manufacturers. But Republicans say that private insurers have negotiated substantial discounts for Medicare beneficiaries who enroll in their prescription drug plans.

Ms. Wilson, a former Air Force officer, has generally supported the war in Iraq, saying Americans would be less safe if the United States abruptly pulled out its troops without completing the mission set by the Bush administration.

On the other hand, in recent months, she has displayed a large degree of independence on some issues. In February, she broke ranks with Mr. Bush and said she had "serious concerns" about the administration's wiretapping program. She has led House efforts to regulate the use of such surveillance, by imposing more restrictions than the White House wants. Ms. Wilson is chairwoman of a subcommittee of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence that monitors the National Security Agency, but she said she learned of the wiretapping program from news accounts in December.

In this advertisement, Representative Nancy L. Johnson, Republican of Connecticut, portrays her Democratic opponent, Chris Murphy, as weak on national security issues.

THE SCRIPT The narrator, speaking in urgent tones, says: "A call is placed from New York to a known terrorist in Pakistan. A terrorist plot may be unfolding. Should the government intercept that call or wait until the paperwork is filed? Nancy Johnson says: 'Act immediately. Lives may be at stake.' Liberal Chris Murphy says: 'No. Apply for a court warrant even if valuable time is lost.' Chris Murphy — wrong on security, wrong for America."

ON THE SCREEN The commercial creates the feel of a military or intelligence command center, full of high technology and grainy pictures with an eerie green tint. The spot begins with a satellite image of Earth and focuses in on North America. A yellow line arcs from the United States to Pakistan as the narrator describes the telephone call to a terrorist. When the narrator suggests that Mr. Murphy would delay electronic surveillance, words flash across the television screen: "Signal lost. Access denied. Data inaccessible due to regulation DD247/22Y. All further intel denied. Authorization code 7726C." A few seconds later the viewer sees a similar message: "Access denied. Court order required." The screen shows a blur of government paperwork, including a document from the Senate Judiciary Committee. The spot concludes with a picture of Mrs. Johnson, her right hand over her heart, and four veterans in the act of saluting. All look upward, as if to a flag in the distance.

ACCURACY Mrs. Johnson, a member of Congress since 1983, is best known for her work on Medicare and insurance issues. But this commercial underlines her contention that her top priority is to protect the nation against terrorist attacks and that electronic surveillance is needed to "protect American lives."

Mr. Murphy, a state senator, says the commercial misrepresents his position. He says he would not force the government to delay wiretaps on calls involving suspected terrorists, but would require officials to follow procedures set forth in existing law: the attorney general can authorize the emergency use of electronic surveillance if he seeks court authorization within 72 hours. Mr. Murphy maintains that the administration has flouted the requirements of current law, and in a statement this week he said, "Nancy Johnson's loyalty to President Bush is so strong that she supports him even when he breaks the law."

Candidate Agonistes And Iraq (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

The headline Thursday morning from Iraq read: "Nearly 100 Killed in Baghdad During 24 Brutal Hours." That's what faced embattled Republican Rep. Chris Shays of Connecticut -- along with a plate of lukewarm scrambled eggs and a tableful of reporters at a press breakfast sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor.

Shays waved away the breakfast plate, but he had a harder time dismissing his own doubts about what he terms "the noble mission" that brought the United States to Iraq.

By the end of an hour, it was clear to everyone that the war has reduced this 60-year-old, nine-term veteran of the House to a complete head case -- consumed by the convoluted efforts to square the circle of his own conflicting impulses.

Shays's symptoms are important, because he is no ordinary member of Congress. He has made 14 trips to Iraq in the past three years as chairman of a subcommittee on national security -- more, he says, than any other legislator.

He made news in August by saying that, as a longtime supporter of the war, he thought it was time to tell the Iraqi government that unless it acted promptly to unify the country, U.S. forces would have no choice but to withdraw.

What emerged at breakfast was a far more nuanced -- and tortured -- set of views and a self-absorbed soliloquy that may reveal what is going on inside the heads of other politicians less prone than Shays to treat a breakfast for reporters as a session on the psychiatrist's couch.

Shays brought a bundle of contradictions to the Iraq issue. A conscientious objector during the Vietnam War, he had to wrestle with his conscience and, he said, his religious faith as a Christian Scientist before he could support President George H.W. Bush's decision to use force to repel Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait.

But he had no qualms about the current president's decision to invade Iraq, because he believed Hussein had weapons of mass destruction. And even now he expresses scorn for those who say they regret their votes to authorize this war because the weapons were not there. "I would never back away from my vote," he said.

On the other hand . . . .

"The president has no credibility," Shays said, because of that intelligence blunder and because management of the war has been awful. Notable as he found the Iraqis' political achievement in writing and ratifying a constitution and electing a government in Baghdad, he said: "Since January, there has been no progress" toward reconciling Shiite-Sunni conflicts and transferring the responsibility for policing the country to the growing army of Iraqis.

Shays said he has become skeptical that the Shiite-dominated government on which the administration has placed its reliance will ever take the necessary steps -- unless the United States makes them a condition for its remaining.

On the other hand . . . .

It would be "immoral," Shays says, simply to set a date or a timetable for withdrawal, as Ned Lamont, who won the Democratic Senate nomination in Connecticut over Sen. Joseph Lieberman, has suggested. Rather, Shays said, withdrawal should be conditioned on the Iraqis reaching certain specified troop levels, after which every new Iraqi soldier or police officer would mean another American could come home, until only a residual force was left.

Shays's position now is almost identical to that of his Democratic challenger, Diane Farrell, who has continued to attack President Bush's policies and fault Shays and the Republican Congress for "lax oversight" of the war.

But Shays says that, unlike his critics, he believes fervently that the threat of Islamic terrorism is real and growing and that the president's second inaugural speech, calling for a worldwide offensive for democracy, represents a "historic" redefinition of American purpose.

Shays stopped off at Scotland Yard on his way home from Iraq last month, and what he learned from the British alarmed him: Al-Qaeda cells with technology more advanced than those arrested in August for planning to blow up airplanes on transatlantic flights are probably operating today. He is convinced that we will be attacked some day with chemical, biological and possibly nuclear weapons. He feels like a lonely Paul Revere, trying to warn people to take precautions.

But ultimately, he acknowledged, "my only concern is my own credibility." It is terribly important to Shays that his agonizing over Iraq not be confused with any worry about reelection. His race is very much in doubt, but he wants everyone to know that "if Iraq costs me election," it will not bother him. He just wants his constituents to know he cares.

O'Malley, Cardin Hope To Link Rivals To Bush (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And John Wagner, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Republicans Say Tactic Won't Work

The campaigns are for high political office in Maryland, but the Democratic candidates' toughest attacks are focused on a man from Texas: George W. Bush.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, who is challenging incumbent Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., calls his opponent "the George Bush Mini-Me of Maryland," and he has plastered the same photo on three recent campaign mailers. It shows Ehrlich and the president arm in arm.

Benjamin L. Cardin (D), the 10-term congressman from Baltimore who is taking on Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele in the race for an open U.S. Senate seat, mentions his opponent on the stump. But he saves a battery of attacks for Bush and urges voters to elect Cardin because "George Bush is leading this nation in the wrong direction."

The Democratic effort to nationalize the two high-profile Maryland campaigns is unmistakable, the latest sign that party leaders believe anger at the president might be the decisive emotion that drives voters to the polls in November.

Republicans, however, say it won't sell.

"They don't seem to realize that George Bush isn't running for Senate or governor in Maryland," said state GOP Chairman John Kane. "I think they're so lost for something to grab onto to move this state forward that this is all they can talk about."

Republicans aren't countering by embracing Bush, though -- Steele and Ehrlich skipped the president's recent Labor Day visit to Maryland. Instead, they have been running campaigns that never mention their party affiliation, casting themselves as party-neutral moderates.

In his ubiquitous first campaign ad, Steele tells viewers he'll "talk straight about what's wrong in both parties."

Ehrlich's campaign is more issue-oriented, but he also has used advertising to try to convey a centrist, party-neutral image. In his first commercial, supporters tell viewers: "He doesn't govern from the right. Or the left. But the center, where most of us are."

Parris N. Glendening (D), a former two-term Maryland governor, said the Steele and Ehrlich campaigns offer the best evidence that the Democrats are onto something.

"To me, the strongest sign that this strategy is going to work is in the way the Republicans are responding," Glendening said. "Look at them. They're running as fast as they can from their party."

Glendening said Maryland Democrats are following a road map that is being used in contests throughout the country. It's a strategy that mirrors the 1994 Republican plan, in which GOP candidates across the country sought to tar opponents by linking them to a then-unpopular President Bill Clinton, said Jim Jordan, a national Democratic strategist.

"Especially in a Democrat-dominated state like Maryland, where there's a thirst for change, it's smart politics to try to tap into that kind of passion," Jordan said.

Democrats received the same advice in a March strategy memo that advised linking Steele to Bush. The party followed suit, going so far as launching a Web site to highlight those ties.

A Washington Post poll in June found that the president had a 33 percent approval rating in the state and that 56 percent of voters would be less likely to support a candidate who they knew had Bush's support.

DOJ_NMG_0064765

Two months before Ehrlich was elected in November 2002, Bush was seen favorably by 56 percent and unfavorably by 29 percent of Maryland voters, according to a Gonzales/Arscott Research and Communications poll.

In appearances since winning the Democratic nomination Tuesday, Cardin has repeatedly linked Bush to Steele. At a Democratic rally Friday in Annapolis, Cardin said Bush should be held accountable for "blocking" stem cell research and shortchanging education funding.

Yesterday, at a rally in Baltimore, Cardin said Steele sounded like a Democrat when he made his acceptance speech as the Republican nominee.

"Isn't this the same Michael Steele that George Bush recruited to run for the United States Senate?" Cardin asked the crowd.

Bush has not been as central a focus of O'Malley's effort to unseat Ehrlich, but references to Bush have been sprinkled throughout his speeches, mailings and campaign commercials.

O'Malley speeches include a section about the federal government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina, widely considered a low point in Bush's presidency.

At a recent forum on disability issues, O'Malley invoked Bush's name more than a dozen times as Ehrlich stood on stage looking befuddled by the line of attack. O'Malley said that federal spending cuts were hampering state programs to aid the disabled.

"We need a governor who can stand up against the wrongheaded, mean-spirited . . . cuts being shoved down on the state . . . by the Bush administration and the Republican Congress," O'Malley said.

O'Malley has repeatedly said Bush and Ehrlich are "in lock step" and in an interview Friday gave several examples, including Ehrlich's refusal this year to fight a Bush administration plan to allow a company owned by the government of Dubai to manage the Port of Baltimore. O'Malley said Ehrlich and Bush oppose raising the minimum wage, oppose allowing reimportation of drugs from Canada and support tax cuts that have disproportionately benefited the wealthy.

"I think he tries to emulate George Bush in every way," O'Malley said.

Anthony G. Brown, the Prince George's County delegate who is O'Malley's running mate, repeated that line -- "in lock step" -- five times during an interview Friday. The campaign is trying to reinforce that idea, Brown said, because the governor is "trying to portray this image that he's in the center."

For the most part, Ehrlich shrugged off O'Malley's efforts to link him to Bush, as he did when asked about it by reporters last week.

"I can't wait for the next person he wants to demonize," said Ehrlich, suggesting that the focus of the race should be on their respective records.

"Obviously, I agree with the president on a lot of issues," Ehrlich said. "I disagree on some."

The most notable differences are stem cell research and abortion rights, both of which Ehrlich supports.

Hans Kaiser, head of the Annapolis office of the GOP polling firm Moore Information, said Ehrlich is right to shrug off efforts to nationalize the campaign.

"The problem with it is, governors are very different than the national figures," said Kaiser, who is not working on any Maryland races. "It may work to generate enthusiasm with the Democratic base, but the people in the middle, those are the folks who don't respond to that argument. And they're the ones who will determine the outcome of the race."

Ehrlich, Kaiser said, should continue running on his record.

Ads the governor is airing in the Washington market target voters from both parties by focusing on issues with broad appeal in Maryland -- boosting funding for education, providing state money for stem cell research and cleaning up Chesapeake Bay.

Ehrlich's television spots in Baltimore, meanwhile, have for weeks focused narrowly on the performance of Baltimore schools -- an issue as local as they come.

In recent candidate forums, Ehrlich stressed how successful his administration has been in getting "waivers" to allow the state additional discretion on how it spends federal dollars on state programs.

But in making his case, Ehrlich never mentioned the president by name.

What Would The Democrats Do? (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON

FOR Democrats in Congress and those hoping to join them, the troublesome war in Iraq presents both a significant political opportunity and an exquisite dilemma.

Some recent polls show that voters consider the war the most important issue facing the country today and are very uneasy about the way the Bush administration is handling it.

Yet the public appears evenly split on what to do about it. Half say the United States should keep its troops in Iraq and the other half want the soldiers brought home. Half support a firm timetable for withdrawal; the other half think that's a bad idea.

So what's a Democratic candidate for Congress to say about Iraq, beyond articulating a broad antiwar message? Should he or she present a detailed plan for extricating the country from the increasingly unpopular war? Offer support for a firm timetable for withdrawal but leave the start and end dates vague? Say that such decisions are best left to the generals on the ground? Or just keep pounding President Bush, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and the Republicans in Congress for starting a misbegotten war with no way out?

Democratic candidates around the country are trying each of these approaches in a cacophony of frustration and sorrow, reflecting divisions in the party at the national level. If it is hard to see a Democratic plan to end the war, it's because there isn't one.

"It's a dog's breakfast," said Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, which has done extensive polling on public attitudes toward the war. "The reason that Democrats aren't talking about specific plans to end the war is because it's hard to figure out what to say without alienating a broad swath of the electorate."

Among the Democrats trying to find the right message on Iraq is Eric Massa, a United States Naval Academy graduate who spent 24 years on active duty and then worked as a staff member in Congress. He is challenging a freshman Republican representative, John R. Kuhl Jr., for a seat in western New York State. Mr. Massa offers a thought-out critique of the Bush policy in Iraq, based on his years in uniform and his service as a senior NATO officer dealing with the civil warfare in Bosnia.

"We will never be successful in creating a Jeffersonian democracy in Iraq at the tip of a bayonet," he said. "That's a fool's errand. The longer we try it, the more dire the consequences."

He gave qualified support for a plan devised by Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, to create three semiautonomous regions in Iraq to keep the Kurds, the Shiites and the Sunnis from each others' throats. Mr. Biden's plan is one of the most detailed Democratic blueprints for ending American involvement and has been embraced by a number of Democratic House and Senate candidates.

But even a staunch antiwar candidate like Mr. Massa, backed by the liberal group MoveOn.org and Senator John Kerry, now one of the strongest antiwar voices in Congress, flinches from calling for an immediate withdrawal from Iraq.

"Even if we started today," Mr. Massa said, "it would take 6 to 18 months to make it happen. But if we don't start today, we will never withdraw."

Mr. Massa's opponent pounced, calling that position tantamount to surrender. "That's the old cut and run," Mr. Kuhl said. "I will not send up the white flag as my opponent says he will."

The Kuhl-Massa debate, if you can call it that, illuminates the difficulties at least some Democrats are having talking about Iraq. The more specific they are in proposing solutions to the impasse in Iraq, the more they open themselves to Republican charges of defeatism, or worse.

"Is the 'cutting and running' charge working?" asked Douglas Foyle, a professor of political science at Wesleyan University. "My sense is it's not working so far, but that's not to say that it won't work later. The public doesn't really like the way things are going, but it isn't yet ready to run away."

A Pew Research Center poll released last week found that Democratic candidates attract strong support among Democratic voters by advocating immediate withdrawal, but that position tends to repel independents. The safest position appears to be supporting a timetable for withdrawal, which independents favor by 35 to 20 percent.

Professor Foyle said the situation Democrats face today is in some ways reminiscent of the 1968 election, in which neither President Lyndon Johnson nor the Democratic nominee for president, Vice President Hubert Humphrey, could answer growing public restiveness about Vietnam.

"L.B.J. lamented that he would listen to anyone who had a plan that met American goals and got the troops out of Vietnam," Mr. Foyle said. "Nobody had one."

THAT gave Richard Nixon freedom to run on a vague antiwar platform, promising to achieve "peace with honor" without having to say how he would do it. Some parodied his position as Mr. Nixon's "secret plan." But as a political strategy it worked. He won the White House, while it was five years before American troops were out of Vietnam.

Some Democratic candidates believe it is enough for them to point out the problems with the Iraq war and ride the tide of dissatisfaction into office. Others feel some duty to offer an alternative.

James Webb, a former marine and secretary of the Navy who is challenging Senator George Allen, the Virginia Republican, said that Mr. Allen and his allies ridicule him for criticizing the American war effort without offering a concrete plan to salvage it.

"The political conundrum that the Republicans really like is that they want the Democrats to step forward and say here's the timetable so they can attack the timetable," Mr. Webb said in an interview last week. "But my question is, 'What is your plan?' You say, 'Stay the course.' What does that mean?"

For his part, Mr. Allen hews quite closely to the White House on Iraq, and attacks Mr. Webb for offering what he says is a hodgepodge of proposals that do not deal with the immediate security crisis on the ground. "Like the Democrats nationally, Jim Webb cannot present any kind of clear position about where to go from here," said Mr. Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams.

In New Mexico, Patricia Madrid, the Democratic attorney general, is trying to unseat Representative Heather Wilson, a Republican on the House Intelligence Committee. Ms. Wilson is an Air Force Academy graduate, a Rhodes Scholar and a former National Security Council staff member.

Ms. Madrid said that she entered the race specifically to challenge Representative Wilson on Iraq, saying she bore particular responsibility by failing to exercise oversight of intelligence agencies that produced inaccurate reports on Iraqi weapons programs. "With all her experience, she should have known better," Ms. Madrid said.

Ms. Madrid has demanded that the administration produce a plan to end American involvement within a year, but she does not feel compelled to offer a specific plan of her own. "My proposal is to get out as soon as possible," she said. "I'm not a general, but this plan could involve some sort of redeployment of our troops in the region."

Representative Wilson, while expressing some misgivings about the conduct of the war, hits back at the early exit idea, framing the debate as "a choice between resolve and retreat."

Senator Biden, a once and possibly future presidential candidate, said that the Democrats probably can make substantial gains in the House and the Senate simply by pointing out how badly things are going in Iraq. But he said that Democrats and the public would be better served by a detailed discussion about how to get out of Iraq without leaving chaos behind.

"Pulling our troops out might be a last-ditch requirement, but it's not a plan," Mr. Biden said. He said that his proposal for partitioning the county could form the basis for a lasting solution that allowed American forces to exit in a reasonable time.

Bruce W. Jentleson, a professor of public policy at Duke University and an official in the State Department's office of policy planning under President Bill Clinton, said it may be unrealistic for some candidates to be so specific. "Most Congressional candidates don't have the savvy or experience to present a detailed plan for Iraq," said Mr. Jentleson, who advised Al Gore in the 2000 campaign but who is not working with any candidates this year. "If they're asked one hard question past their talking points, they won't be able to answer it.

"Many of them think it's enough to run on negativity on the Bush policy. I'm not convinced that's true. That feeds the perception that Democrats know what they're against but not what they're for."

Save Yourself, Blame Bush (WP)

By Joe Scarborough

I can't help but feel sorry for my old Republican friends in Congress who are fighting for their political lives. After all, it must be tough explaining to voters at their local Baptist church's Keep Congress Conservative Day that it was their party that took a $155 billion surplus and turned it into a record-setting $400 billion deficit.

How exactly does one convince the teeming masses that Republicans deserve to stay in power despite botching a war, doubling the national debt, keeping company with Jack Abramoff, fumbling the response to Hurricane Katrina, expanding the government at record rates, raising cronyism to an art form, playing poker with Duke Cunningham, isolating America and repeatedly electing Tom DeLay as their House majority leader?

How does a God-fearing Reagan Republican explain all that away?

Easy. Blame George W. Bush.

Escaping political death by attacking an unpopular president is hardly new -- especially since most endangered politicians have the loyalty of a starving billy goat. But this is Dubya's Washington, where the White House has pushed around, bullied and betrayed GOP lawmakers for years.

Republican House members and senators always believed that this White House took them for granted. But after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, most of them had no choice but to sulk in their cloakrooms, listen to Debby Boone on their iPods and take it like a man. Bush was a rock star among the party faithful through the 2004 election, so crossing this popular commander in chief was not an option. That's not to say that Old Bulls didn't privately growl about how they were treated better when their old nemesis was still frolicking with an intern. So what if Bill Clinton misbehaved? At least that president found time to personally negotiate terms of subcommittee markups -- even if he was defiling the Oval Office at the same time.

But that kind of give-and-take between presidents and members of Congress ended once Clinton retired to Chappaqua. For the next five years, Republicans on the Hill would do little more than rubber-stamp Bush's domestic and international agenda because lawmakers were intimidated by his power and his popularity with the Republican base.

Even when the administration would not give generals the troops they needed to win the war in Iraq, Republican leaders did nothing. When the president refused to veto a single spending bill while the deficit spiraled upward, Republican leaders looked away. And when chaos was reigning in the streets of New Orleans and across the Gulf Coast in Katrina's horrific aftermath, Republican leaders remained mute.

That silence -- proof that it is better to be feared than loved in politics -- has had devastating results. The United States is more divided than ever, our leaders are despised around the world, our fiscal situation is catastrophic and congressional approval ratings are the lowest ever. Since nothing sharpens the mind like a political hanging, Republican leaders in the Senate and House are finally considering doing what effete newspaper editorialists have suggested for years: throwing Bush overboard.

Of course, the mere suggestion makes some Republican loyalists shudder. Being a faithful follower of Brother Bush has long been synonymous with loving Jesus, supporting the troops and taking a stand against sodomy. But no more. Many of the conservatives who put Ronald Reagan and Newt Gingrich in power are counting the days until Bush goes to Crawford for good. Some mutter that their leader's governing style looks more like Jimmy Carter's every day -- and among that crowd, there is no harsher insult.

I recently ran a segment on my MSNBC show asking whether Bush was an idiot. After the show, I actually received positive feedback from conservative friends, along with the predictable condemnation from White House staffers. The response was telling and suggested that attacking Bush from the right carries no political risk -- a useful pointer for House members facing tough campaigns.

If I were a GOP candidate this year, I would not call the president an idiot (he isn't). But I would spend the next 50 days of the campaign telling conservatives and liberals alike that even though I voted for this war once and this president twice, time has proved that Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld were wrong to think that the nation could win Iraq on the cheap. I would also look them in the eye and say that our president was wrong to believe that the United States could fight a war, cut taxes and increase federal spending, all at once. I would castigate my president for claiming to support homeland security while allowing our borders to remain wide open.

I suspect that voters of all persuasions would like that message. Independence is almost always rewarded at the polls. I learned this by accident while running for Congress in 1994, when the local, state and national Republican machines worked overtime to elect my opponent in the primary. I was considered too young, too inexperienced and too conservative.

But after winning 62 percent of the vote, I arrived in Washington an independent man. I criticized Clinton for vetoing welfare reform; I went after Gingrich for backing off spending cuts. Both times, my constituents roared with approval. The best part is that I was rewarded for saying what I believed -- another pointer for today's Republicans.

Using a midterm campaign to run away from your party's president is not unprecedented. In 1994, Democrats did it while GOP challengers were busy tying Clinton's political carcass around their necks. Some Southern Democrats were so desperate to run away from Clinton's tax increase and health care debacle that they in effect told White House operatives that any attempt to send Air Force One to their districts would be met with antiaircraft fire.

In the end, Democrats' efforts to save their majorities in the House and Senate were futile. Right-wing barbarians like me were elected because after two long years of political bumbling, voters were tired of Clinton. Unfortunately for endangered Republicans 12 years later, Clinton's poll numbers during that campaign were 15 percentage points higher than Bush's now. That suggests that the Democratic tidal wave this year will rival that of the Republicans in 1994.

But these Republicans have one advantage that Clinton's party lacked in 1994: Their opponents are Democrats. The Party of Pelosi. The party that is so tongue-tied on its best political issue that I still can't tell you where it stands on Iraq. Nor can they explain how they would balance the budget or stop Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

That failure to present an alternative vision is in stark contrast with Gingrich & Co., who spent 1994 drawing up a legislative package, a plan to balance the budget and enough position papers to strip an Amazon rain forest.

This year, maybe Democrats can beat something with nothing. As for Republicans, their only chance of survival is blasting the president for mistakes of the past and attacking the Democrats for their failings of the future.

Of course, you GOP candidates can be sure that such attacks will annoy Bush, even though your survival may be all that stands between him and a crazy Democratic chairman launching impeachment hearings. But if you win this fall only to face his stern rebuke next winter, just tell him it was schadenfreude for all the times the White House treated you badly. With any luck, Bush will think you are talking about that Berlin disco that Moammar Gaddafi bombed back in 1986 and then dismiss you like the worthless billy goat he always suspected you were.

What About George? (WP)

By Stuart Stevens

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

As far as organizing principles of life go, I've never found anything that beat the theory that all life imitates high school. It's pretty much foolproof and covers almost all of the universe's difficult questions, such as why scientific studies show 82 percent of all males want to punch Tucker Carlson when he wears a bow tie and why some political candidates react the way they do to a president's popularity.

Visualize, if you will, the president of the United States as the ultimate high school quarterback. When the team is winning and he's on a hot streak, all flock to him in the great cafeteria of life. But when the team is losing, suddenly there are a lot of empty seats at his lunch table and downcast eyes as he's passed in the hall. If you're that quarterback, you find out pretty quickly who your real friends are.

Most Democrats and the vast majority of what passes for the intelligentsia in this country simply don't understand the appeal of President Bush, much the way Republicans never got that Clinton guy. So now that the president's public approval numbers have fallen from historic highs, there seems to be great salivating at the notion that the country is finally getting what has been so obvious to them for so long and that a national day of reckoning is nigh.

This view of Bush transformed from Leader of the Free World into Election Jeremiah is so wrong that it should be laughable. Except that a lot of Republicans seem to believe it's true. They're certainly behaving that way on the campaign trail, acting as though they're sure that a spy camera photo of a candidate caught with the president will be a death sentence in November. And that's a problem -- not for the president but for the candidates and the GOP.

One of the dirty little secrets of politics is that presidential endorsements rarely have any positive impact. In 1986, Republicans went into the off-year elections believing that their strongest card was the popularity of President Ronald Reagan, especially in those red states. It seemed axiomatic to end the campaign by giving the ball to the Big Guy, and race after race closed with endorsement spots of Reagan doing what he did best, looking straight at the camera and suggesting that if you wanted to help him, you'd vote for Candidate X. And then most of those candidates proceeded to lose. In one tight race after another -- such as those involving GOP Sens. Mack Mattingly of Georgia, Jeremiah Denton of Alabama and Paula Hawkins of Florida -- candidates saw their numbers flatten when the Reagan endorsement aired, then spike downward to defeat. These were all states in which Reagan's numbers were through-the-roof positive, but voters seemed to say, "Thanks very much, Mr. President, it's nice that you're supporting a fellow Republican, but what does that have to do with me?"

The flip side of the marginal positive effect of a presidential endorsement is the limited negative impact that comes from being associated with a president of your own party, regardless of his popularity. It's hardly a secret that if you're a Republican candidate you happen to be in the same party as Bush. If there's a Republican candidate out there who thinks he or she can slip that little factoid past the electorate, well, good luck, and good riddance.

Candidates need to worry less about Bush and more about their own agendas. The truth is that there is ample reason to believe that the president is well-liked among voters who might consider voting Republican. But the nation is fighting a tough and nasty war and there's little joy in the day-to-day slog of winning that war. Which makes it just like every other war the nation has waged.

My advice to Republican candidates is that they first must come to grips with the rationale for their own election: Why me? Why now? If in their hearts they disagree with the Iraq war, they should call it like they see it, but without trying to nuance a response seven ways from Sunday in hopes of pleasing all sides. That's French for ending up like John Kerry. Elections are littered with losers who have a need to be loved by everyone.

But I'd also caution any GOP candidate: Remember that Bush is the dominant political figure of the day and, well, he is president and head of the Republican Party and you're not. He has a distinct worldview that places the United States in the lead in a war against Islamic fascism. Whether you believe he is destined to be remembered as one of America's great presidents, as I do, or you think we have adopted a disastrous course, trying to ignore the president is likely to be as successful as a Democrat trying to ignore FDR in 1936. Running for the House or Senate and not having a clear and articulated position on Iraq is a recipe for disaster.

The War on Terror is clearly the new Cold War, the key in which our politics is to be played for a very long time. As a human, it's permissible to be conflicted. As a politician, conflicted equals confused -- and that's a particularly unappealing position when men and women are dying. The problem for Democrats is that they really believe this War on Terror is worth winning, they just wish somebody else would do it.

That's the same mix of hand-wringing and handshaking that the Europeans engaged in while the Serbs set up rape camps a four-hour drive from Harry's Bar in Venice. It has the dubious virtue of being both understandable in motive and reprehensible in result.

The simple truth is that Republican candidates should be running basically the same race regardless of the president's poll numbers. Which is to say running their race. There is a rumbling out there that this may be a terrible year for Republicans, one of those tsunami elections like those in 1974 or 1994. And, who knows, the rumbling may be right. But if so, that will have less to do with the president's personal approval rating than the general mood of the country and the election agenda. If this year turns out to be a referendum on the Iraq war and the numbers on Iraq are negative, those in both parties who support the war are likely to suffer.

The president understands this perfectly well. He is not trying to change the subject from Iraq and the fight against terrorism, which may very well be the best way to pump up his job-approval numbers. What he's doing is the hard stuff of continuing to make the case for why the Iraq war is essential and explaining its role in a global and historical sense. Like the war itself, it's a long, tough haul but he's out there doing it day after day.

In the 2000 campaign, we made a commercial that opened with then-Gov. Bush looking at the camera and asking, "Why don't the hard things get done? Because they're hard." So now he's doing the hard things. If Republican candidates run from this rare display of leadership just because there are a lot of rough days, they most likely will lose.

GOP candidates should take their lead from the president -- take a stand and fight. As I often heard the late Lee Atwater say, "It's time to dig the ditch we're going to die in."

Words To Win By (WP)

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Dept. of Advice

An election that becomes a referendum only on the president's popularity or the success or failure of the war is a sure loser for Republicans. Remember: It is not your job to defend the president! He's a big boy. He and Dick Cheney have more than sufficient White House staff to defend them. But don't be critical of him. Most Republican voters still support the president even if they disagree with the war. Getting the base out is all-important and may be the difference between winning and losing.

-- Edward J. Rollins, Republican strategist and Reagan campaign manager

Republicans don't have to convince Cindy Sheehan that prevailing in Iraq is crucial to our national security, but they must and can persuade former hawks to support what has to be done in Iraq. President Bush's approval ratings are up following his own recent speeches on the war on terror and the ideological struggle we confront. Republican candidates should read them. Conservative voters face a choice in November and should be fearful of political leadership that diminishes the threat we face and lacks the resolve to confront it. Republican candidates should emphasize this. Fear is their friend.

-- Kate O'Beirne, Washington editor, National Review

Be proud of the party and be proud of the contrasts. Elections are about choices, so we must draw clear differences and reveal the Democratic candidates for the rogue extremists they truly are. Does their position on Iraq blow around like a tumbleweed? Do they support higher gas taxes? Is this candidate a prosecutor who plea-bargains with illegal aliens? The fact that these candidates would be tangibly harmful to the daily lives of most Americans will matter more than Democrats putting your picture next to the president's and saying "Supports Bush 92 percent of the time."

-- Dan Hazelwood, Republican strategist

Surprisingly, Bush's unpopularity can represent a strategic opportunity for House Republicans, especially conservatives. Here's why:

The administration has one large, unfinished domestic initiative left: Its big plan to legalize most illegal aliens, import millions of guest workers and increase total permanent immigration. The president believes strongly in more open immigration, and his plans are supported by most senators and by House Democrats. But they are strongly opposed by House Republicans -- and most American voters.

So here's a slogan for enforcement-first House Republicans: " Stop the Bush Amnesty Plan -- Vote GOP ."

-- David Frum, former Bush speechwriter

Unfortunately for the GOP, the nation is suffering from party-in-power fatigue. Unless given compelling reasons not to, the electorate will be inclined to give the other side a chance to govern. The toughest to convince that Republicans deserve more time may be true conservatives, those who believe that their party must reflect the ideals of Abraham Lincoln and Ronald Reagan. They worry that the Republican Senate has sold them out on immigration and that the party as a whole has "become what we defeated." We can still retain both houses come November, but we must first remind ourselves what we stand for.

-- Douglas MacKinnon, press secretary to former senator Robert J. Dole

Republicans running from the president on critical issues is a problem. If you run and cower from topics such as Iraq, the benefits of tax cuts and personal accounts for Social Security, the Democrats and the left will define your position for you. When you articulate the difference between the president and Democrats on taxes, immediate withdrawal from Iraq and Social Security, the voters respond that they are not interested in a tax hike, understand that it is not wise to arbitrarily withdraw from Iraq and want someone to seriously engage in fixing our collapsing retirement system.

-- Richard K. Armey, former House majority leader

Republican candidates should talk about the Democrats. The Democrats want to pull out of Iraq, shut down Guantanamo, open the nation's borders, abandon the Patriot Act and the NSA spying program and extend full constitutional protections to people like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the 9/11 attacks. We got critical information from Mohammed that helped us prevent future terror attacks by subjecting him to mild coercive techniques during questioning -- and the Democrats want to impeach the president for authorizing that! If this nation returns to the Democratic national security policy known in military circles as "unconditional surrender," two years of the Democrats could get us all killed.

-- Ann Coulter, GOP pundit

GOP candidates can't do much about the underlying problem: Republicans are in charge. It's hard to govern. Grievances accumulate, and you get no credit for successes. What's to be done?

The RNC can go on the air with a massive TV ad buy in October, introducing voters in key states and districts to the two Democratic congressional leaders -- the dour Harry Reid and the frenetic Nancy Pelosi. The message: When Harry Meets Nancy, and they're in charge, they'll raise your taxes and weaken our efforts in the war on terror. The Dems and media will respond, we'll have a taxes and terror debate -- and the Republicans might be okay.

-- William Kristol, editor, the Weekly Standard

Congressional Republicans should use the remaining days of this session to put Democrats on record on key national security votes. These votes and previous actions will reveal a political abyss between the two parties over how to protect America in an era of grave threats. At the same time, Republicans should embrace the current economic prosperity, brought about by the Bush/Republican tax cuts with little Democratic support, and point out that a Democrat-controlled Congress will allow popular pro-growth tax cuts to expire.

-- Scott W. Reed, 1996 Dole presidential campaign manager

The 212 Republican congressmen running for reelection won in these very districts in 2002, the year of Enron, when $7 trillion disappeared with the stock market drop and Iraq loomed. They won in 2004 when Bush limped across the finish line with 51 percent and Iraq was a boat anchor. No one was elected on Bush's coattails. Democrats who think they can win running against Bush and Iraq should remember GOP hopes in 1998. Iraq is Monica Lewinsky: tough on the president's poll numbers but not a reason to vote against your congressman.

Republicans should heed those who want the war on terror won without the abridgement of civil liberties. They should allow Korean War veteran John Warner, Vietnam POW John McCain and Gulf War military lawyer Lindsey Graham to speak for them, to show that they are not wholly taken by the imperial claims of an increasingly unpopular president.

If Republican candidates can demonstrate a lengthy record of accomplishment, they will survive the political wave. If voters see Republicans fighting for them, they'll win. If they see them fighting to keep their jobs, they won't. And if Republicans want to increase turnout, they need to be strong advocates for cutting wasteful Washington spending and against illegal immigration. Any weakness on either issue is political suicide.

Lead with solutions and ignore your critics. Let them fester in the corner mumbling about low approval ratings and ridiculing the president. It will underscore how bitter and disorganized they are without your saying it.

Preview life under the Democrats. Show a blank piece of paper and title it, "The Democratic Vision and Concrete Alternatives for a Better America."

Apologize to conservatives. Many in your own base are smarting over Iraq, federal spending and the lack of movement on immigration. Admit missteps and engage them, because if they stay home, it is trouble.

Don't Lose Like Me (WP)

By Joe Schwarz

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

I am the political equivalent of a woolly mammoth, a rarity heading for extinction. Yes, I'm a moderate.

Our plight today is dire. Even though more than half of all American voters consider themselves centrists, the Republican and Democratic parties are finding themselves controlled to an ever-greater extent by their more extreme elements. On the Republican side, the "religious right," the quasi-theocrats, are infiltrating the party power structure quite effectively. On the left, the moneyed Eastern establishment and California liberals shrilly tell Americans that the sky is falling, that the world hates us and that Republican policies are all wrong. Yet they offer no viable alternatives. As a result, they have managed to alienate much of the traditional working-class Democratic base, good people caught between Republicans they don't like and Democrats who have abandoned them. What's a moderate to do?

In my case, lose an election.

It wasn't President Bush who proved to be the kiss of death to my candidacy for a second term in the House. The president's poll numbers may not be very good in many places, but he's still well-liked in my neck of the woods -- south-central Michigan. So when I geared up to run again this year, I was pleased to have his endorsement. My loss had nothing to do with his popularity, or national issues such as the war in Iraq. What did me in was voter apathy, and moral absolutist groups supported by a vitriolic negative-ad campaign funded by organizations on the far right.

Michigan's 7th Congressional District borders on Indiana and Ohio, extending west to Battle Creek, east to Ann Arbor and north to Lansing. It's a real slice of Middle America. I was born and raised in Battle Creek. I've practiced medicine there for 32 years. My dad was a physician there, too. I was educated at the University of Michigan, and I'm chairman of the board of the alumni association of that great university. I bleed Maize and Blue. If ever there was a local, I'm it.

After 16 years in the Michigan Senate and service as mayor of Battle Creek, I was elected to Congress in 2004. But my moderate positions on Roe v. Wade (I do not support overturning it, believing that a woman has the right to choose) and embryonic stem cell research (I strongly support it), as well as my general feeling that religion and moral and ethical issues are private matters, did not sit well with those who would mix church and state in a way that is antithetical to the principles of separation on which our country was founded -- in other words, the hard right.

So in the Republican primary, the opposition got its vote out. The effort was funded, probably to the tune of $1 million or so, by the Club for Growth, a Washington outfit supported by plutocrats nationwide who apparently have nothing better to do with their money than give it to an organization that stands for nothing -- though it says it's "anti-tax" -- and likes to play in elections in which it has no logical interest.

I had a great campaign organization, willing volunteers and was well-funded. Key endorsements rolled in: from the Farm Bureau, police and fire organizations, teachers, medical groups, some unions, key GOP officeholders. My supporters thought I couldn't lose -- and as a result, I did. It was a classic example of a motivated minority -- just 7.8 percent of the Republican electorate districtwide -- nominating a congressional candidate. The moderates stayed home in droves, felt horrible the next day, and vowed never to miss another vote. They will. The hard right won't. And fewer and fewer sensible "let's take the broad view" candidates will have any chance of being elected.

But politics needs a middle. Communication across the aisle in Congress and in legislatures is the sine qua non of effective public policy formulation. The reluctance -- at times, the near-total unwillingness -- to consider the other side's position has hamstrung political bodies from coast to coast.

Moderates aren't organized, and because they straddle party lines, they may never be much of a cohesive group with the ability to move a policy agenda. But they must begin fighting back -- rationally always, gloves off if necessary. Congratulations to Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee, a moderate Republican from Rhode Island, for his primary victory last week. He did fight back, and effectively.

Somehow, some way, moderates must understand that they will go the way of the moa, the dodo and, appropriately, the woolly mammoth unless they learn to fight as hard for the policies of the sane and rational center as the far right and far left fight for the extremes.

Bush In A Bind With Southern Women, Poll Shows (HC/AP)

By Shannon Mccaffrey, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

Dwindling trust in president could bring down GOP gains in Congress

MACON, GA. — President Bush's once-solid relationship with Southern women is on the rocks.

"I think history will show him to be the worst president since Ulysses S. Grant," said Barbara Knight, a self-described Republican since birth and the mother of three. "He's been an embarrassment."

In the heart of Dixie, comparisons to Grant, a symbol of the Union, are the worst sort of insult, especially from a Macon woman who voted for Bush in 2000 but turned away in 2004.

In recent years, Southern women have been some of Bush's biggest fans, defying the traditional gender gap in which women have preferred Democrats to Republicans. Bush secured a second term due in large part to support from 54 percent of Southern female voters, while women nationally favored Democrat John Kerry, 51 percent to 48 percent.

"In 2004, you saw an utter collapse of the gender gap in the South," said Karen Kaufmann, a professor of government at the University of Maryland who has studied women's voting patterns. White Southern women liked Bush because "he spoke their religion, and he spoke their values."

Now, anger over the Iraq war and frustration with the country's direction have taken a toll on the president's popularity and stirred dissatisfaction with the Republican-held Congress.

Republicans on the ballot this November have reason to worry. An Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that three out of five Southern women plan to vote for a Democrat. With control of the Senate and House in the balance, such a seismic shift could have dire consequences for the GOP.

Democrats need to gain 15 seats in the House and six in the Senate to seize control.

In a sign of how crucial races in the South will be to the GOP national strategy, Bush recently traveled to Georgia to help former Rep. Max Burns raise money in his bid to unseat Democratic Rep. John Barrow. The president also gave a speech in Atlanta.

Knight lives in another congressional district considered competitive. Republicans hope to oust Democratic Rep. Jim Marshall, whose district was redrawn by the GOP-controlled Georgia Legislature to make it more conservative.

Voters like Knight could prove to be spoilers. The 66-year-old real estate agent doesn't particularly like Marshall, a hawkish Democrat and former Army Ranger, but she said she'll vote for him because she likes his conservative Republican opponent, former Rep. Mac Collins, even less.

"I'm going to go for the moderate, and these days that tends to be Democrats," Knight said.

Sandy Rubin, a high school teacher in Macon, voted for Bush and said she's also likely to vote for Marshall. Rubin said the GOP's focus on issues that appeal to social conservatives, such as gay marriage and abortion, have turned her off.

"I care about job security and education. The things I hear the Republicans emphasizing in their campaigns are not things that affect me or my family," said the 39-year-old mother of two.

The movement of some Southern women away from the Republican Party tracks with national poll results showing that women have become more disillusioned with the war and were more likely than men to list the conflict as the important issue facing the country.

"I'm a mother, and that makes me think differently about (Iraq)," Teresa Cranford, 39, also of Macon said.

Lynn Hamilton, 44, said she supports Bush even though her backing for the war has waned.

"As a mother you worry, 'Am I going to lose my baby boy?' " said the Gray, Ga., resident. "A mother's view about war is often going to be a lot different than dad's is."

Neither Cranford nor Hamilton has not decided how she plans to vote in the midterm elections, although neither ruled out voting for a Democrat.

Still, some Southern women remain supporters of the president and the GOP. At a watermelon festival in Chickamauga, in the mountains of northwest Georgia, substitute teacher Clydeen Tomanio said she remains committed to the party.

"There are some people, and I'm one of them, that believe George Bush was placed where he is by the Lord," Tomanio said. "I don't care how he governs, I will support him. I'm a Republican through and through."

GOP Detects Break In Gloom Over Congressional Elections (HC)

By Bennett Roth

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

9/11 anniversary sees rise in Bush's approval ratings

A bleak landscape for Republicans in the upcoming congressional elections appeared to brighten ever so slightly last week.

The president's aggressive campaign to emphasize terrorism and tie it to the conflict in Iraq has helped nudge upward his still-low approval ratings.

Experts say the ratings are an important gauge of how the president's party will fare in the congressional elections. The polls also showed a slight improvement in the public view of his handling of Iraq, an issue Democrats are hoping to use to make big gains.

The latest surveys also show a narrowing in the percentage of voters who in general favor Democrats over Republicans in the Nov. 7 elections, although Democrats still hold a lead of about 9 percentage points.

Thomas Mann, a congressional expert at the liberal-leaning Brookings Institution, said he is skeptical Republicans could sustain momentum generated by the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11.

"My view is it will be a one-week phenomenon," he said.

Senate Republicans also are breathing a sigh of relief that GOP Sen. Lincoln Chafee defeated his conservative challenger, Stephen Laffey, in the Rhode Island primary — despite the fact Chafee often votes against administration initiatives. Republicans think Chafee will be a stronger contender in the general election in the overwhelmingly Democratic state. However, polls still show Chafee running about even with Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse.

Both parties indicated they intend to dump substantial sums of money into key races in the final weeks.

The Democratic National Committee announced it would spend $12 million to get out the vote. For his part, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said he expects to spend $60 million on advertising and voter turnout. Mehlman told reporters he expected the party would lose seats in November but retain its majority in both chambers in part because of the party's strong grass-roots operations.

South Texas could hold key to the HouseA South Texas congressional district could be political ground zero this year in a scenario envisioned by some analysts if the Nov. 7 elections fail to result in a majority for either party in the House.

To break the tie, money and operatives from across the country likely would flood into the district now represented by GOP Rep. Henry Bonilla, who could face a runoff after the Nov. 7 elections.

Bonilla's district lines were altered after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled part of a Texas redistricting plan was unconstitutional. Bonilla, six Democrats and one independent are running in a district that is less Republican and more Hispanic than the previous one. There would be a runoff if none of the candidates receives more than 50 percent of the vote.

Larry Sabato, political science professor at the University of Virginia, said on his Web site that if that happened, GOP and Democratic House leaders would be "furiously brushing up on their Spanish, desperately seeking to avoid Davy Crockett's fate."

Local builder Perry bankrolling groupBob Perry, the Houston homebuilder and GOP donor who helped bankroll the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, which attacked John Kerry's military credentials during the 2004 presidential election, is back in the political fray as the top donor to a conservative group running ads against Democrats.

Perry gave $5 million to the Economic Freedom Fund, a California-based group, according to a Sept. 8 filing with the Federal Election Commission. The group is a so-called 527 entity, not subject to campaign finance limits. The fund, headed by Charles Bell Jr., general counsel to the California Republican Party, has spent $500,000 in TV ads against Democratic Reps. Jim Marshall of Georgia and Alan Mollohan of West Virginia.

Public Money May Not Be Enough In 2008 (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Those three dollars you've set aside in your tax returns as a good deed toward clean presidential elections? Forget about it. Nobody wants them anymore.

Strategists from both parties estimate the White House race in 2008 could cost each nominee $500 million — far more than the Presidential Election Campaign Fund can afford. As a result, this next presidential campaign could mark the first time in 30 years that the Democratic and Republican nominees turn down the fund's millions in both the primary and the general elections.

"The public financing system was a great system, but it's broke," said Steve Elmendorf, the deputy campaign manager for Democrat John Kerry when the Massachusetts senator ran in 2004.

"There's not enough money in it anymore. It's highly unlikely that any candidate in any party will stay in the public funding system," Elmendorf said.

The decision has precedent.

George W. Bush declined the public money in the 2000 GOP primaries, when he was a first-time candidate, and did so again in 2004, when he sought re-election. Democrats Howard Dean and John Kerry made the same choice in 2004.

Still, Bush and Kerry each accepted $74.5 million from the fund to run their general election campaigns. For 2008, the amount could reach $85 million per nominee.

If the major party candidates decline the general election funds in two years, they in effect would kill one of the chief post-Watergate overhauls in campaign law.

The fund, which is expected to have about $200 million by the end of 2007, still would help pay for party presidential nominating conventions and assist primary candidates who do not raise large amounts of money.

More than ever, the first cut in the presidential sweepstakes will not result from the early contests of 2008, but from candidates' ability to stockpile huge amounts of money the previous year. That means potential candidates will ramp up their fundraising far sooner than they ever have in the past.

"The 2008 presidential election is going to be the Wild West," said Michael Toner, the Republican chairman of the Federal Election Commission. "Upward of $500 million is the likely goal of presidential fundraising per candidate."

So far, the best test of potential candidates' fundraising is the political action committees they have formed to probe the political environment and seed the landscape with donations. That money cannot be transferred into their election accounts.

Of Republicans considering a run, the four whose PACs have raised the most money are Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Bill Frist of Tennessee, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

DOJ_NMG_0064777

At the top of the Democratic money list are former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner and Sens. Kerry, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Evan Bayh of Indiana and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Clinton stands out above the rest because as of Aug. 23, she also had $22 million in her Senate campaign fund. She can transfer this money directly into a presidential contest.

No one represents the crossroads of presidential ambition and campaign finance activism more than McCain. His name is synonymous with tough election laws that have banned parties from collecting unrestricted and unlimited amounts of money.

But McCain is among those prepared to forgo the public financing system in 2008, according to strategists working with him.

He caused a stir this summer when he did not sign on as one of the congressional supporters of legislation that would overhaul the system. The main proponents were his old allies on the campaign finance law — Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., and Reps. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., and Martin Meehan, D-Mass.

The measure would triple the amount available to candidates during state primaries and eliminate the state spending limits. It also would offer more money to candidates whose opponents chose to decline the money and raise more on their own.

In an interview, McCain said he supported the measure and said that if it passed he would live by the new rules.

"We're either going to upgrade it like it's envisioned in this legislation or nobody's going to take it, or very rarely will people take it," McCain said. But he added, "If you have to play by the rules as they are, that's very different."

Under current rules, no one can take the public money without agreeing to strict spending restrictions. Had Bush or Kerry accepted the money in 2004, they would have been limited to spending less than $45 million each in the primaries. Operating outside the system, Bush raised nearly $270 million and Kerry $235 million.

What's more, not everyone assigns $3 to the presidential campaign fund in tax returns. That has left periodic shortfalls in the fund, forcing the FEC and the Treasury to lower the initial payout to primary election candidates. In every case, the government has paid the full match after April 15 with the arrival of more tax revenue.

Campaign strategists and campaign finance analysts say they can imagine the new crop of presidential candidates concluding that the entire government handout is not worth the trouble.

"Anybody who takes federal funding will do so at their own peril because they will be dramatically outspent," said Tom Rath, a Republican National Committee member from New Hampshire

Rath, echoing others, believes the minimum that top tier candidates will have to have in hand at the end of 2007 will be "clearly north of $50 million."

Some people, such as the FEC's Toner, predict the number will be closer to $100 million. By comparison, Dean had $41 million at the end of 2003, double the amount Kerry had in hand.

Once the parties have their nominees, the candidates will have to decide whether to settle for the guaranteed total — estimated up to $85 million depending on inflation — or decline the money and raise more on their own. It seems inevitable, though, that if one party's nominee declines the money, the other will, too.

Under existing law, the party nominees get their general election money after their respective political conventions, typically held in August. Some strategists and analysts believe raising money for the general election will cut into valuable campaign time. And they say the public money should be more than enough for a 100-day contest.

"If you don't accept public money in the general there is a much greater chance that you will suffer from public criticism and reprobation because it'll look like you're just going to buy the election," said Don Fowler, chairman of the Democratic Party during Bill Clinton's 1996 re-election.

McCain, for one, said he has not made that decision yet. Kerry has told fundraisers he is prepared to raise his own general election money. He nearly came to that conclusion in 2004.

Elmendorf said the question Kerry faced in 2004 was whether he would be able to raise more than the $74.5 million available to him from the presidential campaign fund. "It was unknowable at the time," he said. "In hindsight, the answer was yes."

Clinton-Gore Could Take On New Meaning For 2008 (HC)

By Judy Holland

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

Former VP opens door to face-off with senator for Dems' nomination

WASHINGTON — Al Gore's statement that he wouldn't rule out running for president raises the possibility of a Democratic duel between the former vice president and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Gore, who steadily has dismissed questions about his plans for 2008, created a stir when he told reporters: "I haven't completely ruled out running for president again in the future, but I don't expect to."

That slight deviation from his past denials of presidential dreams has spurred speculation that Gore might suit up again for a presidential bid, leading Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., to enthuse that it would be "fabulous" if Clinton and Gore both ran for the Democratic presidential nomination.

"The two of them are very strong candidates," she said.

Gore, 58, who won the popular vote in the 2000 presidential election but lost the White House after a blizzard of ballot recounts in Florida and Supreme Court intervention, is on the lecture circuit to talk about global warming.

His best-selling book and documentary film, An Inconvenient Truth, in which global warming is described as the greatest crisis the world has ever faced, have opened up global speaking opportunities.

John Zogby, an independent pollster with Zogby International, sees "a battle royal shaping up."

"Frankly, this is Al Gore's year and it's Al Gore's turn and that's the thing — it's also Hillary's turn," Zogby says.

Gore is "in a very second tier after Hillary, who is in a league by herself," Zogby says. He says Clinton "really sucks the air out of the contest because she's new, she's a woman and she's Hillary — no last name needed."

On the other hand, Gore has "two aces in the hole," Zogby said. Unlike Clinton, he opposed the Iraq war from the start. And he is known as an expert on the environment.

Clinton, who was first lady for eight years while Gore was No. 2 to her husband, praises his work on global warming, calls his film "excellent."

But when asked about a Gore candidacy in 2008, Clinton laughs and curtly moves on, saying: "You'd have to talk to him about that."

Marshall Wittmann, a senior fellow with the Progressive Policy Institute, a Democratic policy group, says Gore is "clearly and certainly leaving the door open."

Wittmann says Gore is "probably reading up on what Richard Nixon's path out of the wilderness was," in 1968 after he spent several years out of public life.

While Nixon lightened his image by appearing on the comedy show Laugh-in, Gore put the nation in stitches appearing on Saturday Night Live, in a series of skits that included impersonations of Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., his own refusal to leave the Oval Office and being shot with a stun gun after a long kiss with his wife, Tipper.

Barack Obama: Could He Be Too Popular? (SLPD)

By Kevin McDermott, POST-DISPATCH SPRINGFIELD BUREAU

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 17, 2006

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

For a politician, is there such a thing as too much popularity?

If there's any cloud over U.S. Sen. Barack Obama's seemingly charmed political life, it may be that one.

With national political pundits now using words such as "messiah" in connection with the Chicago Democrat - and one former campaign opponent calling on him to run for president - some say he could ultimately be rising so fast and high in the American consciousness that he may end up with nowhere to go but down.

"It's a cliche, but it's true: The higher you go, the harder you fall," warned pollster Del Ali of Research 2000, which conducted a poll for the Post-Dispatch last month that showed Obama with an unheard-of 70 percent approval rating among Illinoisans.

One rule of thumb in politics is to keep expectations low so that any mistake the politician makes looks smaller while any accomplishment looks bigger. For Obama, sitting on a runaway train of gushing publicity, that kind of "expectation control" has become impossible.

"One of the obvious dangers is that no one's perfect," said Mike Lawrence, director of the Paul Simon Public Policy Institute at Southern Illinois University and a longtime Illinois political aide. "His mistakes could become magnified if the expectations are unreasonable."

Obama's staff is aware of that danger.

"I think, honestly, expectations became basically uncontrollable about 10 minutes after he finished his speech at the (2004 Democratic National) Convention," said Robert Gibbs, Obama's communications director. "I've had people say, 'You guys should really tamp things down,' but it's hard to do."

Newsweek hasn't helped. An essay published in the magazine last week described the reception that Obama received on his recent trip to Africa as "befitting a messiah."

"It is not too early to pronounce Barack Obama a political phenomenon unlike any previously seen on the American scene," the essay declares. It then, nonetheless, goes on to offer a previously seen example: John F. Kennedy.

Illinois Comptroller Daniel Hynes suggested last week that Obama could follow that path. In an unusual official statement on Thursday, Hynes pressed Obama to run for president in 2008, calling him "the person for these times."

"You and you alone can best put together the broadest possible coalition with the charisma and the excitement, as well as the substance, to win," Hynes wrote in an open letter to Obama, who beat Hynes in Illinois' 2004 Democratic U.S. Senate primary. Hynes' statement went on to vow to "impress upon (Obama) the breadth of support he has throughout the country."

Obama (whose office reiterated last week that he isn't running for president in 2008) hardly needs his own startling popularity impressed upon him. He has quipped about it himself, joking to reporters at a dinner in Washington in March, for example: "I want to thank you for all the generous advance coverage you've given me in anticipation of a successful career. When I actually do something, we'll let you know."

By most accounts, Obama has had a strong debut in the Senate in terms of legislative accomplishments. But the continuing demand for him to appear at political events across the nation clearly is out of proportion with any mere legislative agenda.

Pundits have offered various explanations for Obama's "rock star" phenomenon, from his multicultural background (immigrant Kenyan father, white Kansan mother) to his intellectual credentials (first black Harvard Law Review president, bestselling author) to his political style (optimistic and conciliatory). Obama did win a Grammy earlier this year for the spoken-word version of his autobiography, "Dreams From My Father."

The moment that lit the match was his speech to the 2004 Democratic National Convention in Boston, which caught the attention of the national media for its eloquent statement of Democratic principles. His subsequent huge win in the Senate race in Illinois - though clearly aided by a series of self-destructing opponents - was hailed as further proof that a major new figure had stepped onto the national political stage.

"One of the weirdest things I ever saw was on the day before he was sworn in" to his Senate seat, recalled Gibbs, amused, "and somebody asked him what his place in history is."

Lawrence, of the SIU institute, said one trap Obama would have to watch for was not to forget the Illinois voters who put him in office - and who (assuming he runs for a second term in 2010) will decide whether to keep him there.

"He doesn't get elected in Africa, he doesn't get elected in Iowa," said Lawrence. "He's in demand around the world, but he needs to make sure to stay close to the (voters of) Illinois."

Robert D. Novak: Obama For President? (UL)

By ROBERT D. NOVAK

DOJ_NMG_0064780

Union Leader, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON – Prominent Illinois Democrats are advising Sen. Barack Obama, now finishing his second year in the Senate, to consider making a run for the 2008 Presidential nomination.

One such Democratic stalwart is telling the 45-year-old Obama to run only if prospective front-runner Sen. Hillary Clinton does not. But others are advising the popular freshman senator to go for it even if Clinton is a candidate.

These boosters calculate that Obama, the son of a black father and a white mother, could break the Republican Presidential hold on the South by maximizing the African-American vote in states such as South Carolina, Georgia and Mississippi.

TAXES AND POLITICS

Rep. Tom Reynolds, the campaign manager in charge of keeping the Republican majority in the House, gave his approval to a bid by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas to force a tax bill through the September session of Congress.

Reynolds's opinion is given the highest weight, even more than Speaker Dennis Hastert's, in the current House Republican leadership meetings. These sessions have concentrated on what might help elect Republicans in November. Reynolds previously had been skeptical about the political value of a pre-election tax measure.

Thomas, in his typical style, has kept quiet on the details of what would be his final tax bill as he ends his congressional career. Not as usual, Thomas has been in contact with the Senate, indicating he means business.

KATHERINE'S WOES

Jim Dornan, one of the former managers of Rep. Katherine Harris's beleaguered Republican Senate candidacy in Florida, has told associates he was startled by how aggressively the FBI questioned him Sept. 6.

Dornan was interrogated for an hour and a half by federal agents as part of their inquiry into Harris's political contributions from defense contractor Mitchell Wade, who has pleaded guilty to bribery in another case. Dornan described the FBI as pressing him hard about Harris.

Dornan, a lobbyist and fund-raiser, is currently consulting for Rep. John Sweeney's re-election campaign in upstate New York. He left the Harris campaign last November.

DEMOCRATS AGAINST CHAFEE

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC), headed by Sen. Charles Schumer, made an unusual intervention in a Republican primary by financing negative telephone calls in an unsuccessful effort to block liberal Sen. Lincoln Chafee from renomination in Rhode Island.

The DSCC spent $14,300 for anti-Chafee calls last Saturday and another $11,700 on Monday, for a total of $26,000. Chafee's conservative challenger in the GOP primary, Cranston Mayor Stephen Laffey, was considered a sure loser in the general election if he were nominated.

Chafee was vigorously backed by the National Republican Senatorial Committee, the Republican National Committee and the White House. In comparison, the DSCC spent only $62 helping Sen. Joseph Lieberman's losing candidacy in the Connecticut Democratic primary.

BOWLING FOR REPUBLICANS

Republicans in Washington were urged to take time off work from 4 to 6 p.m. last Wednesday and go to the Lucky Strike Bowling Alley in an unusual fund-raiser for seven GOP House members in need of late campaign money.

The National Republican Congressional Committee called the event BOMP (Bowling for Our Majority Program). The beneficiaries were Reps. Steve Chabot of Ohio, Thelma Drake of Virginia, Jeff Fortenberry of Nebraska, J.D. Hayworth of Arizona, Marilyn Musgrave of Colorado, John Sweeney of New York and Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania.

The solicitation for BOMP asserted that the seven incumbents "all have a real need for additional resources in the last couple of months before the election," either because of a "well-funded" Democratic opponent or especially high local television costs.

Iraq Looms Large In Senate Race (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen, POST-DISPATCH WASHINGTON BUREAU
St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 17, 2006

Every which way they turn, Sen. Jim Talent and state Auditor Claire McCaskill face voters' unease and anger about the war in Iraq.

"There's no winning that," said Nell Cowden, 58, a retiree, as she waited in the buffet line last month at a Democratic dinner in Maryville featuring McCaskill. It doesn't make sense, she said, "to throw more money and lives" into the effort.

Talent says he frequently hears from voters who "want us to win and want us to win faster than we're winning. And they're frustrated that we're not doing that."

But Missourians looking for a dramatic new direction on Iraq from the two candidates competing for the U.S. Senate seat may not be happy with what either Talent or McCaskill has to say.

To be sure, Talent, the Republican incumbent, and McCaskill, his Democratic challenger, have sharply different positions on the best course forward in Iraq, as well as whether it was a good idea to strike in the first place. Indeed, Iraq may be the strongest point of disagreement on a broad range of foreign policy questions.

Talent was among the staunchest proponents of the war and remains unwavering, like many other Republicans, in his belief that setting any timetable for withdrawal would be a terrible mistake. He voted against two recent Democratic resolutions, one calling for the start of U.S. troop withdrawal this year and another calling for nearly all U.S. troops to be out of Iraq by July 31 next year.

Despite spiraling violence and a mounting death toll in Iraq, Talent says the United States is making progress and must stick it out. He sees positive developments in the election of an Iraqi government and other steps.

"We don't need complete peace in Iraq" before U.S. troops can leave, said Talent, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, which oversees the Pentagon. "We need a fundamental level of stability that the government can maintain on its own. And we are making progress towards that."

Any early withdrawal, he said, would be "a signal to our enemies that if they can fight on long enough, that eventually we'll leave. It will just encourage them."

McCaskill says the war was a mistake and is now a quagmire that has compromised America's strength and bred terrorism in new corners of the world. But she has not bowed to the most fiery anti-war wing of her party - voters like Cowden who say "bring the troops home tomorrow" - or even to some Democratic senators who have called for withdrawing all U.S. troops by the middle of next year.

McCaskill advocates a two-year phased pullout, to begin this year, with American troops eventually replaced by a multinational force - time enough, she says, to allow the Iraqi government to achieve stability.

"We have become a crutch in terms of (the Iraqis) moving forward," McCaskill said. "As long as they can rely on American lives and American resources, it allows them the luxury of not getting to work and figuring out how they can live together. . . . We are never going to build democracy at the barrel of a gun."

Asked about Talent's charge that setting a date for withdrawal will bolster the insurgents and spark chaos once American troops leave, McCaskill said: "It's complete and total chaos now. I don't think our presence now is contributing to a political solution, and it may even be a hindrance. . . . I'm not sure anyone understands what our mission is now in Iraq."

No easy solution

Talent and McCaskill both acknowledge problems with their positions.

Talent concedes that he underestimated how long it would take U.S. troops to establish security in central Iraq. And he said his hope earlier this summer that the United States would be able to withdraw troops this year has been proved wrong by the relentless sectarian flare-ups. But he still believes the war's broader goal - to foster democracy in other places like Iran and Syria - is viable.

"Part of winning this is defeating the terrorists' view of Islam," he said. "We need to be part of a partnership that's showing this part of the world that democracy will work here."

McCaskill acknowledges that putting together a multinational force to replace U.S. troops in Iraq would be a hard sell, at best, given the continued violence and the strong anti-war sentiments around the world. "It is incredibly difficult now, because of what this administration has done," McCaskill said. "We need to get to work" to rebuild alliances, she added, particularly with moderate Arab nations.

Far from fostering democracy in the Middle East, McCaskill said, the Iraq war has increased terrorism and emboldened rogue regimes like Iran and North Korea. "They know that we are weakened by our tunnel vision in Iraq," she said.

McCaskill has also blasted Iraq war spending, saying that no-bid contracts and other favoritism have cost U.S. taxpayers billions of dollars. She has called for a new "Truman Commission" to expose "war profiteering."

"It is time for a reckoning, a time for real oversight and true accountability," McCaskill said in a speech in May unveiling the plan.

Talent said Congress "constantly needs to make sure the money is being spent wisely" but that there is no need for a new commission.

"We've got all kinds of oversight committees" both in Congress and at the Pentagon, he said. "I've sat through hours and hours and hours of hearings on all kinds of issues, from Abu Ghraib to the (Boeing) tanker lease deal."

Lieberman Pleads For Unity Against `Barbarians' (HARTC)

By Mark Pazniokas, Courant Staff Writer

The Hartford Courant, September 17, 2006

FAIRFIELD -- Using apocalyptic imagery of civilization lost, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman blamed politics Friday for undermining the war on terror and leaving the U.S. vulnerable to "barbarians at our gates."

The U.S. faces a patient and ruthless enemy in Islamic extremists, an enemy that "threatens not just America, but all of civilization," Lieberman said in a national security speech at Fairfield University.

"We remain too divided as a nation, and in Washington, spend too much time fighting each other rather than coming together to make our country safer," Lieberman said. "At stake is the kind of world we will live in, not far away abroad but right here, home in Connecticut."

His 25-minute address repeatedly called for bipartisanship in Washington, reinforcing the central theme of his re-election campaign as an independent since losing the Democratic primary in August to his main rival, Ned Lamont.

He was introduced by Mary Fetchet of New Canaan, whose son, Brad, was lost in the 2001 attack on the World Trade Center. Fetchet helped lead the relatives of victims in lobbying Congress for the creation of the 9/11 commission supported by Lieberman.

Lieberman faulted the Bush administration for alienating potential allies in the war on terror, though he gave no examples of an administration miscue. He never mentioned the war in Iraq, a topic he intends to address with another policy speech.

The senator blamed the terror attacks of 9/11 on a generation of leaders lulled into complacency as tensions eased with the Soviet Union.

A string of Islamic assaults on American interests, beginning with the takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Iran in 1979, should have served notice that the U.S. faced a new and dangerous world even after the close of the Cold War in 1989, Lieberman said.

"But as a nation, we remained asleep, unwilling to see the gathering storm," Lieberman said.

While criticizing Bush, he effectively buttressed comments the president made Friday that the world remains a dangerous place.

"We cannot ever again let down our guard or allow ourselves to go into denial," Lieberman said. "We must stay alert and engage in this war against the barbarians, because that is what they are - modern barbarians at our gates. Our enemies are patient and purposeful. They are ruthless. They are lethal."

DOJ_NMG_0064783

His line about barbarians was one of Lieberman's many departures from a six-page text that was copied and distributed to reporters minutes before the speech at Fairfield's school of business.

Lieberman said Islamic terrorists are a threat to Americans of all races and creeds.

"They hate us all because we are Americans. And yet, we remain divided among ourselves in responding to them," he said. "It's really outrageous that that continues to be the case. We have got to move forward together."

He faulted some on the right for implying that Democrats do not care if terrorists succeed and some on the left for going "beyond dissent to demonize the president" and impugn the motives of those who support him.

Lieberman said Congress and the president must work in a bipartisan fashion. Sprinkled through his speech was praise for Republican senators with whom he has worked cooperatively: Susan Collins of Maine, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, John McCain of Arizona, and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania. He singled out no Democrat.

The senior Democrat on the Senate Homeland Security Committee, Lieberman also touted a port security bill the panel endorsed this week on a vote that crossed party lines.

"When we work together across party lines in Washington, when we put principles ahead of politics, the national interest ahead of our parties' interest, we have made progress in making America safer," he said.

Liz Dupont-Diehl, Lamont's press secretary, said Lieberman tried Friday to criticize Bush, yet he used the same fear tactics as the president.

"Sen. Lieberman's Houdini-esque contortions today, an effort to make believe that he is above the fray, will not fool Connecticut voters," she said.

The Lamont campaign said Lieberman's rhetoric is belied by his missed votes as a committee member on homeland security funding.

"He skipped all of these votes after issuing at least 8 press releases claiming he was outraged at President Bush's inadequate budget proposals," the Lamont campaign said in a written statement.

Lieberman, 64, a three-term incumbent, faces a five-way race for re-election, though polls show Lamont is his main rival. The field also includes Republican Alan Schlesinger, Ralph A. Ferrucci of the Green Party and Timothy A. Knibbs of the Concerned Citizens.

Lamont, 52, a cable-television entrepreneur, delivered his own national security speech Wednesday at Yale University, accusing Lieberman of breaking faith with a half-century of U.S. foreign policy by backing Bush's pre-emptive invasion of Iraq.

On Friday, Lamont stood at the Legislative Office Building in Hartford with Democratic gubernatorial candidate John DeStefano Jr. to blame Lieberman and Republican Gov. M. Jodi Rell for failing to lobby for legislation that would have targeted homeland security funds to urban areas, which could have brought federal aid for security to the ports of Bridgeport, New Haven and New London.

Lieberman missed a Senate floor vote on the legislation, which then failed on a tie vote. "Sen. Lieberman's vote would have made the difference, and Sen. Lieberman wasn't there to cast that vote," Lamont said.

Tammy Sun, Lieberman's campaign press secretary, said the senator was touring the Sikorsky Aircraft plant in Connecticut on the day of the vote, discussing how to secure more business for the helicopter maker.

Rich Harris, a spokesman for the Rell campaign, said the governor did object "vehemently" to the funding cuts.

Lieberman Stresses Dire Threat Of Terrorism (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

FAIRFIELD, Conn., Sept. 15 — Under attack for his support of the war in Iraq, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman gave a 25-minute national security speech Friday without ever mentioning that conflict, instead arguing that the broad threat of international terrorism demands a continued aggressive stance. He said Osama bin Laden was “free and fomenting hatred against the United States.”

DOJ_NMG_0064784

"We must stay alert and engage in this war against the barbarians, because that is what they are: modern barbarians at our gates," Mr. Lieberman said before an audience of about 200 here at Fairfield University. "Our enemies are patient and purposeful. They are ruthless. They are lethal."

It was Mr. Lieberman's first major speech since he was defeated in the Democratic primary last month, and aides said it was intended to be a policy update rather than a political statement. A Democrat now running as an independent, Mr. Lieberman criticized both major parties, highlighting his odd political position now.

"It is wrong for some on the right to imply that some Democrats don't care if the terrorists succeed, or that debating the merits of the president's policies on the war on terrorism emboldens our enemies," Mr. Lieberman said.

That kind of attack on people's motives "divides and weakens us as a nation," he said.

But Mr. Lieberman, who is trying to strike a careful balance as he seeks Republican and unaffiliated votes in November, also criticized some of the president's detractors.

"It is wrong for some on the left who go beyond dissent and demonize the president and impugn the motives of all those who support him," Mr. Lieberman said. "Like it or not, we are in this war against terror, and we are in it together."

That brought a response from Ned Lamont, the Democratic candidate for Senate, who suggested earlier in the week in his own foreign policy speech that the United States should refocus its anti-terror efforts on Afghanistan.

"I don't think anybody's demonizing anything," Mr. Lamont told reporters at a news conference in Hartford. "I think we're talking about the fact that this country's not on the right course in Iraq, and we're having a good, honest debate about what that course ought to be."

Mr. Lieberman, whose support for President Bush's efforts in Iraq was the core of Mr. Lamont's case in the Democratic primary, also made sure to chastise the White House. He said the administration had formed important alliances but also "alienated too many potential friends who could help lighten America's burden in this fight against our common enemy."

It is "an enemy that threatens not just America but all of civilization, or all of the civilized world," he added.

After the speech, members of the audience challenged Mr. Lieberman's Democratic credentials.

John Orman, a Fairfield University professor who considered a bid against Mr. Lieberman before Mr. Lamont entered the race, was the first in line. He asked the senator why he did not talk about Iraq.

Mr. Lieberman smiled and said he planned to make a speech on the war by the end of the month, and that he feared he "wouldn't do justice to either" subject if he combined them.

"I wanted to focus on homeland security in this speech," he said, adding that he believed the United States did the right thing in going into Iraq.

Mr. Lieberman said the Bush administration had made several mistakes after Saddam Hussein was overthrown but that Iraq had become a front in the "war on terrorism."

"I have no doubt that we will defeat the terrorists who started this war against us," Mr. Lieberman said in his speech. "That's not in question in my mind. It will not happen overnight, but I am confident we will ultimately prevail."

Suggesting that the United States had ignored threats after the cold war, Mr. Lieberman said that in the 1990's a "dangerous enemy began to take root in the backwaters of the Islamic world."

Citing the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, the 2000 attack on the destroyer Cole and the Iranian hostage crisis of 1979, he said, "As a nation, we remained asleep, unwilling to see the gathering storm."

Mr. Lieberman added that the American public had grown weary of war after World War II, Korea and Vietnam and had become complacent.

"We don't have the luxury of that ever again," he said. "We cannot ever again let down our guard."

New Jersey Is As Democratic As It Gets. For One Democrat, That's A Problem. (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

Newark

DOJ_NMG_0064785

IT'S possible, but not easy, to find a more dismal way to spend a morning than slogging through Newark in a downpour to witness the guilty plea of yet another disgraced New Jersey politician. Friday it was John A. Lynch Jr., the former State Senate president and Democratic power broker, who pleaded guilty to corruption charges that could lead to a prison term of as much as 41 months.

But bit by bit, a far drearier and not entirely unrelated picture, at once far-fetched and somehow perversely credible, is beginning to take form in the fevered brains of Democrats in Washington.

It goes like this: Riding a tide of anger against the war in Iraq, they manage to take away six Republican Senate seats in places like Missouri, Tennessee and Ohio to take back the Senate. And then, oops, they find they've lost an unlosable seat in New Jersey to render the whole thing moot.

"Believe me, there are Democrats who are having that nightmare already," said Jennifer E. Duffy, with the Cook Political Report, a nonpartisan newsletter in Washington. "And if it happens, there will be people leaping from tall buildings. What's staggering to us is it's still a viable option for a Republican to win this year in a blue state like New Jersey. I promise you I never thought I'd be talking about New Jersey after Labor Day."

In fact, the Cook Report, like all the major political newsletters, is now calling the race between State Senator Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican, and Senator Robert Menendez, the Democrat, a toss-up. And, whether or not control of the Senate ends up hinging on the answer, it's clear that this is yet another toxic soufflé of New Jersey politics that will revolve around this question: Who seems scarier — the Republicans in Washington or the Democrats in New Jersey?

This, of course, was not supposed to be the story line in a year when the Democrats are poised to make major gains, even if winning the House still remains a challenge and taking back the Senate a major long shot. But the longer that polls show the New Jersey race in a dead heat, the more people wonder just what script gets written in the end.

The betting for most is still that things eventually revert to form. New Jersey has not elected a Republican to the Senate since Clifford Case 34 years ago. Polls show the Iraq war wildly unpopular in New Jersey and President Bush getting a favorable approval rating from about a third of state voters. And in tough races, the Democrats almost always manage to turn out big enough numbers in North Jersey cities to push the sick and frail over the finish line.

"A month ago I said Menendez would win by between seven and 10 points, and I'm getting teased about it," said David Rebovich, director of the Institute for New Jersey Politics at Rider University. "I still think a Democrat has to be favored, but we're looking at a much tighter race."

And somewhere in the reptile brain of voters, where gut rules, there are plenty of reasons to hedge one's bets. Many voters may still not know that the Kean who is running is not the former governor but his 38-year-old son. And they might not care. In America, where nothing beats a good brand, we elect Kennedys and Bushes and Cuomos and Keans, and there's always room for a fresh product line.

Voters might not approve of President Bush or his war, but as Mr. Lynch's plea yesterday shows, New Jersey Democrats never run out of reasons to give voters pause. Maybe you could dream up a worse election-season front page for New Jersey Democrats than Friday's Star-Ledger, but it wouldn't be easy. Splashed across the top was the Lynch story. Dominating the rest of the page was another headlined "McGreevey 'In Love' From the First Kiss."

And for all the Democrats' advantage in money and base, this race remains full of questions. With almost no really competitive races for Democratic congressmen, can they guarantee the urban turnout they need? In a state where a Hispanic candidate has never been elected statewide, what role will Mr. Menendez's ethnicity have both on white suburban voters and on black urban ones?

And if ethics is a major issue and an aggressive Republican United States attorney keeps it that way, can Mr. Menendez convince voters he's clean and the election is about Iraq and control of the Senate, not Hudson County and New Jersey politics?

So we'll see what race wins out. If it's about Washington, Mr. Menendez almost surely wins. If it's about New Jersey, the Democrats have reason to be nervous.

Marriage Vote Seen As Lifeline For Allen (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

DOJ_NMG_0064786

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

Virginia's constitutional amendment on marriage will attract conservative voters who otherwise would have stayed home in frustration with national Republicans, grass-roots activists say.

The bump in turnout in November likely will benefit U.S. Sen. George Allen, a Republican who until recently appeared a lock for re-election and poised for a 2008 White House bid.

"Marriage amendments do drive turnout," said Victoria Cobb, executive director of Virginia's Family Foundation.

Mrs. Cobb said ballot questions defining traditional marriage in more than a dozen states in 2004 helped secure President Bush's re-election.

"People came out to support it who would not have come out otherwise," she said.

Mr. Allen favors amending the state constitution, but his challenger, Democrat James H. Webb Jr., opposes the constitutional change as broad and discriminatory.

Democrats say Republicans should not be so confident that the measure will pass with a large margin. They say its placement on the ballot -- once considered a gift from Republican state legislators so Mr. Allen could get a landslide win -- is stirring opposition in the more liberal areas of the state.

A recent Mason-Dixon poll showed the amendment winning but losing support.

"It worked in other states, but what was thought to be an asset to Senator Allen no longer will be a benefit," said Delegate Brian J. Moran of Alexandria, who leads the state Democratic House Caucus.

Mr. Moran said Democrats can link the amendment to Mr. Allen's highly publicized use of the word "macaca" last month to address a 20-year-old Webb volunteer who was videotaping his campaign stops.

Mr. Allen, who made the crack at a rally in Southwest Virginia, apologized within days to the Webb worker, S.R. Sidarth, who is of Indian descent. The senator has apologized repeatedly in front of other audiences.

"You'll see a lot of people connect the dots between discrimination and macaca," Mr. Moran said. "This is the politics of division, and there is a relationship between the two."

Pollsters agree the remark damaged Mr. Allen's re-election bid, eroding a double-digit lead. He and Mr. Webb are nearly tied in several polls.

The Allen-Webb race attracted national attention, and the candidates were set to meet this morning in a debate on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The outcome of the race could decide control of the Senate if Democrats win enough seats elsewhere.

Though Mr. Allen has the advantage in fundraising and name recognition, the momentum is held by the Democrats and Mr. Webb, a former Republican secretary of the Navy under President Reagan.

Activists familiar with the grass-roots efforts of both parties in Virginia say the Democrats have the organizational advantage and can build on the successes of the current governor and his predecessor, both Democrats.

"I'm getting the largest turnouts at my rallies since I had in 1992 when [Bill] Clinton was running for president," said Rep. Rick Boucher, a Democrat from Southwest Virginia, a traditionally Republican region.

Dan Drummond, chairman of the Fairfax City Democratic Committee, agreed, saying that "grass-roots is going to win this campaign."

Some Republicans predict that a large turnout will not be enough to save Mr. Allen from conservatives irritated about immigration policy and other voters angry at President Bush over the war in Iraq.

"There is a growing frustration that maybe it's time for a change, maybe it is time for the Republicans to lose some power," said Brag Bowling, a commander in Virginia's Sons of Confederate Veterans and, until recently, a loyal Allen supporter. "They can't wage a winning war, they can't balance our budget, they can't protect our borders."

Mr. Bowling also said Mr. Allen insulted his Southern heritage when he said at a conference of historically black colleges and universities that he has come to understand that the Confederate flag is a symbol of hate and intolerance for blacks and regrets once having displayed it.

A Bad Amendment (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0064787

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Even if you oppose gay marriage, Virginia's ban would go too far.

SINCE 1998, 20 states have adopted constitutional amendments banning gay marriage. But not all of them have been drafted so expansively, and so carelessly, as the measure that will appear on Virginia's ballot in November, which would recognize no "union, partnership or other legal status to which is assigned the rights, benefits, obligations, qualities or effects of marriage." The amendment is muddle-headed and absurdly broad, duplicates what is already in state law and carries the germ of a thousand unintended consequences. Virginia voters should reject it.

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) opposes gay marriage, but he shares with its defenders the concern that the wording of Virginia's amendment could imperil the rights of individuals to enter into private contracts or employers to extend benefits such as health care coverage to unmarried couples. Plenty of the state's most prominent employers might face a more vexing recruiting environment if the amendment is approved.

The governor seems prepared to spend some political capital opposing the amendment but not too much; his aides say not to expect a full-court press. He has recognized from the outset that the amendment can be construed not only as banning same-sex marriages and civil unions but also as putting thousands of unmarried couples at risk of losing a host of benefits. But he is loath to hit the hustings in an all-out effort to defeat the measure, which will appear on the statewide ballot Nov. 7.

We believe that all such measures enshrine intolerance and may have cruel and discriminatory effects. Around the country, there are encouraging signs that voters and legislatures in some states that have not already adopted such amendments are balking at jumping on the bandwagon. The tide that has carried these proposals may be receding somewhat, which may be one reason for Mr. Kaine's ambivalence. He has said he would support a narrowly drawn amendment that defines marriage as the union of a man and a woman, as a number of states have done.

Like any politician, Mr. Kaine is entitled to pick his battles, and there's no doubt that this one would be an uphill struggle. He would have to tackle the reality of a majority of Virginians who start out opposed to gay marriage, as well as that of the state's attorney general, Robert F. McDonnell (R), who backs the measure and dismisses the idea that it is legally problematic. But the stakes, as the governor himself has defined them, are high. Defeating the amendment is a fight worth fighting wholeheartedly.

Paid Bloggers Stoke Senate Battle In Va. (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Campaigns Test Limits of Finance Laws

RICHMOND -- Virginia's U.S. Senate race has catapulted bloggers into the middle of electioneering and controversy as campaign supporters use their online forums to connect with voters, raise money and spread gossip.

Liberal bloggers -- two of whom are on the payroll of Democratic challenger James Webb -- fanned the flames last month after Sen. George Allen aimed a derogatory remark at a young Webb volunteer. That hype has helped Webb close a double-digit Allen lead in public polls and was a blow to the Republican senator's possible presidential bid in 2008.

The lack of an effective response from conservative bloggers has prompted Allen to hire a Virginia blogger as his "new media coordinator" to goose GOP supporters into action. And four of Virginia's most popular conservative bloggers launched http://www.allens-a-team.com last week to counter what they call liberal attacks.

Together, the Webb and Allen campaigns are transforming the image of the independent blogger, clicking away on his own dime from his basement. And they are pushing the boundaries of federal campaign finance laws as blogs that once were personal diaries have come to resemble full-blown campaign operations that don't have to be reported as expenses.

The goal of the paid bloggers, both campaigns say, is to deluge online political journals with positive tidbits about their candidate and draw attention to the most negative news about their opponent. The campaign bloggers sometimes write their own bits. Other times, they spread gossip generated by others.

"We just feel like if the left is going to run rampant, we have to respond in some way," said Chad Dotson, one of the new pro-Allen bloggers and the prosecutor in Wise County. "We decided enough is enough. It's something we should have done before."

Jon Henke, Allen's new blog guru, said he will try to do in the eight weeks until the Nov. 7 election what Democrats have been doing online for months in Virginia. "Our goal is to engage the blogosphere to get our message out," he said.

Bloggers first appeared on the national political scene in 2003 and 2004 during the presidential contest. Democratic candidate Howard Dean was the first to harness the energy from thousands of online journals, whose tiny readership is multiplied by the Internet's ability to link readers from one blog to the next.

They have made little splash in Maryland and the District. But in Virginia, bloggers have mushroomed into a political force to whom politicians cater. Last month, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) held a morning conference call just for political bloggers. Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R) regularly does a "live blog" on several conservative Web sites.

And nowhere is their presence felt more than on the campaign trail in the Senate race.

"It does seem to have gone up another notch," said Lowell Feld, founder of Raising Kaine, a liberal blog whose monthly visits are on track to be more than 100,000, up from 15,000 in December.

Bloggers were all over last week's campaign developments as the two sides traded accusations about the candidates' views on women. The bloggers' posts often are over the top. One entry on the A-Team blog offered the following quote: "Who is more modern in their attitude towards women: the Taliban, or . . . Webb? Tough call."

But it is Feld's Virginia site, at http://www.raisingkaine.com , that has been at the center of blogging influence and of controversy.

A former federal employee with degrees in psychology and Middle East studies, Feld helped blog Kaine into office last year (thus the site's name) and runs a state political action committee that he said has been largely dormant since the end of the governor's race.

This year, Feld was one of several bloggers who launched online petitions to help persuade Webb to get into the race against Allen. Feld blogged furiously on behalf of Webb during his primary fight against Fairfax Democrat and lobbyist Harris Miller.

Shortly after Webb won the primary in June, Feld announced that he had been hired as Webb's "netroots coordinator." The campaign pays him $2,500 a month to help the Democrat interact with the online community. Feld's partner, Josh Chernila, is the campaign's grass-roots coordinator.

Both offer disclaimers that their opinions are their own, but they have continued to blog on Raising Kaine, using the site to launch sometimes blistering critiques of Allen and often going further than Webb's spokeswoman.

In recent posts, Feld has referred to Republicans as "rightwing crazies" and has changed the name of Allen's campaign manager, Dick Wadhams, to a locker room epithet.

Recently, Feld wrote about a picture that shows Allen standing next to a group of white men who allegedly belonged to a white supremacist group.

"Finally! I mean, seriously, how long does it take the supposedly 'mainstream media' to pick up on evidence that a man who wants to be President is a racist?" Feld wrote.

Asked whether she believes Allen is racist, Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd said: "I don't know. You'll have to ask George Allen." Told about Feld's post, she added, "Well, you know, Lowell doesn't speak for the campaign."

Feld's online statements -- and the Webb campaign's attempts to distance itself -- have outraged conservatives who accuse Webb of illegally using the Raising Kaine site and its bloggers as a vehicle for election-year messages without officially reporting it as a 2006 campaign expense.

Dotson accused Feld and other liberal bloggers of making "huge misrepresentations" on their sites and said the Webb campaign should be held accountable.

"His campaign has been so inept that if he didn't have left-wing bloggers screaming at the top of their lungs, he wouldn't have a campaign," Dotson said.

On the Virginia Virtual Conservative blog, http://virtuconindustries.blogspot.com , Jim Riley penned an entry titled "Raising Kaine PAC in violation of Federal Election law."

Riley wrote: "The gang at Raising Kaine PAC better start looking around for a good Democrat federal election law attorney. Something tells me that they'll be needing one."

Feld said lawyers have told him neither he nor the campaign is doing anything wrong. "We're very confident. They've assured us time and again [that we] not only meet the letter of the law, but exceed it."

Federal election laws largely exempt blogging and other online activity from reporting requirements in much the same way that newspapers and television programs are free to comment without fear of government regulation.

In March, the Federal Election Commission issued rules that require campaigns to report when they buy banner ads on Web sites. But those same regulations appear to give bloggers such as Feld and Henke virtually unlimited freedom.

In documents accompanying the regulations, the FEC wrote, "The new rules exempt Internet activity by individuals acting both with and without the knowledge or consent of a candidate, authorized committee, or political party committee."

But Feld and Henke are testing the federal laws by claiming to be members of a campaign staff one moment and independent campaign bloggers the next.

What is clear, said political activists on the left and the right, is that campaigns such as the ones in Virginia are changing the way bloggers are perceived.

"Blogging is evolving," Feld said. "You are moving into the point where bloggers who before were making no money are starting to become more like professionals, like journalists and other campaign people."

Democrats Lose In Chafee Victory (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

Senate Democrats last week lost a key chance in their battle to retake the Senate, when top Republicans helped one of their most liberal members, Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, defeat a more conservative challenger who both sides thought would lose to Democrats in November.

"Republicans are breathing a sigh of relief," Republican pollster Scott Reed said. "And the Democrats' momentum has been halted. ... This just would have made them one step closer."

Democrats have to gain six seats in order to retake the Senate. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said last year that a "miracle" would be needed for them to do so.

Senate Democrats strongly disagree that Mr. Chafee's win was a setback for them. They argue that they can still win the seat because Mr. Chafee was weakened by the bitter primary and polls show a tight race between him and Democratic nominee Sheldon Whitehouse, a former state attorney general.

But the hill is now a bit steeper for Democrats than it would have been had the more conservative Stephen Laffey won the Republican primary in the Democratic state.

To gain a majority, Democrats would have to win Mr. Chafee's seat, as well as four vulnerable Republican seats in Missouri, Montana, Ohio and Pennsylvania, said Jennifer Duffy, editor and political analyst for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. Then, they would have to pick up a sixth seat from among three slightly less vulnerable Republican seats in Arizona, Tennessee and Virginia, she said. And they would have to do all of this without losing any of their current seats.

In addition, Democrats are trying to deal with reports that Sen. Robert Menendez, New Jersey Democrat, is the subject of a federal investigation. The Star Ledger reported on Sept. 8 that the federal government is investigating a rental deal between Mr. Menendez and a nonprofit group in the state that received millions in federal funds. A Republican poll taken last weekend showed Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr. with a four-point lead.

Meanwhile, last week's Rhode Island primary was a focus for both parties because polls showed Mr. Laffey likely would lose to Mr. Whitehouse, giving Democrats a victory in the state. National Republicans gave ample money, time and resources to Mr. Chafee to ensure that didn't happen.

"It makes the math a lot harder for [Democrats]," Dan Ronayne, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said of the outcome. He noted that Democrats were so intent on a Laffey win that they spent $26,000 making phone calls against Mr. Chafee leading up to the race, according to a Federal Election Commission filing by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC).

But the DSCC is now wholly focused on the general election.

It says Mr. Chafee will have a difficult time trying to woo left-leaning voters after top Republicans such as first lady Laura Bush traveled to Rhode Island to campaign for him.

"Chafee's going to have a harder time shifting to a general election after using page after page of the Republican playbook in the primary," DSCC spokesman Phil Singer said.

In a strategy memo the day after the primary, DSCC Chairman Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York noted that Mr. Whitehouse got roughly the same number of votes as both the Republican candidates combined.

He said the primary showed that "candidates who were perceived as the most anti-Bush won -- an ominous sign for the GOP and a good sign for Democrats."

Clinton Stars At Klobuchar Event (MINNST)

By Josephine Marcotty, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 17, 2006

The former president, ever-popular among Democrats, lent his charm and fundraising mettle to the DFL candidate.

Former President Bill Clinton, the Democrats' favorite Democrat, stood with U.S. Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar before a crowd of more than 1,400 people Saturday night to shed some of his rainmaking power on her and her political party.

Clinton raised cheers at the fundraising dinner held at the RiverCentre in St. Paul when he said that Klobuchar "may be the very best we have in the United States."

His presence in Minnesota, and that of President Bush at a Republican fundraiser in August, illustrates the importance that both parties place on this Senate race.

"It's the most competitive race in the country," said Mark Drake, communications director for the Republican Party in Minnesota. "It speaks to the fact that they have to bring in their most important fundraiser," he said.

Questions were raised about whether Bush would help or hurt Minnesota Republican candidates during his fundraising swing here.

But that's not an issue for Clinton or the candidates he supports in Minnesota, experts said.

"There is no more popular Democrat than Bill Clinton," said Steve Smith, a professor of political science at Washington University in St. Louis. "If you are putting on a fundraiser, you want Bill Clinton."

When Bush came to Minnesota for a Republican fundraiser in August, some questioned whether the political fallout from the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina would steer voters away from Republican congressional candidate Michele Bachmann and Senate candidate Mark Kennedy. In fact, a running theme of the coverage of the race between Kennedy and Klobuchar has been that Kennedy is trying to overcome his image as a Bush Republican.

Kennedy's answer to that was to ride in Bush's motorcade, and shake his hand during the Minnesota visit.

However, when Clinton left office he was one of the most popular presidents ever, said Stephen Frank, a political science professor at St. Cloud State University, and that was especially true in Minnesota.

"And we love former presidents," he said.

In fact, Clinton's appearance beside Klobuchar at the event might raise her appeal to a broader spectrum of voters, he said.

"She's modeled herself on Clinton," Smith said. "He was known for his success in taking a moderate approach. And [Klobuchar] has attempted to stake a claim in the middle of spectrum."

In fact, Clinton said during his speech Saturday that the "Democratic party has actually become both the liberal and the conservative party in America today." The Republicans have been taken over by a narrow group of extreme conservatives, he said.

That's in sharp contrast to what Republicans have been saying about Minnesota Democrats since Keith Ellison won the Democratic primary last week in the Fifth District Congressional race.

"Clinton, coming to town on the heels of Ellison's victory, really underscores just how much Minnesota Democrats have abandoned his Democratic legacy," Drake said.

DOJ_NMG_0064791

Ellison has been subjected to heated attacks by his Republican opponent in the race because of his past ties to Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan. Ellison, a Muslim, has said his ties were limited to helping organize the Million Man March in Washington.

Campaign officials for Klobuchar said the event was sold out, and they added spots for 200 more people at the last minute. However, they were unable to say how much money was raised because Clinton's schedule changed at the last minute, forcing the Klobuchar campaign to cancel a fundraising event with him that was to be held before the dinner. Earlier Saturday he attended the funeral of former Texas Gov. Ann Richards, who died Thursday of cancer.

A spokesperson for the Minnesota DFL said its share of the proceeds would be about $500,000.

'Values Voters' Up For Grabs In State's Senate Race (PPG)

By James O'Toole, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 17, 2006

CAMPAIGN 2006 / U.S. SENATE

Bob Casey returned to his law school, Catholic University, last week, to deliver a message on how his faith informs his public life.

This Wednesday, Dr. James Dobson, the popular and influential evangelical broadcaster, will appear at the Mellon Arena.

Sen. Rick Santorum, whose reelection is being challenged by Mr. Casey, won't be there and won't be endorsed formally at the gathering, but the selection of Pittsburgh as a site for pre-election Stand for the Family rallies shows how highly the conservative Republican is valued by Dr. Dobson and his colleagues.

"Pennsylvania is too important for us not to be here ... especially in your Senate race," Dr. Dobson said in a radio interview last week. "Get to the polls. You know who to vote for. I won't tell you, because you already know."

The two events highlight the importance of religion in this race and in the broader national struggle between parties eager to appeal to "the values voter," that many analysts saw as a decisive factor in the 2004 presidential race. Since that election, Democrats nationally have struggled to find a natural voice on religious issues.

"I really think they understand that they've missed the boat and they've ceded all this territory to the Republican Party," said Laura Olson, a Clemson University scholar and the author of "Religion and Politics in America: Faith, Culture and Strategic Choices."

"On the other hand," she said, "you can't really turn around all of a sudden and say, 'OK, I'm going to talk about religion.' "

A recent survey by researchers at Baylor University confirmed earlier findings that regular church attendance had a high correlation to support for Republican candidates. The latest in a series of surveys on religion and politics by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life offered similar conclusions. Both surveys noted that white evangelical Protestants were the most monolithic of religious groups in their support for conservative candidates and issues.

That tendency should be unmistakable in the presentation by Dr. Dobson and his colleagues. While, for tax reasons, the group is barred from making formal endorsements in the race, anyone who walks away not knowing their preference won't have been paying attention. Mr. Santorum, while a Roman Catholic himself, had a prominent place in a Time Magazine survey of the most influential figures in the evangelical movement.

"Obviously, we're coming to a state where the stakes are pretty high," said Tom Minnery, Focus on the Family's vice president for public policy and the leader of its political arm. "We won't be telling people how to vote, but we'll be laying out the differences."

If the electorate were limited to religious conservatives, Mr. Casey would face prohibitive odds in November. But some analysts see a broader problem for a party whose brand name has become associated with a more secular approach to public issues.

"The root of the Democratic Party's religious woes may not lie solely in the fact that they have been spurned by religious conservatives," Pew researchers Gregory Smith and Peyton Craighill wrote in a commentary on the latest survey. "Contributing to the party's electoral misfortunes may be that even moderate citizens and voters view the Democrats as being unfriendly toward religion."

The introduction to the report itself said the Democrats have a "God Problem," with only a quarter of voters saying that the party is friendly toward religion. It went on to note, however, that "the proportion of Americans who say the Republican Party is friendly to religion, while much larger, has fallen from 55 [percent] to 47 [percent] in the past year, with a particularly sharp decline coming among white evangelical Protestants (14 percentage points)."

Mr. Casey's Catholic University speech was an implicit effort to counter his party's image.

Mr. Casey, like his opponent an observant Roman Catholic, invoked the Conference of Catholic Bishops' "Guide to Faithful Citizenship," and said, "My understanding of the common good also comes from my faith: faith in God, that all things will ultimately work to his greater good."

Back in the 'public square'

Mr. Santorum, in his book, "It Takes a Family" and in numerous speeches has complained about a society that would ban religion from the public square. He argues in his book: "Most liberals seem really to believe that this widespread worry about values is nothing more than a version of the Marxist 'false consciousness,' a form of mass hysteria created by urban legends and stoked by talk show hosts like Sean Hannity, Dr. Laura, and Rush Limbaugh and evangelicals like Dr. James Dobson."

Jay Reiff, Mr. Casey's campaign manager, argues that such a characterization can't be tagged on the challenger

"Bob is a new kind of Democrat and is hoping to be a model of bringing faith to the public square," he said.

One of the factors cited by analysts in Democrat Timothy Kaine's victory in last year's Virginia governor's race was his ability to speak comfortably about his faith. Early in the campaign, the Virginian-Pilot reported, he ran radio ads on small Christian broadcasting stations saying that, "My family and Christian faith are the core values that guide me."

Handicapping the Virginia race in an appearance on "Meet the Press," Howard Dean, the Democratic National chairman, said, "We ought to talk about our values. Tim Kaine did it. I don't think that's the only reason he won, but it's certainly one of them."

This rebranding effort has skeptics, however, both in and outside the party.

"I'm not comfortable with the way the Democratic Party has tried to become religious," the Rev. George Regas, pastor emeritus of All Saints Church in Pasadena, Calif., said at a panel discussion on religion and politics last week at the Warhol Museum. "There's an inauthenticity about it."

The Rev. Regas, who supports abortion rights, said he was frustrated at Democratic efforts to defend liberal positions on issues such as abortion and gay marriage from a civil liberties standpoint rather than a moral one.

Some Democrats eager to portray their candidates as more friendly to religious audiences have launched the Web site, FaithfulDemocrats.com. One of its key figures is a former DNC chairman, David Wilhelm, an investment banker and practicing Methodist.

The site describes itself as "an online community of Christian Democrats -- religious leaders, political leaders, writers, and regular Americans who are committed to the Gospel and the common good. ... We don't believe that good Christians have to be Democrats. Nor do we believe that one religion has a monopoly on faith. But we make no apologies for rooting our identity as Democrats in our faith as Christians."

To the Democratic hierarchy, a big part of Mr. Casey's appeal as a candidate was based in part on his ability to fit a similar profile. He shares Mr. Santorum's overall positions on abortion and stem cell research. Both support the death penalty. Like the incumbent, Mr. Casey opposes gay marriage, but supports civil unions for gay couples. And while he supports previous legislative definitions of marriage as a bond between a man and a woman, he derided the effort to insert similar language as an amendment to the Constitution as a partisan ploy by congressional Republicans.

Abortion off the table?

At a recent Labor Day picnic, while Mr. Casey worked the crowd a few feet away, Westmoreland County Commissioner Tom Balya said he expected Mr. Casey to run well in his socially conservative county because, in his view, he takes the polarizing issues of abortion, along with gun control, off the board.

DOJ_NMG_0064793

That Democratic hope won't be realized for every voter, however. Referring to the premise that Mr. Casey's candidacy moots the abortion issues, Helen Cindrich, president of People Concerned for the Unborn Child, said, "He's going to be surprised if he thinks that's true."

LifePAC, the political arm of Mrs. Cindrich's group, endorsed Mr. Santorum last week. The veteran anti-abortion activist described herself as a longtime admirer of Mr. Casey's father, the late governor, who was an outspoken foe of abortion and who even considered running for president on a pro-life platform.

"We interviewed him before the primary," she said of the Democratic candidate. "We were kind of thinking, 'Here comes Robert P. Casey all over again.' He said to me, 'I'm not my father.' "

"The fact that he says that Plan B is a good thing really rankles," Mrs. Cindrich said.

Mr. Casey supports the so-called morning after pill -- Plan B -- and the recent FDA decision to allow its sale over-the-counter, an issue that both Mrs. Cindrich and Mr. Minnery, of Focus on the Family, cited as important to their constituencies.

In his recent appearance on "Meet the Press," Mr. Casey said that the Plan B pill is a contraceptive. Mr. Santorum and many abortion foes oppose it, however, arguing that it can, in some instances, be tantamount to an abortion.

Mr. Casey also differs from Mr. Santorum in supporting government aid to family planning organizations. He has argued repeatedly that both pro-life and pro-choice groups can find common ground in supporting polices that reduce the number of abortions.

"In my view, neither party has gotten it right when it comes to life issues," Mr. Casey said in his Catholic University address. "We can't realistically tackle the difficult question of abortion without embracing the 'radical solidarity' with women who face pregnancy that Pope John Paul spoke of many years ago. If we are going to be pro-life, we cannot say we are against abortion of unborn children and then let our children suffer in degraded inner city schools and broken homes."

Mr. Reiff, the Democrat's campaign manager, pointed out that Mr. Casey has made efforts to reach out to a variety of faith-based groups, including the Pennsylvania Pastors Network, a coalition of nonprofit groups, working to increase the turnout of religious voters in November. Mr. Casey spoke to a meeting of the group in July, but its first session, early this year, featured a seven-minute videotaped greeting by Mr. Santorum.

In Pennsylvania and elsewhere in the country, GOP outreach to such church groups proved a decisive factor in the 2004 presidential results.

All of this suggests several tactical issues about this Senate campaign. Mr. Santorum seems certain of retaining the allegiance of most of the more conservative religious groups, but will Mr. Casey's relatively conservative social positions, and comfort in discussing his faith, allow him to peel off at least some of that conservative support?

Conversely, will more socially liberal voters, such as those in the crucial Philadelphia suburbs, perceive Mr. Casey as relatively moderate compared to the incumbent, or will they place both candidates in the same pro-life niche?

"Because Casey is able to present himself as a moderate, it creates a strategic opportunity for the Democrats to peel off moderates," said Ms. Olson, the Clemson scholar. "It seems to me that the 2006 elections are not going to be decided on the same culture wars as in the past."

Al Franken: Formidable Fundraiser (MINNST)

By Rob Hotakainen, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 17, 2006

The potential 2008 U.S. Senate hopeful is helping DFLers and candidates around the country.

WASHINGTON - A new Democratic powerhouse is emerging in Minnesota this campaign season: comedian Al Franken.

His political-action committee, which is called Midwest Values, has raised more than $800,000 that he's spreading to Democratic candidates in Minnesota and across the country.

"He's potentially a huge player." said David Schultz, a professor at Hamline University in St. Paul who studies money in politics.

Schultz said that if Franken spends all of the political funds he is raising, his group would be one of the "top two or three PACs expending money in the state of Minnesota."

DOJ_NMG_0064794

But Franken, a bestselling author and radio talk-show host who grew up in St. Louis Park, could be the ultimate beneficiary if he cashes in his chits and runs for the Senate in 2008 against Minnesota Republican Sen. Norm Coleman.

Franken, who moved from New York to Minneapolis this year, said he might form an exploratory committee for that race early next year.

He is raising campaign money from a variety of sources -- from the entertainment industry on both coasts, his stand-up comedy shows and elsewhere.

"If I do run against Norm Coleman in '08, I'll be the only New York Jew in the race who actually grew up in Minnesota," Franken quipped to about 200 DFL activists gathered at a picnic in Fridley recently.

Hollywood ties

Contributors to Franken's PAC include Barbra Streisand, Phil Donahue, Larry Hagman and Norman Lear from the entertainment industry, former Minnesota Gov. Wendell Anderson and Minneapolis attorney Sam Kaplan.

That list of contributors prompted Coleman to say that Franken "obviously has a sense of humor" by calling his PAC Midwest Values.

"Hollywood values aren't Midwest," Coleman said, "and the money isn't Midwest."

Coleman, who has raised nearly $4 million for his reelection bid, said he expects Franken to be "a very strong voice for the far left" and a strong fundraiser.

"There's a lot of Hollywood money out there, a lot of ultra-liberal money out there," Coleman said. "I have no doubt that Al Franken will be very, very formidable. ... He can probably self-fund."

Franken said he chose the name Midwest Values for his group because he is tired of Republicans claiming those values as their own. He said that Hollywood contributors have provided only $60,000 to his PAC and that Minnesotans have given much more.

Franken would not be allowed to use his PAC money to finance a run for the Senate.

So far, Franken has distributed $10,000 each to Senate hopeful Amy Klobuchar and House candidates Patty Wetterling, Tim Walz and Coleen Rowley. He gave $5,000 each to Democrats in tight Senate races: Claire McCaskill in Missouri, Sherrod Brown in Ohio and Jon Tester in Montana. He gave $20,000 to the DFL Party and $500 each to more than 30 legislative candidates.

He is aiming his money at contested races where he believes it will help most.

Wetterling said that Franken is bringing a new perspective to politics: "This is Minnesota. We elected Jesse Ventura. We elected Rod Grams, the TV anchorman," she said. "We've elected different people."

Franken has been doing a lot of politicking around Minnesota since January, when he moved his show on the Air America radio network from Manhattan to Minneapolis.

The night after he appeared in Fridley, Franken went to Tonka Bay to raise money for Wetterling. The next night, he rallied DFLers at the Wellstone Dinner in St. Cloud. Two nights later, he was in Minneapolis, raising money for abortion-rights advocates. The next week, Franken went to Denver and San Francisco to do stand-up shows. Last Tuesday night, he attended a political event in Rochester.

Republicans take notice

Franken's political rounds in the state are not going unnoticed by opponents.

Last week, State Republican chairman Ron Carey called him one of the "true finance chairs" behind DFL gubernatorial candidate Mike Hatch. Carey described Franken as "an angry liberal."

Franken said he is ready for attacks. "I admit, I've been angry at times. ... I don't know how you don't get angry at what's going on," he said.

As he travels throughout Minnesota, Franken is staying true to his trade, often relying on humor at political events. He calls the No Child Left Behind law for schools "the most ironically named piece of legislation since the 1942 Japanese Family Leave Act." He says Republicans are "stealing God," adding that the Bible is filled with references to helping the poor. If you cut all those references out, he says, "you'd have the perfect box to smuggle Rush Limbaugh's drugs in."

DOJ_NMG_0064795

At the Fridley picnic, Franken got a big laugh when he read from the GOP's Contract With America in 1994, recalling how Republicans promised to end a cycle of political scandal.

"On September 27th, 1994, on the steps the Capitol, they said this: 'If we break the contract, throw us out,' " he said.

After the crowd's hooting ended, Franken yelled: "Sounds like a plan to me!"

Jindal, Vitter Back Romero For House Seat (BRADV)

By Patrick Courreges, Acadiana Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 17, 2006

single page view

HOUMA — The Louisiana Republican Party's two hottest political acts traveled to Houma Saturday to declare their support for Republican Louisiana 3rd Congressional District challenger Craig Romero.

U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-Kenner, and U.S. Sen. David Vitter, R-Metairie, held a news conference with state Sen. Romero, R-New Iberia, in front of the Terrebonne Parish Courthouse where they praised Romero's values and work ethic.

Romero is the best-known and best-funded of three challengers attempting to unseat first-term incumbent U.S. Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, in the Nov. 7 election. The other two are Franklin Libertarian James Lee Blake Jr. and LaPlace Democrat Olangee "OJ" Breech.

"I am absolutely convinced we need Craig Romero in our delegation, especially in these challenging times," Vitter said.

He said that trying to bring more funding to the state to help restore its eroding coast and continue the recovery from 2005's hurricanes Katrina and Rita are crucial issues for the state's delegation.

Romero is uniquely qualified to deal with hurricane recovery, having served as Iberia Parish president and helping oversee that parish's recovery from Hurricane Andrew in 1992, Vitter said.

"He has the knowledge and the experience," Vitter said.

He said another reason for his endorsement is that Romero best represents the conservative values that Vitter believes Louisiana wants.

Vitter said he does not believe Melancon's claims to share those conservative values.

"I think the record shows that he doesn't," Vitter said.

The first vote Melancon or Romero would cast in Congress would be a choice for Speaker of the House, and while Romero would certainly vote for a strong conservative, Melancon would have to vote with the rest of his party for U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., Vitter said.

He said a Pelosi-led House would be for abortion, for gun control and for tax increases.

GOP's Attack On Ellison Focuses On U.S. Muslim (MINNST)

By Sharon Schmickle, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 17, 2006

Nihad Awad is head of the Council of American-Islamic Relations. Conservatives say it is rooted in Hamas and secretly supports Hezbollah in Lebanon.

When Nihad Awad flew to Minneapolis to attend a fundraiser for state Rep. Keith Ellison in August, following him was a simmering debate in American politics: What constitutes support for terrorism?

Last week, Minnesota Republicans thrust that issue to the forefront after Ellison won the DFL primary in the Fifth Congressional District. In a letter to Republicans statewide afterward, state GOP chairman Ron Carey accused Ellison of trying to hide his backing from "a self-identified supporter" of the Palestinian group Hamas.

DOJ_NMG_0064796

Carey was referring to Awad, a former Minnesotan and executive director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) in Washington, one of the nation's most prominent Muslim groups. Awad has been a frequent commentator on national television and appeared with President Bush after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

But many conservatives and Jewish groups say that CAIR is rooted in the Hamas movement and that its leaders also secretly support Hezbollah in Lebanon. The United States counts Hamas and Hezbollah as terrorist organizations.

Awad donated $2,000 to Ellison's campaign in July, and at least one other CAIR employee gave $1,000. The donations are listed on Ellison's campaign finance reports, and he said he has nothing to hide.

"The Republicans are in a tough situation," Ellison said. "Iraq is a failed policy."

Ellison added, "They haven't done much for homeland security. We still have a health care crisis. The Earth is warming up, and they're not doing anything about it. What are they going to do? They have to try to engage in smear politics."

If he wins, Ellison will be the first Muslim elected to Congress. He called Awad an "acquaintance," saying he has known the CAIR leader for many years but not well enough to be able to "account for everything he has ever done, everybody he knows or everything he has ever said."

But after Awad attended the Ellison fundraiser on Aug. 25, conservative blogs, some Jewish groups and some Democrats objected.

Awad dismissed the attacks as an effort to crush Ellison with unfounded guilt-by-association innuendo. He predicted that it will backfire. "The Twin Cities has broken the historical ice of stereotypes and fear that American Muslims cannot make it," Awad said.

But some observers neutral-to-supportive on Ellison said it's valid for voters to examine a candidate's associations.

Jewish voters, for example, are concerned about Israel's security, and they scrutinize all candidate positions as they relate to Hamas and Hezbollah, said Julie Swiler, a spokeswoman for the Jewish Community Relations Council of Minnesota and the Dakotas.

Many Jewish voters apparently were satisfied with Ellison even after Awad stepped forth to support him. Prominent Jewish politicians continued to campaign for him, and an influential newspaper, the American Jewish World, endorsed him.

The debate goes back to the late 1980s, when Awad, a Palestinian refugee, left Jordan to study at the University of Minnesota, where he was active in Muslim student groups. That's where he met Ellison, a law student at the time.

Awad frequently accepted invitations to explain Islam at Twin Cities area schools and churches, sometimes collaborating with another Minnesotan, Ibrahim Hooper. In 1994 they took their outreach nationwide, with money raised by Omar Ahmad, president of the Islamic Association for Palestine, where Awad worked as public relations director.

The organization that Awad and Hooper opened in a two-room office in Washington that year now has 32 chapters and affiliates in the United States and Canada. Its stated mission is to enhance understanding of Islam and defend civil liberties. But its leaders also have criticized U.S. policy in the Middle East.

Controversy began even before the doors opened to CAIR's first office.

In March 1994, Awad said at Barry University in Florida, "I am in support of the Hamas movement more than the PLO," a reference to the Palestine Liberation Organization, which was widely seen as corrupt. Awad went on to say that Hamas and other Islamic movements were gaining popularity in the Middle East in part because they "respond to the daily needs of the people." He added, "There are radicals in every movement and every sect, but we have to look at the moderate side."

The statement came before Hamas had set off its first car bomb in Israel and more than a year before the United States designated it as a terrorist organization. Since then, CAIR has issued dozens of statements condemning terrorism.

But critics continue to cite the phrase "I am in support of the Hamas movement" as evidence that Awad supports a terrorist organization. He reiterated last week, "I don't support any organization that is designated by the State Department on the list of terrorism, and we respect the law."

Awad's original statement reflected a nuanced view common in the Middle East, said Prof. J. Andrew Overman of Macalester College, who leads study groups to the region.

A typical response from a Palestinian voter, Overman said, is "this suicide bomber stuff is insane, and I am scared to death that my 14-year-old son is going to be talked into being one. But the only way I can get penicillin for my son is from Hamas. So do I support Hamas? I do, but I do not support suicide bombing."

CAIR's critics cite other worries, though. One is that groups associated with it have been linked to terrorism-related activity. For example, after the Sept. 11 attacks, CAIR invited visitors to its website to help victims by contributing to a charity called the Holy Land Foundation. In December 2001 the United States blocked Holy Land's assets, saying it supported Hamas.

And the Islamic Association for Palestine, instrumental in launching CAIR, was found liable in a 2004 lawsuit in Chicago for contributing to the terrorist killing of a U.S. citizen by providing support to Hamas. Further, former CAIR employees and volunteers have been convicted on terrorism-related charges in Virginia and Texas.

Debate over CAIR has raged through Congress and courts. Voters in the Fifth District, which includes Minneapolis and nearby suburbs, are unlikely to resolve it.

Instead, their challenge will be to distinguish between issues and hardball politics, said John Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life in Washington.

"It would be legitimate for someone to say, 'I don't want to vote for Mr. Ellison because he gets support from CAIR, and I don't agree with CAIR,' " Green said. "But it would be quite another thing to say, "Because CAIR supports Ellison, then there's somehow a tie to terrorists.' That involves taking several steps for which there is probably no evidence."

Patrick Outpaces Two Rivals In New Poll Democrat Surges To A 21-point Lead As Vote Nears (BOS)

By Frank Phillips

The Boston Globe, September 17, 2006

Heading into the final days of the campaign, Deval Patrick has opened up a commanding lead in the Democratic race for governor, far outpacing his closest challenger, Christopher Gabrieli, and leaving Thomas F. Reilly a distant third, according to a new poll conducted for The Boston Globe and CBS4-TV.

Forty-six percent of those surveyed supported Patrick, 25 percent backed Gabrieli, and 18 percent were for Reilly in the poll of 523 likely voters in Tuesday's primary election. Only 6 percent said they were undecided, while 4 percent expressed support for other candidates in next Tuesday's election. The survey was taken Sept. 12-15 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percent.

The survey found voters shifted to Patrick in the last few weeks, despite the millions of dollars that Gabrieli and Reilly have spent on television advertising since late August. A Globe poll, taken Aug. 18-23, showed that the three were in a virtual dead heat, with Patrick at 31 percent, Gabrieli 30 percent, and Reilly 27 percent. In March, a similar poll gave Reilly a strong lead in the race.

Patrick took support from both of his rivals in the intervening weeks, though Reilly seems to have suffered the greatest, according to Andrew E. Smith, the director of the University of New Hampshire's Survey Center, which conducted the poll.

Smith said that Patrick has succeeded in building his support beyond his base of liberal, upper income, well-educated voters that made up the initial core of his coalition. Patrick, who began the race 18 months ago as a political novice who was virtually unknown to voters, now leads in almost all the categories of the primary electorate, the survey shows.

``Patrick has broadened his support across the board," Smith said.

He said Reilly, the state's two-term attorney general, and Gabrieli, a wealthy venture capitalist, lost ground partly because some of the moderate and conservative voters -- a group Smith says are less politically involved and less motivated to vote in a Democratic primary -- have decided not to participate in the election. Support for Reilly and Gabrieli is rooted among moderates and conservative Democrats and independents.

In contrast to the contest for the gubernatorial nomination, the three-way primary race for lieutenant governor appears to be wide open. Deborah Goldberg, the former chairwoman of the Brookline Board of Selectmen, received 26 percent support in the survey; Tim Murray, the mayor of Worcester, 20 percent; and business consultant Andrea Silbert, 18 percent. Twenty-seven percent are undecided.

But among those who say they will definitely vote, the race tightens. Goldberg and Murray both get 27 percent, and Silbert gets 16 percent. The margin of error for those 300 likely voters in the sample is about 5.5 percent.

In the only other Democratic contest, Secretary of State William F. Galvin, seeking his fourth term, is far out in front of his challenger, voting rights lawyer John Bonifaz, getting 45 percent support from the respondents. Bonifaz received only 7 percent, while 38 percent are undecided.

In the race for governor, voters seem to be making their decisions because they generally like the candidates or their overall philosophies, rather than basing the decision on the candidates' stances on specific policies. While all three candidates have different views on rolling back the income tax rate from 5.3 percent to 5 percent -- the most hotly debated issue in the race -- only 11 percent cited the issue as the reason for supporting their candidate.

The current survey found 70 percent of the Democratic primary view Patrick favorably, 9 percent unfavorably. The poll three weeks ago found Patrick with a 51 percent favorable, 10 percent unfavorable rating.

The voters' view of Reilly has dropped dramatically in the last weeks. Forty-two percent of those surveyed viewed Reilly favorably, down from 52 percent in the Globe's August poll. His unfavorable rating jumped from 24 percent to 38 percent. Most analysts, including his closest advisers, attribute Reilly's free-fall to his poor debate performance on Sept. 7, when he went on the attack against both Gabrieli and Patrick.

But the second televised debate, held Wednesday, in the middle of the four-day survey, did not seem to hurt Patrick, even though he was seen as defensive under questioning by Reilly and Gabrieli.

The poll also found that Reilly's strategy of drawing on union support does not appear to have worked. In a small sample of 88 respondents, Patrick holds a 3-to-1 margin over Reilly among those identifying themselves as living in union households. Reilly, who has portrayed himself as a champion of working middle class voters running against two multimillionaires, receives his strongest support from older voters, those with lower levels of income and lower levels of education, according to the survey.

Patrick gets his strongest support from liberals and those with incomes of $100,000 a year or more, those with postgraduate educations, and those with no religious preference. He is especially strong among respondents who say they are most interested in the race and those who say they will definitely vote on Tuesday.

But Patrick's broader appeal is evident in the views of Sonja Bryant of Waltham, a 51-year-old hospital worker and a registered Democrat. She said that Patrick's positions on issues such as housing, crime, education, and affirmative action appeal to her. ``He will be do something about the causes that affect my family, some of his causes are my causes," said Bryant, a survey respondent who agreed to be interviewed after the poll.

Bryant, an African-American woman who describes herself as a liberal, said she was impressed with Patrick's ability to rise from a poor childhood to jobs as a top Clinton administration official and later a corporate executive. ``If you're able to do that with from where you came from, you can do something for the state," she said.

Gabrieli, despite spending over $2 million in ads in the last three weeks, has actually dropped slightly since the August poll. The recent survey gives him a 59 percent favorable rating, up four percentage points from August, but his unfavorable rating rose from 14 percent to 17 percent. He drew slightly more support from those who identify themselves as conservatives, but trailed Patrick among moderates, a targeted group that Gabrieli was hoping to use as a base for victory. Gabrieli also is trailing Patrick by a significant margin among independents, another primary voting bloc that he is counting on to carry.

Gabrieli has portrayed himself as bi partisan and results oriented. ``I don't think he is one of the insiders," said Joe Rosseau, a survey respondent and partially retired state worker from Methuen, explaining why he is supporting Gabrieli.

Rosseau, a 63-year-old registered independent who describes himself as a conservative, said he considered Patrick ``seriously" but worries that he would not get state spending under control. He rejected Reilly because he felt had not done enough to investigate the Big Dig problems.

Rosseau says he is more concerned about the state controlling spending that an immediate income tax cut. Indeed, only 15 percent of those surveyed favor Reilly's position for an immediate rollback, while 48 percent support Gabrieli's plan for a phased in cutback. Patrick's position of keeping the tax at 5.3 percent gets support from 30 percent of the respondents.

Gabrieli's hope for overtaking Patrick may lie with those who say they are most likely to change their minds, the survey findings show. Greg Gullotti of Waltham, self-employed antiques dealer, said he has been divided over whether to vote for Patrick or Gabrieli, but is moving toward Gabrieli.

``I'm leaning in his direction, because he appears to have the sense of self-convictions and has a personality that he would not be swayed by the stress and potential political ramifications of any given situation," said Gullotti, a registered independent who said he generally votes for Democrats. ``He strikes me as a fair and even keeled administrator."

But Gullotti, 37, said he is also drawn to Patrick, but finds off-putting what many say is his strength as a candidate. ``He is a fresh face, with a fairly good track record," he said. ``And he is certainly charismatic and energetic, but that is finally what is turning me against him," Gullotti said. ``The more support Deval Patrick gets, the more he is talking like a politician."

Patrick was considered by the likely primary voters to be the strongest candidate for the Democrats to run against the Republican s' choice, Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey. Some 40 percent in the survey say he has the best chance of winning in November, while 22 percent name Gabrieli, and 19 percent, Reilly.

The August survey found that 37 percent of voters believed Reilly would be the strongest Democrat, with Patrick and Reilly trailing.

Also running in the general election are independent Christy Mihos and Green Rainbow Party candidate Grace Ross.

Asked which of the candidates cares most about ``people like you," 38 percent of those questioned chose Patrick, 23 percent said Reilly, and 20 percent said Gabrieli. Asked which candidate had the best television ads, 36 percent chose Gabrieli, 26 percent said Patrick and 12 percent said Reilly.

Pawlenty And Hatch Are Tied At 42% (MINNST)

By Rochelle Olson, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 17, 2006

With the rivals having locked in their bases, winning support of undecided and independent voters will be crucial.

Gov. Tim Pawlenty and Attorney General Mike Hatch are entering the fall campaign facing an electorate evenly divided on their candidacies for governor, according to the latest Star Tribune Minnesota Poll.

Among the 820 likely voters surveyed statewide Wednesday through Friday, just after the state's primary election, DFLer Hatch and Republican Pawlenty are in a dead heat, each with 42 percent support. Independence Party candidate Peter Hutchinson has the support of 7 percent.

With less than two months before the Nov. 7 general election, Hatch and Pawlenty appear to have locked down their partisan bases and are battling for a smaller pool of independent and undecided voters.

The results mirror a Minnesota Poll on the governor's race in July that showed Pawlenty with 43 percent support and Hatch with 41 percent.

"We've known all along this was going to be a close race," Hatch's campaign manager Jon Youngdahl said Saturday. "How we are going to win this race is with a positive message."

Pawlenty spokesman Brian McClung said Saturday that another finding in the poll -- the governor's lead among independents -- is "good news and reflects his mainstream appeal and success at growing jobs and strengthening Minnesota's economy."

Hutchinson, a former Minneapolis schools superintendent, went from 5 percent to 7 percent in the latest poll. Although he still struggles with name recognition among voters, he says Pawlenty and Hatch have stalled.

"Roughly 20 percent of the voters are saying, 'I know them well and don't want them.' My job is still visibility," Hutchinson said as he headed off to a parade in Plymouth on Saturday. When voters see a third option, he said, "They're going to take it."

Candidates Ken Pentel and Walt Brown each registered only 1 percent.

The results of the poll have a margin of sampling error no greater than 3.4 percentage points, plus or minus.

Hatch and Pawlenty have secured their party faithful, according to the poll. Hatch has 85 percent of those who identify as Democrats. Pawlenty has 87 percent who identify as Republicans.

Meanwhile, Pawlenty has an edge over Hatch and Hutchinson among independents, according to the poll. Pawlenty gets 40 percent of those votes to 30 percent for Hatch and 13 percent for Hutchinson.

Hatch does best in Hennepin and Ramsey counties, with 47 percent of voters polled to 35 percent for Pawlenty and 8 percent for Hutchinson. Hatch and Pawlenty are at near parity for the other metro counties. a change from July.

In Anoka, Dakota, Scott, Washington and Carver counties, Pawlenty stands at 43 percent, while Hatch has 40 percent support. In July, the poll showed Pawlenty leading in those places 51 to 34 percent.

The governor's job-approval rating is unchanged since the July poll. He is at 54 percent now, compared with 55 percent then. About two in five voters rated him poorly in July; that number is at 41 percent now.

The poll also asked about the state's direction. Nearly half of voters, 48 percent, say Minnesota is headed in the right direction, while 42 percent say things are off on the wrong track.

Both Hatch and Pawlenty have a good image among likely voters. Fifty-three percent view Hatch favorably, compared with 50 percent for Pawlenty. The governor's unfavorable rating is 41 percent; Hatch's is 24 percent.

The good news for Hutchinson is that his name recognition is up from 27 percent in July to 37 percent now. But more than three-fifths of likely voters do not know his name.

Some voters' views

Some of those polled offered views on the candidates.

Lee Hammock is a Republican retiree from Hayfield who thinks Pawlenty is doing "a good job with what he's got." Hammock said he likes that Pawlenty signed a bill making it easier to get permits to carry handguns, but he thinks roads are falling apart.

Mike Carlson, an electrical engineer in Chaska who leans Republican, said he's not sure yet how to vote. "Hatch is probably a pretty good guy. Pawlenty, I don't think he's been doing that bad," he said.

Fred Ventura is an independent in Owatonna who works as a paraprofessional in schools and thinks the state is on the right track. "I'll probably vote for Tim Pawlenty. "He has a genuine interest in the education of the children. I don't think it's just lip service," Ventura said.

Peter Degeus of Rochester is an independent supporting Hatch. "I call our governor two-faced Tim, so I'm not voting for him," Degeus said. "He ran on this campaign pledge of no new taxes. Hennepin County's getting new taxes and they don't get to vote."

He was referring to the new sales tax for the Minnesota Twins ballpark. The state gave the county authority to levy it.

Degeus said he also supports gay rights. "I'm not gay. I don't know anyone who's gay, but it's got to do with taking away somebody's rights. That's what the Republican Party seems to about these days," he said.

Diane Weiss, a typist from Barnum, is also an independent concerned about gay rights and keeping abortion legal. She said she doesn't know who she will vote for and doesn't think Pawlenty has done too badly. But she's upset with him because he "tried to strong-arm Indian tribes into giving the state more money. I thought that showed a lack of integrity."

But Rebecca Grundhoefer, a Democrat from Foley, said the state is going in the wrong direction because of tight school and public safety budgets. She isn't sure who she will vote for, but she's not happy.

"You don't see any police," she said. "It kind of feels like we're on our own a lot out here, and that's kind of scary. It seems like so many things are eroding."

'Teflon Ed' Rendell Unbruised Despite Tough Year (PPG)

By Tom Barnes, Post-gazette Harrisburg Bureau

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 17, 2006

CAMPAIGN 2006 / GOVERNOR

HARRISBURG -- In his first four years in office, Gov. Ed Rendell pushed hard to increase the state income tax, signed the infamous legislative pay raise, failed to enact middle-class property tax relief and oversaw state budgets that regularly exceeded the inflation rate.

So his bid for re-election has to be in trouble, right?

Well, no. For months, the Democratic incumbent, who was mayor of Philadelphia in the 1990s, has led his Republican challenger, former Steeler Lynn Swann, by double digits in every poll.

"I call him 'Teflon Ed' because nothing bad seems to stick to him," said Clay Richards, director of the Quinnipiac Poll, which put Mr. Rendell up by 19 points recently.

"Rendell is the consummate politician," added Mr. Richards. "He can neutralize defeats and even use them to his advantage. He came into office promising property tax relief and he hasn't really delivered on it, but he's able to put the blame for that on the Legislature.

"Even though he signed the pay raise, he hasn't paid any political price for that, while many of the legislators who voted for it have been defeated."

Perhaps the highest-profile issue of Mr. Rendell's first term was the advent of 14 casinos in Pennsylvania, with as many as 61,000 one-armed bandits. The first ones could open early in 2007.

Politically, slots have been a two-edged sword. Gamblers are happy because they won't have to trek to Atlantic City casinos or racetracks in West Virginia or Delaware to get their slots kick. And the state's horse-racing industry is pleased because some of the revenue generated at casinos will go to boost prize money for thoroughbred and harness races and help the horse-breeding and agricultural industry.

But religious conservatives and others think easier access to slots will just increase gambling addiction and generate huge social costs.

There also have been complaints that the promise of $1 billion in slots revenue to lower property taxes has been too slow in coming and won't be fully realized until 2009 at the earliest. Even then, critics say, it won't help average homeowners that much, trimming most annual property tax burdens by only $200 to $250.

Mr. Rendell, 62, took office in January 2003 and spent his first 18 months pushing for Act 71, the slots law. It was finally enacted on July 4, 2004, and he signed it one day later.

In Western Pennsylvania, it authorized one slots parlor in Pittsburgh and another at The Meadows racetrack in Washington County, each with up to 5,000 slots. There also will be smaller casinos (with 500 slots each) at two resorts, Nemacolin Woodlands and Seven Springs.

While some skeptics claim Mr. Rendell is overestimating the $1 billion he expects to get from slots, he say he's sticking with his forecast once all 14 casinos are fully up and running.

In his television commercials, Mr. Rendell boasts that 200,000 low-income seniors already have had their property taxes eliminated as a result of the anticipated slots revenue, and more modest reductions for the bulk of the state's seniors already have been enacted.

High-energy booster

One reason for Mr. Rendell's steady lead in the polls is his high level of energy and savvy use of the power of incumbency. Not bad for a guy who's 62 and fighting his weight. Last week he checked in at a hefty 257 pounds.

He has been tireless in flying around the commonwealth, handing out checks for local economic development projects.

Asked once what's the best perk about being governor, he quipped, "The plane."

Sometimes he even crisscrosses the entire state in one day -- hitting a breakfast in Pittsburgh and a dinner in Philadelphia, for example.

Much of what he doles out comes from the $650 million state capital fund, something all governors have used. But he also persuaded the Republican-controlled Legislature two years ago to approve a $1.3 billion economic stimulus package, another source of bond funds (i.e., borrowed money) to pay for projects.

The list of booster projects is seemingly endless: a new museum in downtown Hershey about the life of chocolate king Milton Hershey; the expansion of a museum dedicated to author James Michener near Philadelphia; Civil War trails near Gettysburg; a photographic equipment plant in Allentown; a music academy in Lancaster; a Dupont plant in Bradford County; a biomedical plant in Montgomery County, and many more.

In the Pittsburgh area, Mr. Rendell developed "Plan B" for ensuring the financing of a new $290 million multi-purpose arena for hockey and other events. He also agreed to advance the city and county $26.5 million to do site preparation work for a new arena.

At a recent Allegheny County Democratic picnic, Mr. Rendell had to correct County Chief Executive Dan Onorato when he thanked the governor for giving the county "about $1 billion."

"It's $1.1 billion," Mr. Rendell said, adding the Allegheny County share is the highest of any county.

That comment was aimed at deflecting criticism from Republicans who are fond of jibing that Mr. Rendell is "the governor of Philadelphia."

They cite items such as Mr. Rendell having state troopers patrol state roads in Philadelphia and help the city reduce costs; advancing planning funds for a major expansion of the city's 13-year-old convention center; and the $42 million from the state for a new Comcast skyscraper being built in Philadelphia.

Republicans claim Mr. Rendell has a conflict of interest on the latter item because he earns $20,000 a year as a Comcast football commentator on Sundays after Philadelphia Eagles games. Mr. Rendell said he donates the money to charity and said he saved several thousand Comcast jobs from going to New Jersey. Pointing out that state troopers patrol state roads in Pittsburgh and all other cities, the governor said he was merely putting Philadelphia on the same footing.

Working the crowd

One reason Mr. Rendell is a successful politician is that he genuinely seems at home in a crowd of people, even those he hardly knows.

At public events like the Harrisburg Farm Show each January, he wolfs down sausages and milk shakes as he shakes the hands of hundreds of show-goers. It's the same gregariousness he's displayed throughout his 30-year political career, which included eight years as Philadelphia district attorney and two terms as mayor of the city, a time when he garnered national attention for turning the economy of the city around. His success as mayor, and as a fund-raiser, led to Mr. Rendell serving as Democratic national committee chairman in 2000-01.

He showed the same affability in late August, when he went to two African-American churches in East Liberty to deliver a short secular sermon.

The pastor of Pentecostal Temple Church of God in Christ, the Rev. Loran Mann, a former television reporter, gave the governor a warm introduction, calling him "my friend" and thanking him for "naming me last year to the commission that sets policy for public television in the state."

A few blocks away, Mr. Rendell walked up to the pulpit of the St. James AME Church to the sound of hands clapping, tambourines banging and voices raised in shouts of "Amen" and "Praise Jesus."

"My core belief is that government can and should do things that make a difference in people's lives and take care of our vulnerable citizens, older people, poor people and young people," he said.

He listed what he considers his proudest achievements as governor: increasing state funding for public schools, for tutoring in math, pre-kindergarten education and all-day kindergarten; funds to put laptop computers in all high school classrooms within four years; for not cutting anyone off welfare rolls despite decreased federal funding; raising more money through Lottery sales to increase drug coverage for senior citizens; trying to reduce gun violence by limiting handgun sales to one per month.

He said Republicans are always "yelling about Democrats spending money. Well, we're not just spending money. We're spending money to improve education and that is investing in our future."

Mr. Rendell might have been expected to be at a political disadvantage in Pittsburgh's black neighborhoods, since Mr. Swann is black, lives in Allegheny County and remains popular among sports fans from his starring days as a receiver with the Steelers' Super Bowl teams of the 1970s.

But St. James choir member Genie Beckom said that even though she and Mr. Swann are black, it was Mr. Swann's political party that she had a problem with.

"I personally wouldn't put any Republican in the governor's office," she said. "It's not to the advantage of my race. Republicans are about cutting back on things we need, such as health care, welfare and education."

DOJ_NMG_0064803

Sylvia Allen, another St. James member, also likes Mr. Rendell, saying of Mr. Swann, "I'm not getting the feeling he's tuned in to us [African Americans] or connected to our problems. He's of a different status."

Obviously Mr. Rendell is pleased about his continuing lead in the polls, but when talking to supporters he downplays it, noting that in 2002, he trailed his Democratic primary opponent, then-Auditor General Robert P. Casey Jr., but came back to win the Democratic nomination for governor.

"No poll three months before an election means a thing," he told an Allegheny County Democratic picnic three weeks ago. "Don't get complacent. Work like heck. This is our year if we don't get overconfident."

Taylor, Perdue Talk The Talk Of Tax Cuts (AJC)

By Jim Galloway, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 17, 2006

Tax cuts became the language of the race for governor on Saturday, as Democratic nominee Mark Taylor vowed to eliminate the state property tax on more than 2.5 million Georgia homeowners.

Lifting the .25 mills now assessed by the state would force a $76 million cut in the state's annual budget, and would average $30 a year per homeowner — the amount varying according to the value of each house.

"There's one tax-cutter running for governor, and you're looking at him. The big guy likes big tax cuts," Taylor told several hundred screaming delegates attending the annual state Democratic Party convention in College Park.

Local government and school taxes make up the largest part of property taxes on Georgia homes. Campaign spokesman Rick Dent admitted that eliminating the state's share wouldn't have a huge impact on most taxpayers' household budgets.

"We won't say that it's a lot, but it's more than they've gotten from Sonny Perdue in four years. And it doesn't mean that's where [Taylor] is going to stop," Dent said.

Only days earlier, Republican incumbent Sonny Perdue, before a similar gathering of his own partisans, promised to eliminate the state income tax on retirement income — from pension funds and investments — for Georgians older than 65.

Perdue's cut would cost the state $142 million a year, and apply to between 250,000 and 400,000 people.

Derrick Dickey, a spokesman for Perdue, belittled Taylor's property tax proposal — pointing out that the Democrat was also promising increases in state spending on health insurance for children and education.

"He will no doubt promise every Georgian a Porsche and a shiny new toaster by Election Day," Dickey said on Saturday.

Neither Taylor nor Perdue offered budget cuts to offset their proposed reductions in state income. However, after three years of tight budgets, a strengthening economy and increased tax collections have resulted in a significant surplus.

The one-day gathering of Democrats was a chance for party activists to see the statewide and congressional candidates they had nominated in sometimes fierce primary battles over the summer.

Trying to broaden support base

As each candidate spoke, a common theme was the need for Democrats — ousted from power in the state Capitol in 2002 and 2004 — to broaden their base of support.

"Even if we turn out every Democratic vote, that will not be enough. We have to reach out to every independent, every Libertarian. Democrats have to move away from their comfort zone," said state Labor Commissioner Michael Thurmond, who faces Republican Brent Brown in November.

A platform passed by the convention backed positions staked out by Taylor, including a call to help local governments build more jail space in order to keep more violent offenders off the street.

The party platform took several shots at Perdue, with references to news reports of 2005 legislation sponsored by a business associate and state legislator that gave the governor a $100,000 tax deferral on a land sale.

"Public officials should not use their office for private enrichment," the platform reads, adding that future governors should be required to place their holdings in a blind trust.

Perdue also was a major foil for Taylor — on the issue of tax cuts.

"Sonny Perdue gave Georgia corporations a billion-dollar tax cut. But you didn't get a tax cut.

DOJ_NMG_0064804

"He could find the money for corporations, but he couldn't find the money for you. How did Sonny pay for his corporate giveaway? He cut your local schools by over $1 billion," Taylor said.

A spokesman for Perdue pointed out that the Republican governor had permanently extended the homestead exemption on property taxes, worth $434 million in the state's 2007 budget.

Taylor noted that Perdue had tried unsuccessfully to eliminate that exemption, which would have resulted in an increase in property taxes, when he first became governor in 2003.

Blue America, In More Ways Than One (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

In this autumn of their discontent, Republicans tremble as November nears. But now comes yet another book by a gloomy liberal anticipating permanent Republican dominance. Thomas B. Edsall of The New Republic, in "Building Red America: The New Conservative Coalition and the Drive for Permanent Power," argues that inexorable social forces, augmented by the conservatives' superior reservoirs of anger, ruthlessness and cynicism -- he neglects only the word "wickedness" -- favor Republicans, "the party of the socially and economically dominant."

The parties are almost at numerical parity, but Edsall, who until recently was a Washington Post political reporter, says Republicans represent people "more broadly skilled in economic combat" and "more accustomed to the rigors of the market." Hence Republicans can maintain "a thin but durable margin of victory." Their technique is "the symbolic manipulation of controversial sociocultural issues touching upon national security, patriotism, race, sex, and religion."

"The GOP," Edsall laments, "has achieved a gradual erosion of the popular consensus behind the major progressive and social-egalitarian movements of the twentieth century." But what actually "achieved" that? Edsall says the principal Republican objective has been to break "the trust . . . between the government and millions of its less advantaged citizens." But he acknowledges that Republicans have been helped "inestimably" by "the daily inefficiencies of government": "The monopoly nature of government guarantees that the public services will often lag in quality behind those delivered in the competitive private sector." Hence "the declining credibility of non-market solutions to economic problems" and the demoralization of "backers of a redistributive agenda."

Edsall complains that conservatives pursue an agenda that does not have the public's "decisive support." Whatever that means, liberals such as Edsall are ineligible to make that complaint. They increasingly have abandoned persuasion and legislation and resorted to litigation and judicial fiats to advance an agenda the public finds unpersuasive.

If Edsall is symptomatic, liberalism is lost in a time warp, thinking in antiquated categories. Edsall approvingly quotes a Democratic activist's opinion that there are twice as many angry conservatives as there are angry liberals: "Liberals by their very nature don't get as angry as conservatives do." Edsall, who evidently has not noticed the vitriol of the liberal blogosphere, is so blinded by his own anger he misperceives Republican realities.

The GOP, he says, courts whites "whose interests are overwhelmingly focused on tempering, if not altogether rolling back, the civil rights movement." Please. Who favors rolling back guarantees of voting rights and equal access to public accommodations?

If Edsall really thinks Republicans are marching efficiently in lock step, he has missed bitter intraparty arguments about spending, immigration and nation-building. Edsall says the conservative agenda is "to dismantle the welfare state." Oh? With a prescription drug entitlement that is the largest expansion of the welfare state since enactment of Medicare in 1965? With a 38 percent increase in discretionary domestic spending unrelated to homeland security -- including a 135 percent increase in the Education Department's budget -- since 2001?

When Edsall says middle- and working-class cultural conservatives vote for Republicans who then use their power "for noncultural objectives," he is voicing a familiar liberal lament: All would be well if voters would vote based on important issues -- material, economic concerns; their wallets -- rather than unimportant ones such as abortion, the definition of marriage, the coarsening of the culture and other moral anxieties. But if those issues are unimportant, why is it that liberals, adamantly supporting partial-birth abortion and celebrating judicial redefinitions of marriage, are so uncompromising about them? As Edsall says, liberalism has become bifurcated. The largest faction looks to government for material help. But the socially liberal "post-materialist" cadre "overwhelmingly sets" the party's agenda.

Edsall notes that one-third of American children -- and almost 70 percent of African American children -- are born to unmarried mothers. Then, in an astonishing passage about this phenomenon, which is the cause of most social pathologies, from crime to schools that cannot teach, he explains how Americans differ concerning what he calls "freedom from the need to maintain the marital or procreative bond."

"To social conservatives," he writes, "these developments have signaled an irretrievable and tragic loss. Their reaction has fueled, on the right, a powerful traditionalist movement and a groundswell of support for the Republican Party. To modernists, these developments constitute, at worst, the unfortunate costs of progress, and, at best -- and this is very much the view on the political left as well as of Democratic Party loyalists -- they constitute a triumph over unconscionable obstacles to the liberation and self-realization of much of the human race."

At Ford, Restructuring Now Job 1 (WT)

By Sean Lengell, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

When he stepped down this month as Ford Motor Co.'s president and chief executive, Bill Ford Jr. acknowledged the ailing, 103-year-old automaker must reinvent itself to survive in an increasingly competitive industry.

With the company announcing a deeper and accelerated restructuring plan Friday, it's obvious the auto giant's new chief executive, Alan Mulally, formerly executive vice president of Boeing, will lead a leaner, smaller and possibly more focused automaker.

But will that be enough?

"Right now, with so many variables, I would have to say the jury's still out," said Jeff Schuster, automotive analyst with J.D. Power and Associates, a global marketing information services firm. "I don't think Ford is going to disappear. ... But they will not recover that ground they've lost in the marketplace.

"So the question is: Can they operate profitably and can they have the image they once had? And I think it's all possible."

The road won't be simple or easy.

The company founded by Mr. Ford's great-grandfather, Henry Ford, lost $1.4 billion during the first half of the year. It is under pressure from Wall Street to make more cuts and roll out new cars and trucks more quickly.

Ford on Friday announced it was cutting more than 10,000 additional salaried jobs, offering buyouts to all of its 75,000 U.S. hourly workers and shutting down two more plants than previously announced.

The cuts are on top of Ford's previous plans to close 14 plants and will reduce its North American work force by almost one-third.

About 6,500 of the 82,000 Ford workers represented by the UAW have taken buyout and early-retirement offers made earlier this year, mainly at plants slated for closure.

The announcement came after the board of directors met for two days last week to discuss plans to cut jobs and shut factories at a rate faster than previously planned.

Wall Street didn't think the moves were enough, sending Ford shares down nearly 12 percent Friday to $8.02 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The cuts have the UAW's blessing.

"Once again, our members are stepping up to make hard choices under difficult circumstances," UAW President Ron Gettelfinger said.

Blurry focus

The biggest challenge for Ford is simple, analysts say: Produce cars and trucks the public wants.

DOJ_NMG_0064806

Ford's U.S. vehicle sales in August dropped 11.6 percent from a year earlier as the market continued to shift away from trucks and sport utility vehicles. Sales of SUVs and trucks, which the automaker has depended on for most of its revenue, fell 20.8 percent, compared with August 2005.

"Ford is really in the middle of a crisis right now that has been unfolding for some time," said Charlie Hughes, former head of North American operations for Land Rover and Mazda. "Certainly, the seeds of the problems were sown before [Mr. Ford] took over."

Ford had success in the 1980s with smaller cars such as the Escort and particularly the Taurus, which sold nearly 7 million vehicles during the past 20 years and had a longer run as the country's top seller than the Model T.

The company's F-series pickups and high-end sport utility vehicles also sold well from the 1990s through last year.

"Ford has three pillars of profitability, and they're all trucks: full-size pickups, full-size sport utilities and midsize sport utilities," said John Wolkonowicz, an automotive analyst with Global Insight, an automotive research and consulting firm. "Those are the products that make up about 100 percent of Ford's corporate profitability."

But they aren't enough to sustain the company, industry analysts say.

And with the SUV and pickup market as competitive as ever, and higher gasoline prices slowing sales of larger vehicles, Ford's future profitability remains in question.

"They're not producing very many products that get the consumer very excited," Mr. Wolkonowicz said. "When you have a product that the customer gets excited about, they beat a path to your showroom."

'Late in the game'

With the exception of the popular Mustang, the company's car lineup has been devoid of top sellers that can help offset slowing sales in the SUV and truck divisions.

"The market is much more competitive, and the margin of error is just so much smaller than it was, so you really can't afford to make any mistakes in terms of product," Mr. Schuster said. "Right now, that's the difference between Ford's position and GM's position; GM is showing some progress on the product side, and while at Ford there have been some bright spots, if you look at their whole [vehicle] lineup, they're lacking in that area with what the market has shifted toward."

The company turned to a large incentive and rebate program in an effort to attract customers.

"Ford is selling cars at incredible incentives and rebates with zero-percent financing and all these things that in my opinion tends to devalue the brand," said Laurie Harbour-Felax, a manufacturing analyst who specializes in the automotive and aerospace industries.

The company has high expectations for its new CUV, or cross-utility vehicle, called the Edge -- a smaller, more fuel-efficient version of larger SUVs.

"CUVs really are where the market is going, and Ford is a little bit late in the game," Mr. Schuster said.

Still, the Edge, scheduled to hit the showrooms later this year, has potential to be a big winner for Ford, analysts say.

"This will be an important vehicle for Ford," Mr. Schuster said.

Partnership options

A merger of Ford with another automaker, similar to the German-American partnership of DaimlerChrysler, remains a possibility.

"Mr. Ford himself said that a merger is something he would certainly entertain," Mr. Wolkonowicz said. "And I don't think you'd need to limit it to a European company."

Automakers Renault SA and Nissan Motor Co. are interested in purchasing a significant stake in Ford rival General Motors. A similar partnership with an Asian automaker "could help" Ford, Mr. Wolkonowicz said.

Others aren't so sure, saying a joint venture with another automaker would do little to cure Ford's ills.

"Would a merger help? In my opinion, no, because the issues they face are things that they need to clean up within the company," Mr. Hughes said.

A less formal relationship, such as the partnership between Japan's Nissan and France's Renault, is more likely, Mrs. Harbour-Felax said.

DOJ_NMG_0064807

Ford was reported this summer to be considering taking the company private, but on Friday denied it was entertaining that option.

"I wouldn't rule anything out," Mrs. Harbour-Felax said. "These guys surprise me every day."

Expand or streamline?

Rather than expanding through a merger, many specialists say Ford instead should streamline its product line, which they say is bogged down with too many poor sellers. It already is getting out of the minivan business.

Mr. Hughes said Ford overextended itself by acquiring so many companies over the years, which muddied the automaker's focus and diluted its image.

Ford has sought a buyer for its Aston Martin division. Some analysts add the company also should consider eliminating some other properties, which include Land Rover, Mazda, Volvo, Jaguar and its American icon Lincoln-Mercury line.

"The world we live in today is an oversaturated world. There are too many brands and too many products which are not distinguishable," Mr. Hughes said.

Ford must focus on strengthening its identity and image by producing more signature products such as the Mustang and F-series trucks, Mr. Hughes said. It also must do a better job branding and marketing those products.

He added the company should focus on its Ford, Volvo and Jaguar lines because each is a well-known worldwide brand.

"A signature product should be an extension of what the brand promises. It can't be something you stick a badge on at the end," Mr. Hughes said. "To set yourself apart in the marketplace, you have to stand for something. And whatever you stand for has to permeate in every bit of the company -- in everything you do."

Ford officials Friday made a point of saying that the exclusive Jaguar brand would not be sold.

"Jaguar is not for sale, and we'll let you know if that changes," Mark Schulz, president of Ford's international operations, said during a conference call with analysts after the restructuring announcement.

Selling off divisions may be a tough call for Ford because the company has invested heavily in "commonalization," a process of sharing parts and designs among many car platforms.

"So to sell off one of those brands I think poses some challenges for Ford if they want to move forward," Mrs. Harbour-Felax said. "The reason the Japanese are beating us is they have common platforms and common components that you can share."

Cutting costs

No matter what restructuring path Ford takes, the company will have fewer employees, factories and expenses in coming years.

The company announced in January a "Way Forward" restructuring plan intended to restore it to profitability by 2008. The plan called for $5.5 billion to $6 billion in cuts companywide, primarily centering on reduced hourly labor costs. As many as 30,000 jobs may be cut and 14 facilities closed by 2012.

Ford accelerated those plans in July when the Japanese automaker Toyota Motor Corp. outsold Ford in the U.S. for the first month ever.

On Friday, Ford announced it was cutting an additional 10,000 salaried jobs and closing two more plants.

Despite the cuts, relations between Ford and its unions may not be as frosty as in the past. Industry specialists say there seems to be a willingness in the UAW and other auto-related unions to work with Ford on drafting long-range plans to save the company.

"The unions seem to realize that it's in their best interest to at least try to be part of a solution and not hold steady to a position that is just outdated," Mr. Schuster said.

Mr. Mulally is an aggressive leader not shy to make cuts. He cut or outsourced some 50,000 positions at Boeing, his former company, and streamlined its product line.

His tactics paid off, and Mr. Mulally is credited with turning around the once-struggling airplane manufacturer.

"If anyone has a chance to turn around Ford, it's him," said Richard Aboulafia, an aviation analyst with the Teal Group. "He's got tremendous success. He's got virtually limitless energy, a lot of charisma -- he's a great leader."

'No time to waste'

Still, the challenges Mr. Mulally faces at Ford are daunting.

DOJ_NMG_0064808

"A lot of people have tried to change the Big Three and failed," Mr. Aboulafia said.

And Ford lacks a key executive who can foster product development and branding, Mr. Schuster said.

"Ford is only halfway there," he said. "They have the turnaround guy. They don't have a product guy."

Product development in the industry is a laboriously slow process, typically taking five years or more from conception to production. But whatever changes occur must be done quickly, analysts say.

"Nobody in this industry has any time to sit back and be patient," Mrs. Harbour-Felax said. "Things [in the automotive industry] are moving almost as rapidly as the computer industry.

"There's no time to waste."

Richards 'Never Gave Up On Texas,' Clinton Says (DMN)

Tearful leader praises former governor while crowd lines up to pay respects

AP Cecile Richards, daughter of former Texas Gov. Ann Richards, escorts former President Bill Clinton past her mother's flag-draped casket to introduce him to family members during a ceremony in the Capitol Rotunda.

AUSTIN – Former President Bill Clinton wiped away tears as he stood near his friend Ann Richards' flag-draped casket at the Texas Capitol on Saturday, describing a woman with "big hair, big bright eyes, big blinding smile ... big heart and big dreams."

"We loved her," he said of the former Texas governor. "We loved her because we knew she loved us, and because she made us bigger. ... I love that she never gave up on Texas."

Nearby, her granddaughter Lily Adams, whom Ms. Richards bragged about in her famous speech at the 1988 Democratic convention, cried as she hugged the flag that was flying over the Texas Capitol on the day Ms. Richards died – a gift from Gov. Rick Perry.

A friend of Bill and Hillary Clinton for three decades, Ms. Richards, 73, died of esophageal cancer at her home in Austin on Wednesday. Mr. Clinton joined the Richards family Saturday in escorting the casket to the rotunda; Ms. Richards' body is lying in state there over the weekend.

Somber setting

Her painted portrait, draped by a black scarf, hangs among those of myriad male governors, a few frames away from the painting of the only other female Texas governor, Ma Ferguson.

Sprays of white tulips and lilies on either side of her casket adorned the intimate elegance of the rotunda, in the center of the Capitol. It's where tour groups usually gather to take pictures and listen to their voices bounce off the marble floors and up inside the massive dome.

A Richards family friend, advertising executive Roy Spence, contributed short scaffolds with more than two dozen images of Ms. Richards: arms in the air during a speech, shaking hands with supporters, beaming her megawatt smile in almost all of them.

Outside, Texans from all over the state stood in line, waiting to pay their respects to the governor they said made an immeasurable impact on their lives – as friends, as strangers, as women and minorities and children and grandparents.

"I was in the front line when Ann took the governor's office. I walked up Congress Avenue that day," said Austin resident Melissa Gonzales, who came with her 13-year-old daughter, Elena Gonzales-Melinger. "It was kind of important for me to be here when she was back in the Capitol, as sad as it is. And it's nice that it's the same color line. It's all women, and women of color."

Inside the building, a small group of Ms. Richards' loved ones listened as Mr. Clinton spoke for about eight minutes about his "spontaneous, unedited, earthy and hilarious" friend.

Then he walked over to the casket, touched the Texas flag draped over it, bowed his head, and then nodded and began comforting her friends and family members.

In the balcony overhead, the Conspirare Children's Choir of Austin sang a somber, melodic version of "Sing a Song," a tune first performed by The Carpenters for an episode of Sesame Street, with lyrics that seemed written for Ms. Richards.

"Sing, sing a song/Sing out loud/Sing out strong."

Mr. Clinton, who struggled to compose himself as the casket was brought out of the hearse and into the Capitol, was escorted through the building by Ms. Richards' daughter Cecile Richards.

Ms. Richards' daughter Ellen and son Daniel cried as they thanked him for being a friend and honorary pallbearer.

Mr. Perry and his wife, Anita, greeted the family in a private gathering in the lieutenant governor's meeting room before attending Mr. Clinton's remarks in the rotunda.

It took Mr. Clinton several seconds to control his emotions and start speaking. He told of a woman of inspiration, fire and humor, and, as most do, he had stories.

In New York a few years ago, Ms. Richards invited him to lunch. At the table were Billy Crystal, Robin Williams, Diane Sawyer, friend Liz Smith and a few others.

After two hours of laughing so hard he was crying, Mr. Clinton said, he thought to himself, "I bet this is the first time in their lives that Billy Crystal and Robin Williams have been the second- and third-funniest people at the table."

"I've had three people tell me since she died that they only wish they had written down every single thing she ever said," he said.

Saturday was the first time the public was able to pay respects to the popular governor. Austin resident Bobby Adcock was there at 7 a.m. to be first in line. By 9 a.m., the crowd was lined up around the side of the building.

The closed-casket public visitation lasts through today.

'Wonderful person'

"I appointed myself as Ann's stalker many years ago," said Ms. Adcock, a retired state employee who has a framed, autographed picture she says she'll "cherish for the rest of my life."

"Every time I saw her I'd say, 'Hey, Annie! Go get 'em!' I just really loved her," Ms. Adcock said. "I admired her for what she stood for, her integrity, her honesty, her wit. She was a wonderful, wonderful person."

Students from Austin school bands paid her a tribute before a scheduled parade down Congress Avenue. People left flowers – yellow roses, mostly – and candles and notes of admiration next to the Capitol steps.

DOJ_NMG_0064810

Marjorie and Jaime Garcia of Corpus Christi were in town visiting. "We admired her for years. I never met her, but every time she came on TV, we would watch her," Ms. Garcia said. "This is my chance to honor a great lady."

Former Texas Governor Richards Lies In Repose (WP/AP)

Clinton Recalls the Champion of a 'New Texas' as a Woman With 'Big Dreams'

AUSTIN, Sept. 16 -- Former president Bill Clinton on Saturday tearfully escorted the flag-draped casket of former governor Ann Richards into the state Capitol, where she will lie in repose for two days until her funeral and burial.

Clinton delivered poignant and at times funny recollections of the woman he called "spontaneous, unedited, earthy, hilarious."

He told mourners about a lunch he shared in New York with a group that included Richards.

"I thought to myself, I bet this is the only time in their entire lives that Billy Crystal and Robin Williams are the second- and third-funniest people at the table," he said, drawing chuckles from misty-eyed family members.

Richards, the Democrat known for her big, frosty-white hair and sharp wit, died Wednesday at the age of 73 from esophageal cancer.

"In this case, goodbye is also a celebration, because of the big things that Ann Richards did," Clinton said.

A Texas Department of Public Safety honor guard rolled the casket into the Capitol rotunda, followed by Clinton and Richards's daughter Cecile, as a girls' choir sang a hymn from a gallery above. Across the rotunda, Richards's portrait hung next to one of President Bush, her successor as Texas governor, among their predecessors. Her portrait was draped in black.

Clinton called Richards "Texas on parade."

"For 30-plus years, that is certainly what she was to me and Hillary," he said. "First she was big: big hair, big bright eyes, big blinding smile. She also had a big heart, big dreams, did big deeds."

During her one term as governor, from 1991 to 1995, she championed what she called the "New Texas," appointing more women and minorities to state posts than any of her predecessors.

Clinton described the world that Richards wanted for her grandchildren as one "where young girls grew up to be scientists, engineers, police officers and teachers . . . where the dreams and the spirit were as big as the sky in her beloved home."

When Clinton finished speaking, Richards's daughter Ellen thanked him for "all the great times that you shared with our mom."

Clinton paused for a moment beside the casket, then greeted family members, hugging or shaking hands with each one in attendance. At one point, he bent down to comfort Richards's 8-year-old grandson Wyatt, who broke down in sobs.

The Academic Blues (NYT)

By Michael Bérubé

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

So far as I know, my department, like many university departments of English, consists of wall-to-wall Democrats. If my faculty colleagues have any good words to say about George Bush's fiscal or foreign policies, they're keeping them to themselves.

Every year around this time, you'll hear complaints about the liberal campus elite — usually from the political right, one wing of which has talked itself into believing that, as George Will phrased it in The Washington Post two years ago, "Many campuses are intellectual versions of one-party nations — except such nations usually have the merit, such as it is, of candor about their ideological monopolies." The political tilt of American college faculties is a fact well established, though the actual ratio of liberals to conservatives — just under 3 to 1, according to the most comprehensive survey, conducted by U.C.L.A. researchers — is routinely exaggerated (10 to 1! 20! 30!) by those who believe that we liberals are actively conspiring to keep dissenting voices off the faculty roster. But the truth is that no one knows what the applicant pool looks like. For all we know, in the arts and humanities (and even some of the biological sciences), the number of bright young conservative aspirants may be no greater than it is for your average Broadway production of "Torch Song Trilogy." But charges of pervasive "liberal bias" on campus tend to play better than demographic reports on how young conservatives go about choosing their career paths, so every year the preponderance of Democrats in English departments is trotted out as if it were a decisive refutation of everything for which liberalism claims to stand.

Last year, legislators in my home state, Pennsylvania, were so perturbed by reports of liberal bias that they created a House committee on academic freedom to determine whether conservative students were subject to discrimination at Pennsylvania's public universities. In one way, the very formation of the committee was a triumph for conservative culture warriors — in particular, the conservative culture warrior David Horowitz, who has spent the past three years promoting his "Academic Bill of Rights," which seeks to protect students from "biased" courses and lecturers. But the committee also dealt a blow to Horowitz's campaign: in his own testimony to the committee, Horowitz himself admitted that he had no evidence for his claim that a Penn State biology professor subjected his class to Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 9/11" on the eve of the 2004 election, and Penn State revealed that it had received all of 13 student complaints about political "bias" over the past five years — on a campus with a student population of 40,000. Those 13 complaints didn't fit any clear red-blue pattern either: a Muslim student suggested that a professor was disrespectful to Islam; another student said that a professor was too conservative.

Last February, Horowitz also published "The Professors: The 101 Most Dangerous Academics in America," a book in which I was pleased to be included — until I learned that the dangerous were merely listed alphabetically, and that I was not assigned a rank or degree of dangerosity. And every so often, someone on the academic left does Horowitz and company the favor of saying something foolish or simply outrageous about 9/11 or Iraq, and the grist meets the mill once again.

Whenever that happens, people lose sight of two critical features of campus life. The first is that most cases of "politically correct" limits on student speech do not involve radical teachers in the classroom; rather, they tend to arise from clashes between students and university administrations, as when a Penn State art student was told by a campus gallery that he could not exhibit his paintings of various Palestinian leaders, which he'd titled "Portraits of Terror" (a decision later reversed). Sometimes, when college administrations and student-affairs offices ask that everyone treat everyone else with civility and respect (whether out of liberal convictions, or a simple desire to keep the boat from rocking), they do it incompetently or counterproductively. But those episodes are not the work of Dangerous Professors.

The second is that classroom dynamics are more dynamic than most accounts admit. In a discussion of Richard Powers's novel "Prisoner's Dilemma," I had a student who insisted that the wartime internment of Japanese-Americans was perfectly justified; in a class on bioethics, a colleague of mine had a student who complained that the class wasn't doing justice to all the benefits of experimenting on unwitting human subjects. There is no easy way for professors to handle these remarks, no matter what their political convictions; all we know is that we must try to treat our students fairly — and try to make sure their peers treat them fairly, a far more difficult task — even when they say things we might consider uninformed or obnoxious, no matter where on the ideological spectrum those remarks might fall.

Every responsible teacher should think of the classroom as a relatively safe space, free of intimidation or coercion. But in return, every responsible student should realize that the classroom is only relatively safe, because arguing about ideas isn't risk-free. Of course, students sometimes have qualms about taking classes with overtly partisan professors. "As conservatives," Julie Aud, a student at the University of Indiana and press secretary for her chapter of the College Republicans, told CBS News, "we should never have to feel uncomfortable in the classroom because of our beliefs." Perhaps so, but as students, you should expect to feel uncomfortable about your beliefs as a matter of course — that is, if your professors are doing their job properly, and keeping the floor open for every reasonable form of debate and disagreement.

U.S. Asks Finance Chiefs To Limit Iran's Access To Banks (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

SINGAPORE, Sept. 16 — The United States pressed the top finance officials of the world's leading industrial nations on Saturday to crack down on what Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. said was the exploitation of their banking systems by at least 30 Iranian front companies involved in illicit activities.

DOJ_NMG_0064812

Mr. Paulson said he had told the finance and economic ministers that the front companies were identified by American intelligence agencies as funneling money to terrororist groups using banks in Europe and elsewhere, many of them "blue chip banks."

Mr. Paulson said that many leading trading companies in Iran with legitimate business operations were also involved in the illicit activities, and that it behooved any legitimate bank to realize that it was risky to continue doing even legitimate business with the companies.

He called on banks around the world to be "vigilant" in opposing such risks and to avoid "inadvertently facilitating the kinds of activities that they wouldn't want to facilitate."

"Iran is a country that has broad, deep and commercial relationships with much of the world that have gone on for some time," Mr. Paulson told reporters here. "This was nothing more than an educational briefing to prepare financial institutions for dealing with some of the risks that are out there."

He said banks around the world also needed to stop doing business with North Korea, but added that North Korea was already almost entirely isolated from the world's financial system. By contrast, Iran is still a major player globally.

The Treasury chief's comments came after he met with his counterparts from Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Canada, Japan and the European Union, who had come for the annual gathering of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

The comments appeared to reflect the emerging Bush administration strategy on Iran as efforts to impose sanctions by the United Nations Security Council have faltered.

The administration charges that Iran has a secret nuclear weapons program, a charge that Iran denies. Iran is also accused of transferring funds to Hezbollah and other Islamic militant organizations through regular commercial banks.

Last week, in what administration officials call a major escalation in the effort to squeeze Iran economically, the Treasury Department announced that Bank Saderat, a major bank in Iran, would no longer have even indirect access to the United States financial system.

Banking experts say that the decree means that Iran will have difficulty selling anything for dollars through Bank Saderat, because any commercial exchange that uses dollars normally obtains them from an American bank. Oil in particularly is always traded in dollars. Many banking experts say the administration may make other banks off-limits soon.

After the announcement on Bank Saderat, two senior Treasury officials visited Europe to try to persuade regulators and banks to stop doing business with Bank Saderat and any other banks that are alleged to be involved in illicit activities. Some European banks have already curtailed their activities with Iran, but many leading banks have refused.

Stuart Levey, under secretary of the Treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence, visited Britain, France, Switzerland, Italy and Germany, and the deputy Treasury secretary, Robert Kimmitt, went to Germany. France, Italy and Germany have extensive commercial relations with Iran and its trading companies.

The Treasury Department has declined to say whom they met with.

Iran was only one of many subjects in Mr. Paulson's meetings with the finance ministers. Also on the agenda was a discussion of the world economy, which Mr. Paulson said had grown in recent years at rates that he and others had not seen in a generation. Despite that, he acknowledged risks arising from the failure of recent global trade talks, high energy prices and the problem of what are called "economic imbalances."

That phrase is a euphemism for a broad set of problems, including the fact that the United States imports much more than it exports and has thus become the world's leading debtor, owing hundreds of billions of dollars to China, Japan and other trading partners. The United States says this problem can be remedied by the trading partners importing more from the United States and also by China allowing its currency to rise in value in relation to the dollar.

In a statement Saturday, the finance ministers of the leading industrial countries said, "Greater exchange rate flexibility is desirable in emerging economies with large current-account surpluses, especially China."

As the finance ministers hold their meetings, representatives of more than 500 nongovernmental groups — many of them dissenting from the policies of the bank, the fund and rich countries — are holding meetings on the sidelines.

DOJ_NMG_0064813

But Singapore's initial refusal to allow many of the representatives into the country gave them too little time to get here, even after Singapore relented under political pressure. As a result, several of the most outspoken critics of globalization are not at the meetings.

Treasury Warns G-7 About Iran (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Paulson Describes Financial Network to Help Nuclear Drive

SINGAPORE, Sept. 16 -- U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. used his first meeting of world finance chiefs on Saturday as a venue to press the Bush administration's mission to isolate Iran and choke its nuclear aspirations.

Emerging from a meeting of finance ministers representing the Group of Seven industrialized nations, Paulson said he urged his counterparts to intensify efforts to prevent banks and private companies in their countries from being used as unwitting conduits for financing and materials aiding Iran's ambitions. He said scores of seemingly legitimate businesses are fronts in what the United States contends is a broad Iranian campaign to gain weapons of mass destruction and support terrorist groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas.

"There's a broad network of front companies, and these are not front companies that say 'Nuclear Acquisition Corp.' or 'Weapons Production Corp.,' " Paulson said at a news conference after the meeting. "These are mundane-sounding companies that do many legitimate activities, but in addition, do some of these untoward and illicit activities."

The Treasury Department's campaign comes after the Bush administration's failure to secure United Nations sanctions against Iran. Paulson portrayed the initiative as "an education job," giving his counterparts the ability to act voluntarily. Treasury officials have been dispatched worldwide in recent days to meet with finance ministers, banks and private companies, sharing intelligence aimed at illuminating how the Iranian network operates.

"There are finance ministers all over the world who want to do the right thing," Paulson said.

In a statement issued after the meeting, the G-7 finance ministers lent general support.

"We agreed to intensify our efforts to combat money laundering, proliferation network[s], as well as terrorist and illicit financing by addressing global financial vulnerabilities, particularly those associated with jurisdictions that have failed to recognize international standards," they said. (The G-7 consists of the United States, Japan, Britain, Germany, France, Canada and Italy.)

Paulson also pressed to resurrect a stalled effort aimed at boosting global trade. The Doha round of trade talks disbanded in July after years of fruitless wrangling, with poor countries accusing the United States and Europe of killing the chance for a deal by refusing to sufficiently reduce protective tariffs on agricultural goods. Paulson said the Bush administration remains willing to lift more tariffs, provided that U.S. exporters gain greater rights to sell their products abroad.

Paulson, who is to visit China on Tuesday, also reiterated the administration's long-standing contention that China must increase the value of its currency, the yuan. Manufacturers in the United States and elsewhere complain that a low-price Chinese currency makes Chinese goods unfairly cheap on world markets, effectively stealing jobs. China maintains that it is being cast as a scapegoat for the demise of U.S. manufacturing.

"I discourage high expectations for immediate results," Paulson said of his trip. "That's not the way the world works when you're dealing with important issues. I'm going to be listening."

He declined to put a number to his hopes for the yuan's increase.

"I certainly don't have a specific target for China," he said. "That would be presumptuous of me."

Echoing language it used in April, the G-7 singled out China and its controls over the value of its money as a source of "disorderly movements" in the global economy. "Greater exchange rate flexibility is desirable in emerging economies with large current account surpluses, especially China, for necessary adjustments to occur," the finance ministers said in their statement.

Paulson was largely focused on Iran, which stems not from any new intelligence but rather from having come to the job fresh in June, and then absorbing briefings, Treasury Department officials said on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak as individuals.

Paulson realized that while North Korea -- another source of concern about nuclear weapons -- was already sealed off from the international financial system, Iran remains integrated, with banks and trading firms throughout the world, including Western Europe, continuing to do business with the country.

Last week, the Bush administration announced that it had shut down access to the U.S. financial system for an Iranian state-owned institution, Bank Saderat, asserting that in recent years it has funneled some $50 million to organizations branded terrorist by the United States and the European Union.

Overall, Iran has in recent years delivered about $200 million a year to terrorist groups, including $50 million to Hezbollah in 2001 and again in 2002, said Stuart Levey, Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

In recent days, Levey and other Treasury officials have been in England, France, Switzerland, Italy, Germany and the United Arab Emirates to meet with officials of banks and private companies, offering counsel on how to limit their vulnerability to being used by Iran. Visits are planned in Asia.

U.S. Lobbies Countries, Bankers To Sever Financial Ties With Iran (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, September 17, 2006

SINGAPORE -- Frustrated in its efforts to secure U.N. sanctions on Iran, the Bush administration is trying to convince individual governments and banks to sever financial relationships that allegedly allow Tehran to finance its nuclear ambitions and foreign terrorist groups.

Speaking to reporters on the sidelines of the Group of Seven meeting, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said he has dispatched aides to Europe and the Persian Gulf in recent days, where he has instructed them to lay out the U.S. case that Iran has been using dozens of front companies to fool banks into facilitating illicit financial transactions.

"There are a lot of ministers and banks around the world that are honorable and want to do the right thing," Mr. Paulson said.

The lobbying campaign comes on the heels of Treasury's decision this month to ban Iran's Bank Saderat from access to the U.S. financial system, either directly or through its relationships with foreign banks. Stuart Levey, undersecretary of the Treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence, claimed that, among other transactions, the bank had helped funnel $200 million to Hezbollah, the Shiite Muslim extremist group whose capture of two Israeli soldiers touched off the recent spate of fighting between Israel and Lebanon.

Mr. Paulson, the former chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., decided to approach banks and foreign governments individually not long after he took over at Treasury in June. After a staff briefing on Iran's use of front companies to move money illicitly, Mr. Paulson wondered aloud whether commercial bankers knew they were, in essence, doing business with sponsors of terrorism.

He then instructed Mr. Levey to put together an unclassified road show that would detail Iranian practices. Last week Mr. Levey presented it to bankers and officials in Britain, France, Italy and Switzerland, with other Treasury aides presenting the case in Germany, the United Arab Emirates and elsewhere. Treasury plans to continue the campaign indefinitely, regardless of whether the U.N. Security Council decides to impose sanctions on Tehran.

The officials selected banks and countries they felt confident would use the information to shut down illicit flows.

Mr. Paulson himself discussed the situation with his G7 counterparts during Saturday's Singapore meeting. "We agreed to intensify our efforts to combat money laundering, proliferation network[s], as well as terrorist and illicit financing by addressing global financial vulnerabilities, particularly those associated with jurisdictions that have failed to recognize international standards," the G7 ministers said in a communiqué issued that evening.

The G7 includes the U.S., Britain, Germany, Japan, France, Italy and Canada.

Paulson Surprised By Iran `Front' Companies' Access (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Kevin Carmichael

Bloomberg, September 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064815

Sept. 16 (Bloomberg) -- Henry Paulson, who left Goldman Sachs Group Inc. in May to become the U.S. Treasury Secretary, said he was surprised to learn the extent to which Iranian front companies had infiltrated the financial system, prompting him to organize an ``education'' program for banks and governments.

``This is a perspective that I brought to Treasury,'' Paulson said today at a press conference in Singapore. ``In my former job, if there was a risk like that, I would have liked someone to explain it to me. It would be quite easy for a financial institution to inadvertently facilitate the kinds of activities they wouldn't want to facilitate.''

The remarks help explain a stronger focus on Iran at the Treasury in the past couple of weeks.

On Sept. 9, the Treasury barred Americans from doing business with Bank Saderat, one of Iran's biggest state-owned lenders. Stuart Levey, Paulson's top lieutenant for terror finance, followed that move with a week-long trip to Europe, where he presented banks and governments with evidence of how Iran might be using the financial system to funnel money to terrorists and buy materials to build a nuclear weapon.

Paulson continued the effort today in Singapore, where he used a meeting of finance ministers and central bankers from the Group of Seven nations to encourage his counterparts to disrupt the financing of illicit activities in Iran and North Korea. He told reporters that his department had evidence that many banks, including ``blue chip'' institutions, are ``inadvertently'' supporting nefarious activities in Iran.

`Broad Network'

``There's a broad network of front companies, and these are not front companies that say `Nuclear Acquisition Corp.' or `Weapons Production Corp,'" Paulson, who quit as Goldman's chief executive officer to replace John Snow at Treasury, said at the press conference. ``These are mundane sounding companies that do many legitimate activities, but in addition, do some of these untoward and illicit activities.''

Treasury's effort comes with a veiled warning that international banks risk losing access to the U.S. financial system by doing business with the wrong Iranian company.

``Our goal is to make it harder, costlier and riskier to raise funds and move the funds through the international financial system,'' Daniel Glaser, Treasury's deputy assistant secretary for terror finance, said in an interview in Washington on Sept. 12.

UN Sanctions

The Bush administration also is pushing the United Nations to sanction Iran for defying a UN demand that the Islamic Republic stop enriching uranium. European nations are taking a more conciliatory approach, seeking talks with Iran before penalties are imposed. Iran said it's willing to talk and is seeking negotiations without delay.

The U.S. accuses Iran, which has the world's second-biggest oil and natural gas reserves, of trying to make a nuclear weapon. Iran says its program is intended only to fuel power stations.

International banks including HSBC Group and Credit Suisse Group are doing less business with Iran after the U.S. said they risk being cut off from the U.S. banking system, said Daniel Glaser, a Treasury deputy assistant secretary.

HSBC and Credit Suisse have ``limited their exposure to Iranian business,'' and UBS AG cut off all dealings with Iran earlier this year, Glaser said in testimony to the Senate Banking Committee on Sept. 12. Other banks have refused to issue new letters of credit to Iran, he said.

``This is noting more than an educational briefing to prepare financial institutions for the risks that are out there,'' Paulson said in Singapore. ``The point I made to finance ministers is that we have a job to do.''

Two Tracks On Iran: Keep Talking, And Weigh Penalties (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 16 — After intense talks about Iran's nuclear program, the United States and other major world powers face two unappealing choices as the United Nations General Assembly opens this week: introduce a resolution in the Security Council for sanctions against Tehran that may not be tough enough to make a difference, or delay any punitive measures, rendering their diplomacy on Iran meaningless.

DOJ_NMG_0064816

So the Bush administration, along with Russia, China, France, Britain and Germany, have quietly shifted their strategy.

In June, the six global powers offered Iran a take-it-or-leave-it package of incentives in an effort to persuade the country to abandon its nuclear ambitions. No negotiations would start unless Iran first froze its uranium enrichment activities.

Now the six countries have offered a major concession. They are embarking on a two-track approach that allows the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, to conduct open-ended negotiations with Iran on the conditions for a suspension while the Security Council weighs punitive measures.

Mr. Solana and Iran's chief negotiator, Ali Larijani, met twice last weekend and plan to hold talks on Sunday in New York, a senior Bush administration official said.

"I think there's a chance that Iran sees it has to move," a European diplomat said Friday. "We want to get those people to the table. The key thing here is to leave the door open."

In diplomatic terms, the embrace of what is being called the practical, two-track approach looks like a subtle change. But in reality it is a fundamental shift and an admission of how few options President Bush and his European allies have.

The Iran negotiations have a certain "Groundhog Day'' quality. In the fall of 2003, the United States was raising pressure on its European allies to refer Iran to the Security Council for sanctions. But with Russia and China threatening to veto, Britain, France and Germany worked out a deal with Iran: no referral of Iran's nuclear program to the Security Council if Iran suspended uranium enrichment, the first step in making fuel for nuclear power or a bomb.

A lot has happened since then, but one thing is the same: Iran is still enriching uranium.

The Bush administration is again ready to push forward on a sanctions package at the United Nations, but it is doubtful whether the United States and Europe will get Russia and China to sign on to anything but relatively mild sanctions, at least at first. Many analysts contend that Iran can withstand most of the measures under consideration, which include a travel ban against Iranian officials working in the nuclear program and restrictions on the sale of nuclear components to Tehran.

If Europe and the United States insist on tougher sanctions, Russia and China might balk, and the coalition — fragile, but a conduit for pressure nonetheless — could fall apart. That is why, despite the expiration of the Aug. 31 deadline for Iran to suspend enrichment or face sanctions, the United States and Europe remain willing to keep talking.

Or rather, the United States remains willing to speak through Europe.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pushed President Bush to offer to end Washington's policy of nearly three decades against direct talks with Iran if it suspended uranium enrichment. Iran has been seeking direct talks on any subject, seeking recognition of its growing regional influence and validation from its longstanding opponent.

But even though the Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is also scheduled to be in New York for the General Assembly, Mr. Bush has dismissed the possibility of the two meeting.

At a news conference on Friday, he said: "I have made it clear to the Iranian regime that we will sit down with the Iranians once they verifiably suspend their enrichment program. I meant what I said."

Nor will Ms. Rice or R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs, meet with Mr. Larijani, American officials said.

But, they said, administration officials will certainly be monitoring the Larijani-Solana talks.

Foreign ministers from the six countries are planning to meet to discuss Iran on Tuesday or Wednesday.

European and American diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity according to normal diplomatic protocol, are still trying to determine whether Iran is serious about an offer they say Mr. Larijani made to suspend uranium enrichment for two months.

The diplomats say that Mr. Larijani has made the same overture several times, only to take it back, leaving the impression that he does not have the full authority to negotiate and that Iran's leadership is divided on nuclear strategy. The Iranians' 20-page response to the European Union on the proffered incentives — rambling and imprecise — strongly suggests that there are differing camps within Iran.

Indeed, in remarks to reporters on Friday, Mr. Solana acknowledged that there are divisions in Tehran, which he said were the reason he did not meet with Mr. Larijani this week. "A little bit more time was needed in order to reach a consensus in his own country among his own leadership" to "convey to me a possible positive answer," Mr. Solana said.

The European foreign policy chief's inclination to continue talking, meanwhile, has frustrated the Bush administration.

"Larijani and Solana have been engaged in this minuet," a senior Bush administration official said. "The U.S. view is that those talks are worthwhile, but not sufficient. We will be moving early in the week to move forward on a sanctions resolution."

If Iran does take up the offer, it is one that the United States and Europe should not refuse, said Robert J. Einhorn, a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies and former assistant secretary of state for nonproliferation under President Bill Clinton.

"If the Europeans and Iranians can cobble together even a limited-duration suspension, we could dodge another bullet, at least for a while," Mr. Einhorn said. But, he added, "it's not at all clear we're going to get to that point. Even their initial offer had a lot of provisos."

Some analysts say that neither the international pressure on Iran, nor Iran's enrichment program, is likely to end soon.

"Next year," said George Perkovich, a nonproliferation expert at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington, "we're going to be at the same spot still."

Analysis: Bush Sees Fewer Policy Options (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 17, 2006

When President Bush addresses world leaders at the United Nations this week, he will have fewer options and lower expectations on almost every major foreign policy front than a year ago.

The United States is relying more readily on international institutions and alliances for help in Iran, Lebanon, North Korea, Sudan and elsewhere. Yet, according to analysts, the Bush administration has less room to maneuver.

Bush and his foreign policy advisers have tried with some success to dispel the caricature of Bush abroad as a Texas cowboy riding alone and herding the U.S. into an unpopular war in Iraq.

But the war, now in its fourth year, devours resources and energy for other global objectives and feeds mistrust about U.S. intentions, experts say.

"I'm not sure they have changed their mind about to what extent to proceed unilaterally and how much to use military force so much as they have run out of options," said Richard Stoll, a political science professor at Rice University who studies foreign policy and national security.

With Bush nearly halfway through his final term, time is dwindling for him to accomplish his signature goals of confronting terrorism and spreading democracy, and he faces more distractions at home, said Andrew Bacevich, a professor of international relations at Boston University.

When the president speaks to the U.N. General Assembly on Tuesday, he plans to carry a strong message, "based upon hope, and my belief that the civilized world must stand with moderate, reformist-minded people and help them realize their dreams.

"I believe that's the call of the 21st century," Bush told reporters Friday.

A scan of the globe, however, points up the defensive posture for the U.S. these days and the changed circumstances from a year ago:

_In Afghanistan, a military setback at the hands of a reconstituted Taliban took the administration by surprise this summer. Five years after the U.S.-led invasion ousted the Taliban from political power, the militant Islamic group is proving a resilient enemy for NATO forces in the south while suicide attacks have spread to the capital, Kabul. President Hamid Karzai's credibility has been undermined by the bloodiest fighting since the Taliban's fall, failure to control the drug trade and wide disparities between rich and poor. Karzai is a U.S. favorite whom Bush will see at the White House this month.

_In North Korea, the breakthrough weapons agreement announced during last year's U.N. opening session fell apart weeks later. Now the communist government is boycotting talks with the United States and other nations. The situation worsened when North Korea tested a long-range missile theoretically capable of reaching the U.S.

_In Iraq, political gains and the capture of a terrorist leader have not stopped the wholesale killing. U.S.-backed Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, whom Bush will see in New York, has failed to make his security plan stick. Washington shelved plans to withdraw some American troops this year despite declining public support in the U.S. for the war and growing calls from Congress for a phased withdrawal. Bush has acknowledged that U.S. forces will remain there for years.

_In Iran, the government has accelerated its nuclear program and defied U.N. demands. The U.S. is still the main force for U.N. penalties that allies find unappealing or of questionable value. With Tehran trying to undermine a fragile U.S.-built consensus, the weeks ahead may show whether the U.S. can persuade the Security Council to impose meaningful penalties or whether the administration will concede the futility of a course pursued for more than two years. Meanwhile, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is trying to deflect suspicion that the U.S. intends to topple Iran's ruling mullahs or bomb its nuclear sites.

_In the Mideast, the prospects for progress for peace between Israel and the Palestinians look more remote than at this time in 2005. Former Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is unconscious from a stroke; his successor, Ehud Olmert, has political problems after an inconclusive war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon. Humanitarian and political crises followed the victory of Hamas militants in Palestinian elections and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas was vastly weakened.

_Hamas' victory was the biggest blow to Bush's goal of spreading democracy in the region. Yet the U.S. said little about political reform in Egypt and Saudi Arabia while appealing to those Arab allies for help during the recent Israeli-Hezbollah war.

Bush may need help around the globe, but he could not resist taking a swipe at the United Nations during his White House press conference Friday. He stopped just short of calling the United Nations feckless in its response to the death and destruction in Sudan's Darfur region.

"I think a lot of Americans are frustrated with the United Nations, to be frank with you," Bush said.

Europeans May Meet With Iran, Sans U.S. (AP)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

European diplomats are considering a meeting with Iran on the sidelines of next week's U.N. General Assembly in hopes of de-escalating the standoff over Tehran's nuclear program — but the United States won't be getting an invitation.

The Bush administration, which is pushing for U.N. sanctions against Iran, has said it will join European-led negotiations with Iran only if it stops its uranium enrichment work first.

That has led European negotiators to work on having a meeting — without America — in which Iran could say it is temporarily suspending enrichment activities because new negotiations had indeed begun.

A U.S. official confirmed that European diplomats were contemplating the meeting, but White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore would say only that President Bush has consistently supported talks with Iran, led by Britain, France and Germany. "He is hopeful that ongoing negotiations will encourage the Iranian government to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities," she said.

The U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the volatile nature of the discussions, said the Bush administration is not expecting that such a meeting would be a major turning point in the dispute. The Bush administration has little confidence that "Iran will come through to meet the conditions" of verifiably suspending its enrichment work, the official said.

At a news conference Friday, Bush said he will send a signal at the United Nations that the United States will not tolerate delay tactics by Tehran. "Stalling shouldn't be allowed," Bush said.

Bush also stressed that he believes there is a strong consensus in the international community to prevent Iran from developing a nuclear weapon, although Russia and China — two members of the U.N. Security Council that have veto power — have been hesitant about imposing U.N. sanctions against the Iranian government.

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, is to meet Sunday in New York with Ali Larijani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator. If their discussion goes well, then the meeting — without the U.S. — could be arranged, the U.S. official said.

The idea would be to schedule such a meeting ahead of another gathering Tuesday night that's being attended by representatives of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and a few other nations. In that meeting, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is poised to push for more clarity about sanctions that could be imposed on Iran.

"Absent that change in the status quo, our plan is to push ahead on Tuesday," the U.S. official said.

Abbas And Bush To Meet On U.N. Sidelines (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Sept. 16 (AP) — The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, will meet with President Bush in New York on Wednesday, on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly, a Palestinian official said Saturday.

The meeting will be preceded by talks on Monday between Mr. Abbas and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the official, Saeb Erekat, said.

Mr. Bush and Mr. Abbas last met in October 2005 at the White House.

Mr. Erekat said the discussion would touch on a wide range of issues, including the coalition government that Mr. Abbas is trying to form with the Hamas political movement and the fate of an Israeli soldier seized by Hamas-allied militants in Gaza in June. Mr. Abbas is seeking United States support for the coalition government, in hopes of restoring international aid to the cash-starved Palestinian Authority. The foreign money dried up after Hamas, regarded by Europe and the United States as a terrorist organization, came to power in March.

The United States wants clearer statements that Hamas recognizes Israel and renounces violence.

Palestinian President Abbas To Meet Bush (AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, September 17, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas will meet President Bush in New York next week and will likely seek to promote his planned coalition with Hamas, a Palestinian official said Saturday.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said the meeting with Bush would take place Wednesday on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly. The White House would not confirm the meeting and it was not clear whether Bush's final schedule in New York had been set. The two men last met in October 2005 in Washington.

Abbas, a moderate who leads the Fatah Party, and the militant Islamic group Hamas, which currently rules alone, agreed last week to form a national unity government that would strive to establish a Palestinian state alongside Israel — implying recognition of the Jewish state.

Hamas, which is committed to Israel's destruction, swept to victory in January legislative elections, defeating Fatah, and formed a government by itself. The West and Israel reacted by cutting off hundreds of millions of dollars in aid, accusing Hamas of being a terrorist group.

Without the foreign aid, the Hamas-led Palestinian government has been unable to pay salaries to its tens of thousands of civil servants, causing widespread hardship. In a sign of desperation, women have parted with their dowry of gold jewelry — their only financial security in the event of divorce.

Abbas hopes a unity government with Hamas could restore international funding to the cash-starved Palestinian Authority. But the United States has said it wants clearer statements from Hamas that it recognizes Israel, accepts existing peace deals and renounces violence.

The European Union on Friday held off on renewing direct aid to the Palestinian Authority. EU ministers said they supported Abbas' steps to form a broader coalition, but wanted assurances the new government would back peace efforts.

Erekat said Abbas would discuss with Bush the emerging coalition and the fate of an Israeli soldier seized by Hamas-allied militants in Gaza in June, whose capture led to an Israeli military offensive in Gaza.

Erekat said delegations led by Abbas and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni would also meet next week, but would not say what would be on the agenda.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev had no comment on the reported meeting, which would be a precursor to expected talks between Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

DOJ_NMG_0064820

Hamas has been pressured by tough international sanctions to force it to temper its anti-Israel stance. But Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas suggested Saturday that his group would go no further than it already has in agreeing to the unity government.

The agreement on the national unity government "does not discuss the recognition of (peace) agreements signed with the Israeli occupation," Haniyeh told Associated Press Television News. "We will work with these agreements according to what serves the higher Palestinian interests, but that does not mean we recognize them."

Israel has been boycotting the Hamas government but considers Abbas, who favors peacemaking, an acceptable partner for talks.

Israelis Lose Faith In New Generation Of Leaders (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Doubts Heightened By War in Lebanon

JERUSALEM, Sept. 16 -- Frustration over the outcome of the war in Lebanon has spurred many Israelis to question the abilities of a new class of political professionals who are stepping into roles long held by the men and women who founded the Jewish state.

The mostly East European immigrants who brought Israel into being are steadily ceding power to a more ethnically and ideologically diverse generation raised here. Now the uncertain aftermath of the first war to be managed by a prime minister from outside Israel's founding generation -- Ehud Olmert, a 60-year-old lawyer elected this year -- has sharpened debate over whether the best of the new generation are entering public life.

"How have we left our leadership to such mediocre people?" said Eliad Shraga, 46, head of the nonpartisan Movement for Quality Government in Israel who staged a nearly three-week hunger strike outside Olmert's office after returning from reserve duty in the Lebanon war. "We are asking ourselves how this has happened to us."

Olmert and others of his political generation embody a leadership shift that highlights the Jewish state's changing values and demographics.

Israel's original socialist character has evolved into a more free-market economy and less centralized government. The private sector and town councils are turning into training grounds for new political leaders, who once emerged largely from the labor movement, the kibbutz collective-farm enterprise and the military. There are more former mayors than generals in Olmert's cabinet, which also includes ministers from university faculties and the secret services.

But prospective Israeli leaders have found the diverse economy more attractive than public life, a notoriously treacherous arena given the country's cutthroat political culture. Israel's mainstream political leadership now consists mostly of pragmatic men and women who have made politics their profession -- a sharp contrast to the ideological volunteers, shaped by persecution, who founded Israel nearly six decades ago.

Historians and sociologists describe the change as the kind of natural evolution that occurs in most countries. But it is proving more complicated here because of Israel's unique circumstances -- a state still defining its borders, in a region where many countries dispute its right to exist.

"A nation cannot always be in a revolutionary spirit," said Ephraim Yaar, a professor of sociology at Tel Aviv University who runs the Evens Program in Mediation and Conflict Resolution. "People want to live normal lives. But in some ways, Israel cannot give up this spirit because of the peculiar existential threat it faces. We are still in the process of nation-building."

Isaac Herzog, the 46-year-old tourism minister, is one of Israel's political "princes."

His father, Chaim Herzog, built Israel's military intelligence agency before serving as ambassador to the United Nations and the country's president. His grandfather was Israel's first chief rabbi, and one of his handwritten prayers for the new state hangs on Herzog's office wall.

As a boy, Herzog's neighbors in Zahala, a suburb of Tel Aviv, included Moshe Dayan, Yitzhak Rabin and Ariel Sharon, hero-generals of the wars and political battles that helped define the modern state.

DOJ_NMG_0064821

"My father and his compatriots focused on security and the economy, but I became interested early on with talking to the Palestinians and in issues like the environment and human rights," said Herzog, who speaks Arabic.

"The whole system of values has changed," he continued. "I would say our generation is more willing to compromise, less willing to see ideology as holy."

Olmert is also a second-generation politician. Elected to parliament at the age of 28, he is Israel's third prime minister from outside the founding generation. When Sharon, 78, was felled by a stroke in January, Olmert assumed the top job and was elected on his own in March, on a platform to withdraw Israel from parts of the West Bank and define the state's final borders. The plan has been shelved since the war, and the Israeli public is waiting for another to replace it.

Olmert's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, whose popularity plummeted during the war, is the daughter of a leader of Irgun, the Zionist militia that attacked British forces and civilian targets before Israel's creation.

Both Olmert and Livni, 48, also a lawyer by training, left the Likud party last year to join Sharon's Kadima movement -- evidence, political analysts say, that the politicians now in charge are less ideological than those of the past.

The only member of Olmert's cabinet who played a vital role in Israel's political life before the founding of the state is Shimon Peres, the 83-year-old vice prime minister and Nobel Peace laureate who left the Labor Party last year after losing his bid to lead it.

"I think this shows we are now a more normal society, one without stars," Herzog said. "Stars just fall into the bureaucracy."

Recent opinion polls show that a large majority of Israelis believe the previous leaders were better than the current ones, while one in five Israelis does not think any of the senior party leaders is suitable to be prime minister. When the Marker, a business supplement published by the daily newspaper Haaretz, revealed its picks for the 100 Israelis with the most influence over the economy, no name appeared in the top slot, only the words: "Leader Wanted!"

"These new politicians don't regard themselves as mythological figures, nor does the public view them that way," said Tom Segev, a prominent Israeli historian and author of several influential books on the state's formative years. "And on the healthy side, the public no longer has giants it will blindly trust."

Segev contends that "for most Israelis, the founding giants are more about what they symbolized than who they actually were. They were overly mythologized, and now many enjoy an image that is just not justified."

While less trusting, the public is also more angry, particularly over a flurry of corruption scandals involving Israel's senior politicians and Olmert's refusal to allow an independent commission to examine the recent war's management.

The military, traditionally the country's most esteemed institution, is investigating itself at a time of pervasive anger among reserve officers. Many of them have criticized military commanders and civilian leaders for providing insufficient supplies and equipment during the fight, as well as for a tentative battle plan they contend prolonged the conflict and endangered Israeli soldiers and civilians.

Yaar's monthly "peace index" tracking poll showed a large drop last month in support for the military, along with other public institutions. Yaar noted that the marks for Olmert's government and the parliament "were already extremely low in the past and they did not have much space to shrink further."

"A war we don't win is a war we lose," said Zeev Sternhell, who fought in four of Israel's wars and is author of "The Founding Myths of Israel." "We have never been through such a loss of faith in the political and military leadership at the same time. I'm afraid people are beginning to lose confidence in the system itself."

Israeli politicians say the business sector could be the next source of political leadership. But sociologists argue that Israel's high-tech entrepreneurs, known for risk-taking and creativity, will likely be discouraged from entering the rough spectacle of Israeli politics.

"Israel has been very rude to people who want to volunteer their talents to public life, and by that I mean cynicism, which just kills everything," said Erel Margalit, managing partner of Jerusalem Venture Partners, a venture-capital firm with interests in high-tech businesses. "I think a few of us will jump, whether it's me or someone else. It depends on the timing and opportunity."

Margalit, 45, is mentioned frequently as a possible candidate for mayor of Jerusalem, where he lives and supports a number of arts projects. He was raised on a kibbutz and supported Labor Party leader Amir Peretz's bid for the prime ministership in March. Peretz, now Israel's highly unpopular defense minister, once embodied the promising rise of Jewish immigrants of North African and Middle Eastern descent in a society long dominated by European Jews.

"For a lot of us, the legacy of our grandfathers -- that we came here not just to make a profit -- is still there," Margalit said. "We don't want to be socialist, or at least not a part of the 1917 revolution. But we do want to use the same kind of sensitivities found on the kibbutz when things get difficult."

The idealists of today are lonely.

Daniel Kayros, 35, passed up the large-salary life of a corporate lawyer to run the fiscal litigation department of the Movement for Quality Government in Israel. He manned a tent for weeks across from Olmert's office festooned with banners declaring, "You Lost The North," a play on words meaning the government had lost both its support in the Galilee region and its direction.

"Against the backdrop of the amazing historic story of this country, to see the crumbling of government morals is extremely discouraging," said Kayros, who immigrated to Israel from Wisconsin at 19. "To me, it is an emergency call to the flag. I only wish more of the country felt that way."

Nonaligned Nations Blast Israel Attacks (AP)

By OLGA R. RODRIGUEZ, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Representatives of 118 Nonaligned Movement nations condemned Israel's attacks on Lebanon and supported a peaceful resolution to the U.S.-Iran nuclear dispute in the final declaration Saturday of a summit that brought together some of the United States' staunchest foes.

The 92-page declaration also broadly condemned terrorism. But it said movements for self-determination and battles against foreign occupiers should not be considered terrorism.

And while declaring democracy to be a universal value, the movement said no one country or region should define it for the whole world and defended the right of Venezuela and other countries to determine their own forms of government.

The final statements, many of which contain veiled criticisms of the U.S., were approved by unanimous consent after another round of speeches Saturday night by leaders of the movement.

"No one in the Nonaligned Movement thinks that the United States is responsible for all the problems, but many think that it is for some," Cuba's Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque said.

An ailing Fidel Castro was named president of the movement, but he stayed home on doctors' orders while acting Cuban President Raul Castro presided over the meeting of two-thirds of the world's nations.

The meeting brought together the leaders of Iran, Venezuela, North Korea, Zimbabwe among other leading U.S. adversaries. Raul joined them in saying a bellicose America had made the world more dangerous.

North Korea's No. 2 leader, Kim Yong Nam, claimed his communist nation "would not need even a single nuclear weapon if there no longer existed a U.S. threat," and said U.S. financial sanctions have "driven the situation into an unpredictable phase."

Kim, the leader of Parliament, blamed the lack of world peace on the United States, saying its failure to respect the sovereignty of other nations has destroyed "the international order."

The resulting imbalance in global politics constitutes "grave threats to world peace and security," he said.

The United States declined an invitation to the summit and said it would have no comment on any of the proceedings.

Many at the summit demanded the United Nations take action against U.S. veto power in the Security Council.

"The U.S. is turning the Security Council into a base for imposing its politics," Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad complained. "Why should people live under the nuclear threat of the U.S.?"

Some leaders tried to resolve disputes with their neighbors: Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed Saturday to resume peace talks, and Bolivian President Evo Morales tried to reassure Brazilians angered by tough energy negotiations.

Others held onto hard-line positions: North Korea defended its nuclear weapons program, Sudan's leader rejected a U.N. peacekeeping mission for Darfur and Ahmadinejad insisted on Iran's right to develop nuclear energy.

DOJ_NMG_0064823

The final document supported Iran's position while encouraging it to continue cooperating with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

Earlier on Saturday, Iraq's vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, asked the movement for a statement calling on all countries to stop interfering in Iraq and to recognize the sovereignty of his nation's land and airspace. He complained that "life has degenerated" in his country and Iraqis are suffering because "a war machine has destroyed the infrastructure."

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan agreed the Security Council must be more responsive to less powerful countries.

"The Security Council must reform - for the sake of the developing world, and for the sake of the United Nations itself," Annan told the Nonaligned leaders.

The Nonaligned Movement was formed in 1961 to establish a neutral third path in a world divided by the United States and the Soviet Union. Cuba last hosted the group in Havana 27 years ago.

It was unclear whether the 80-year-old Castro will recover enough from intestinal surgery to guide the group for the next three years. The ailing rebel icon met in his home with a handful of leaders including Annan and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

The Fight To Rebuild Lebanon (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Sunni governments vie with Shiite-ruled Iran and Hezbollah to prove who is doing more.

BEIRUT — The rush to rebuild this war-crushed country has gotten tangled up with a high-stakes sectarian competition, as Sunni Arab governments in the region race against Shiite-ruled Iran and its ally Hezbollah to prove political clout and capture grass-roots loyalty, analysts say.

A steady stream of foreign delegations crunches over the rubble of the southern suburbs for photo opportunities; spokespeople churn out competing press releases; catty cut-downs are exchanged between Hezbollah and the Lebanese government. Milk trucks on remote farm roads near the Israeli border proclaim that their boxed milk is a gift from the Saudi people; an Iranian flag emblazons water tanks in Beirut.

For decades, Lebanon has been an oft-abused host to its neighbors — a sun-warmed playground for the wealthy, but also a proxy battlefield for tensions that wash over the Middle East. In the current struggle, the region's power players jockey not with guns but with charity dollars, boxed food and showy displays of compassion.

"There's a kind of competition between the Arab governments and Iran," said Kamel Mohanna, general coordinator for Arab NGOs Forum. "It's a competition to have political influence here … to decrease the influence of Iran, to show that not only Iran has sent money to this area."

The unmistakable oneupmanship is a stark reminder of the panic that has gripped the region as the power of Iran has swelled. Animosities between Sunnis and Shiites stretch back into the origins of Islam, and have sharpened in recent years as the oil-rich Sunni Arab states of the Persian Gulf compete for influence against Iran. Sunni Arabs watched with unease as Iranian influence spread among Shiites in Iraq after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, and sat by nervously while Tehran squared off against the West over Iran's nuclear program.

This summer's war in Lebanon upped the ante. The perception that Hezbollah guerrillas drove Israel out of Lebanon has swept the coffee shops and streets of the Arab world. Hezbollah chief Sheik Hassan Nasrallah has been lionized, even among Sunni Arabs who might previously have viewed the Shiite with suspicion, analysts say.

As soon as the bombing stopped, Hezbollah foot soldiers waded into devastated streets and handed bundles of cash to families that had lost homes to Israeli bombing. Hezbollah has been coy about its ties to Iran, but most of the cash is presumed to have come from Tehran.

The Lebanese government, dominated by Sunnis and Christians, has struggled to counteract the perception that Hezbollah is chiefly responsible for the aid and reconstruction efforts.

"Iran may be trying to come into play here, saying, 'Hey, we're not bad guys, we're benevolent,' " said Mohammed Mamlouk, the prime minister's aide in charge of coordinating foreign aid. "But they're not fooling anybody. I bet even the Shiites here know better."

Mamlouk sat among a sea of chiming telephones and scurrying people in Beirut's government center. Aid was pouring into government coffers from all over the Arab world and beyond, but not from Iran. The money from Tehran was going straight to Hezbollah, Mamlouk said.

"It's our government, and our job to take care of the people," he said. "Every time you send an engineer, you don't send a TV crew with him just to show that the government is working."

Persian Gulf states, including Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, have come forward with immense donations, Mamlouk said. He is careful to note the Saudi prince who stayed on the Syrian border all night to supervise the transfer of aid into Lebanon during the Israeli bombardment.

"Hezbollah believes it's important to show they're paying and taking care of their own people. They're overplaying it with the media," Mamlouk said. "So we're making shows now. We're drumming it up."

Lebanon's Shiites, believed to be the largest sect in the country's religious mosaic, have a long-standing tradition of taking care of their own, developed in response to government neglect.

Now the central government is working to show Shiites that their needs are taken seriously in Beirut. The outreach is driven in part, analysts say, by suspicions across the region that Shiite Arabs are secretly more loyal to their Iranian coreligionists than to their countrymen.

"Arabs are trying to get the Shias to integrate more in Lebanon and forget Iran," said Hilal Khashan, an expert on the region's Shiites and a professor at the American University of Beirut. "This is the challenge: How do you get Shias to pledge allegiance to the Lebanese state and forget foreign influence?"

Hezbollah hasn't helped. Its political leaders dismiss government aid efforts as corruption-riddled traps that snare money long before it reaches the needy. They sometimes speak of the government as a foreign force, and accuse Beirut of secretly rooting for Israel to win the war and obliterate Hezbollah.

"We are ready to rebuild Lebanon, we are planning to do that, and the Shia of the world will help us," said Khodor Nour Eddin, a senior political officer for Hezbollah. "It's better for us to do that. We don't want to take money from the government, like charity."

In the heart of the destruction wrought by Israeli bombs, Nour Eddin sat in the sprawling tent erected by Jihad Construction, Hezbollah's large band of reconstruction workers. Behind him, a delegation of religious leaders from Syria gave speeches and posed for photographs.

Dust choked the air, and the streets rang with the clang of steel and the scrape of machinery. The long yellow arm of a Caterpillar pawed at the piles of debris. Women picked their way through the rubble of their homes, holding the hems of their chadors out of the dust.

"If Hezbollah didn't give us money to rent a house, we'd be on the street," said Muna Raed, whose home was ground to rubble in the bombardment.

"The government?" She paused. "There's a promise. We'll see. We've learned from previous wars that the government will steal and we won't see anything."

Vatican Says Pope Benedict Regrets Offending Muslims (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

ROME, Sept. 16 — A top Vatican official said Saturday that Pope Benedict XVI “deeply regretted” that a speech he made this week “sounded offensive to the sensibility of Muslim believers.”

The statement, by Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, the new Vatican secretary of state, was made as denunciations from Muslim leaders over the speech continued for a third day around the world.

DOJ_NMG_0064825

And in the West Bank town of Nablus on Saturday, a day after street protests and grenades were thrown at a church in the Gaza Strip, two churches were lightly damaged in fire bombings. A group calling itself the "Lions of Monotheism" said the attacks were in reaction to the pope's remarks.

The Vatican statement stopped short of the direct personal apology from Benedict that many Muslims have been demanding. Still, the statement tried to tamp down rising anger among Muslims about the speech, in which Benedict quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor as calling Islam "evil and inhuman."

Cardinal Bertone, named the second-in-command at the Vatican on Friday, said that the pope's comments had been interpreted in a way that "absolutely did not correspond to his intentions." He said that Benedict, whose stance on Islam has generally been more skeptical than that of his predecessor, John Paul II, respected Islam and believed strongly in dialogue among faiths.

The quotations, Cardinal Bertone said, were part of a scholarly address aimed at refuting a "religious motivation for violence, no matter where it comes from."

On Tuesday, at Regensburg University in Germany, Benedict delivered a long, scholarly address on reason and faith in the West. But he began his speech by recounting a conversation on the truths of Christianity and Islam that took place between a 14th-century Byzantine Christian emperor, Manuel II Paleologus, and a Persian scholar.

"The emperor comes to speak about the issue of jihad, holy war," the pope said.

"He said, I quote, 'Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached,' " the pope said.

While making clear that he was quoting someone else, Benedict did not say whether he agreed or not. He also briefly discussed the Islamic concept of jihad, which he defined as "holy war," and said that violence in the name of religion is contrary to God's nature and to reason.

He also suggested reason as the basis for "that genuine dialogue of cultures and religions so urgently needed today."

Nonetheless, Muslims around the world called the speech provocative, especially coming from the leader of the world's billion Roman Catholics.

In Jordan, the state-owned daily newspaper Al Rai said called the pope's statements "shocking." It said the pope should apologize "so as to ease the fears of Muslims who sense they are becoming the target of an orchestrated campaign."

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq called on Iraqis to refrain from violent protest over the remarks, urging people not to "carry out actions that will harm our Christian brothers here," according to his spokesman, Ali Dabbagh.

Mr. Dabbagh said he had heard only one unofficial and unconfirmed report of any violence in Iraq related to anger over the pope's comments. That episode involved a church in Basra, but he said he had no details.

"The pope misinterpreted Islam," he said. "The most important thing is that such incidents should not be converted into violence in Iraq."

Morocco recalled its ambassador to the Vatican over the remarks, according to the official MAP news agency.

And the president of Yemen, Ali Abdullah Saleh, threatened to sever diplomatic ties unless Benedict apologized.

In Somalia, a radical cleric was reported to have urged Muslims to "hunt down" the pope for remarks that he called "barbaric."

"Whoever offends our Prophet Muhammad should be killed on the spot by the nearest Muslim," the cleric, Sheik Abubakar Hassan Malin, told worshipers in Mogadishu on Friday, Agence France-Presse reported.

But in Turkey, amid questions about the pope's planned visit in November, the main English-language newspaper, The Daily News, urged an end to the criticism.

While denouncing his comments, the paper said, "We just disagree with this vendettalike approach of continuing to abuse the pope after his spokesman made a statement saying that he respected Islam and did not intend to offend Muslims."

The newspaper was printed before Cardinal Bertone spoke Saturday and was referring to a Vatican statement released on Thursday.

Security around the pope's residence at Castel Gandolfo, near Rome, would be strengthened for the pope's Sunday blessing, Agence France-Presse quoted the Italian ANSA news agency as saying. "Meticulous" security checks over an extended area were planned.

Aide Says Pope 'Regrets' Comments On Islam (WP/AP)

By Frances D'emilio, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

VATICAN CITY, Sept. 16 -- Pope Benedict XVI "sincerely regrets" offending Muslims with his reference to an obscure medieval text that characterizes some of the teachings of Islam's founder as "evil and inhuman," a senior Vatican official said in a statement Saturday.

But the comment stopped short of the apology demanded by Islamic leaders around the world, and anger among Muslims remained intense. Palestinians attacked five churches in the West Bank and Gaza over the pope's remarks in a speech Tuesday to university professors in his native Germany.

In a broader talk rejecting any religious motivation for violence, Benedict cited the words of a 14th-century Byzantine emperor who characterized some of the teachings of the prophet Muhammad as "evil and inhuman," particularly "his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

The pontiff did not endorse that description, but he did not question it, and his words set off a firestorm of protests across the Muslim world.

The new Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, said the pope's position on Islam is unmistakably in line with Vatican teaching that says the church "esteems" Muslims.

Benedict "thus sincerely regrets that certain passages of his address could have sounded offensive to the sensitivities of the Muslim faithful and should have been interpreted in a manner that in no way corresponds to his intentions," Bertone said in the statement.

Bertone said the pontiff sought in his speech to condemn all religious motivation for violence, "from whatever side it may come." But the pope's words only appeared to fan outrage.

Bertone's statement, released by the Vatican press office, failed to satisfy critics.

Mohammed Bishr, a senior member of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, said the statement "was not an apology" but a "pretext that the pope was quoting somebody else as saying so and so."

"We need the pope to admit the big mistake he has committed and then agree on apologizing, because we will not accept others to apologize on his behalf," Bishr said.

Morocco recalled its ambassador to the Vatican on Saturday to protest the pope's "offensive" remarks, and Afghanistan's parliament and the Foreign Ministry demanded that the pope apologize.

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan insisted the pope apologize, saying he had spoken "not like a man of religion but like a usual politician." Benedict plans to go to Turkey in November in what would be his first papal visit to a Muslim nation.

Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, spiritual leader of the world's 200 million Orthodox Christians, issued a statement saying he was "deeply" saddened by the tensions sparked by the pope's comments.

"We have to show the determination and care not to hurt one another and avoid situations where we may hurt each others' beliefs," the Istanbul-based Patriarchate said.

In the West Bank, Palestinians used guns, firebombs and lighter fluid in attacks on four churches, leaving church doors charred and walls scorched by flames and pocked with bullet holes. Nobody was reported injured. A Greek Orthodox church in Gaza City also was attacked.

A group calling itself "Lions of Monotheism" told The Associated Press by phone that the attacks were a protest of the pope's remarks on Islam.

The grand sheik of Cairo's al-Azhar mosque, the Sunni Arab world's most powerful institution, condemned the pope's remarks as "reflecting ignorance."

DOJ_NMG_0064827

Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi, whose Southeast Asian country has a large Muslim population, demanded that Benedict retract his remarks and not "take lightly the spread of outrage that has been created."

Coptic Pope Shenouda III, head of Egypt's Coptic Orthodox Church, criticized Benedict, saying, "Any remarks which offend Islam and Muslims are against the teachings of Christ," according to the pro-government newspaper al-Ahram.

British Muslims sought to calm the situation, praising the Vatican statement on behalf of the pope.

"We welcome his apology and we hope now we can work together and build bridges. At the same time we would condemn all forms of violent demonstration," Muhammad Umar, chairman of Britain's Ramadhan Foundation, a youth organization, told Sky News.

But Muhammad Abdul Bari, secretary general of the Muslim Council of Britain, said the pontiff needed to repudiate the views of the emperor he quoted in order to restore relations between Muslims and the Roman Catholic Church.

Pope Is Regretful That His Speech Angered Muslims (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

A Vatican statement includes no apology, though, saying his words were misunderstood.

VATICAN CITY — With furor spreading throughout the Islamic world, Pope Benedict XVI expressed deep regret Saturday that a speech he gave at a German university last week had offended Muslims.

A statement released by his new secretary of State said of Benedict: "In reiterating his respect and esteem for those who profess Islam, he hopes they will be helped to understand the correct meaning of his words."

It did not seem likely that the expression of regret would satisfy clamor from many corners of the world that the pope apologize. He distanced himself from the language that Muslims found objectionable, but he did not retract the words or ask for forgiveness.

The Muslim Brotherhood, one of the largest and most influential Islamic organizations in the Middle East, issued an initial response that Benedict's overture was insufficient.

Hostility to the pope's speech — a dense lecture in which he quoted a medieval Byzantine emperor as saying, "Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman" — has plunged Benedict's 17-month-old papacy into its most difficult diplomatic crisis.

Muslim communities in Europe, Egypt, Pakistan and elsewhere have expressed anger at the pontiff.

His effigy was burned in India, and he has been compared to Hitler and Mussolini.

Morocco on Saturday became the first Islamic country to recall its Holy See ambassador.

In Cairo, Coptic Christian leaders joined their Muslim counterparts in condemning the pope.

Earlier on Saturday, Palestinians firebombed four churches in the West Bank city of Nablus and shot at one in the Gaza Strip. No injuries were reported. And Iraqi and Somalian militants threatened to kill the pope or attack Rome.

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan demanded a retraction of Benedict's "ugly and unfortunate" comments, saying that "the pope spoke like a politician rather than as a man of religion." Benedict's scheduled trip to Turkey in November, his first to a Muslim country, may be in jeopardy, though Vatican officials hoped Saturday's statement would help clear the air.

Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, the secretary of State who issued the communique, said the pope in no way endorsed the passage he quoted from Emperor Manuel II Paleologus and meant only to illustrate the rejection of religious motivation for violence.

"The Holy Father thus sincerely regrets that certain passages of his address could have sounded offensive to the sensitivities of the Muslim faithful, and should have been interpreted in a manner that in no way corresponds to his intentions," Bertone said.

The pope expressed hope of "quickly surmounting this present uneasy moment," Bertone added.

Tuesday's speech was delivered at the University of Regensburg, where Benedict, when he was known as Joseph Ratzinger, taught theology in the 1970s.

Benedict's return was part of a six-day tour of his native Bavaria.

DOJ_NMG_0064828

The Regensburg speech was meant to be one of the most important documents of his papacy. Benedict labored long hours drafting it over his summer holidays. It lays out the central tenets of his papacy, including the importance of the partnership of reason and faith in Western Christianity.

His few references to Islam seemed to portray it as a historically violent faith reliant on forced conversions and jihad, which he translated as holy war. Christianity's own bloodstained past was not mentioned.

Vatican experts were divided over whether Benedict miscalculated the depth of anger his words would inspire, or whether he might not care. As a consummate theologian, the role he played for the last quarter-century, he is not averse to debate and controversy, and he clearly wanted to stake out his positions in stark and dramatic terms.

But it is one thing to conduct such discussions as an academic and another to do so as pope, who is also a world leader, a politician and head of 1.2 billion Roman Catholics.

"Pushing these buttons of protest will not help the future of religious dialogue, neither for Muslims nor for us," said Alberto Melloni, a church historian. "The pope does not live on an island but in Rome, and it's hard to see that this controversy will simply be disregarded."

Perhaps more important, the Regensburg speech reflected Benedict's conviction that Christianity is a superior religion and that Islam must be treated more cautiously. His predecessor, John Paul II, frequently embraced Christians, Muslims and Jews as "the children of Abraham" and promoted interfaith dialogue.

In his first homily as pontiff, Benedict dropped any reference to Islam when mentioning respect for other faiths. This year, he demoted the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, which oversees relations with Muslims and members of other religions. He sent its Rome-based president, a leading expert on Islam, to Cairo to serve as an envoy to Egypt instead.

In Regensburg, "the pope was thinking he was writing an academic treatise, but in writing an academic treatise, his deep mistrust of at least part of Islam came to the surface," said Marco Politi, Vatican specialist for the Italian newspaper La Repubblica.

Several Vatican watchers said Saturday's more conciliatory statement reflected the hand of Benedict's newly installed aides, most notably Bertone, a longtime associate. Bertone assumed the post of secretary of State, No. 2 in the Vatican, on Friday.

Vatican officials were said to have been especially taken aback by criticism from moderate European Muslims.

Benedict's associates, Politi said, "understood that more than 40 years of evolving good relations between the Catholic Church and the Islamic world were at stake."

Muslims Erupt In Anger At Pope's Comments About Muhammad (MCT)

By Miret El Naggar

McClatchy Newspapers, September 17, 2006

CAIRO, Egypt - Gunmen firebombed five churches in the Palestinian territories Saturday over remarks by Pope Benedict XVI this week that outraged Muslims and prompted the Vatican to issue a mildly worded apology.

The pope "sincerely regrets that certain passages of his address could have sounded offensive to the sensitivities of the Muslim faithful," said Deputy Pope Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, insisting that the pontiff didn't mean to portray Islam as violent. Instead, the pope meant only to stress his "clear and radical rejection of religiously motivated violence," Bertone said.

Muslims around the world interpreted the pope's words as criticism that Islam endorses violence.

Pope Benedict XVI made the remarks earlier this week during a trip to his native Germany as he was citing a conversation between a Byzantine Christian emperor, Manuel Paleologos II, and a Persian Muslim scholar on the truths of Christianity and Islam.

"Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached," were the emperor's words that the pope read before a group of professors at Regensburg University in Germany, without commenting on them.

DOJ_NMG_0064829

In the days since, fear has spread of a wave of violence like what followed a Danish newspaper's publication last year of cartoons that lampooned Islam's prophet Mohammed

Palestinian gunmen targeted five churches in Gaza and the West Bank with firebombs, causing charred doors and bullet holes in walls, but no one was injured.

A day earlier some 2,000 Palestinians demonstrated in Gaza against the pope's remarks.

Elsewhere in the Muslim world politicians and clerics in Lebanon, Egypt, Malaysia, Pakistan, Turkey and several other countries all reproached the pope.

The Grand Sheikh of al-Azhar institution in Cairo, the highest religious authority in the Sunni world, issued a statement criticizing the pope for repeating the emperor's quotes without further explanation.

Egypt's Parliament demanded an immediate apology. Speaker of Parliament Fathy Sorour said the remarks showed a "severe ignorance of Islam."

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit issued a statement in which he expressed "concern that the Pope's comments would spark clashes between cultures and weaken efforts to narrow the gap between East and West."

Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood discarded the Vatican's mild apology as "insufficient."

"This statement is not enough," said the Brotherhood's deputy leader Mohamed Habib. "The pope's comments insulted Muslims' feelings and revered beliefs to an extent that can only be mended by a personal apology."

Turkey's ruling party compared the pope to Hitler and Mussolini.

In Pakistan, scores of people demonstrated and parliament unanimously passed a resolution condemning the pope for making "derogatory" comments about Islam.

Morocco's official news agency announced that King Mohammed VI had recalled his ambassador to the Vatican for consultations.

Malaysia's Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmed Badawi commented that the Pope should not take the public outrage lightly.

"It is unfortunate that such an eminent figure like the pope has not shown leadership in promoting good relations between religions," Badawi said in a statement.

Sudan's President Rejects U.N. Troops (AP)

By Olga R. Rodriguez

AP, September 17, 2006

Sudan's president again rejected the deployment of U.N. peacekeeping troops in the war-torn Darfur region during a meeting with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan on Saturday. But one of the country's two vice presidents said he would accept international intervention.

Annan urged the government of Sudan in an editorial distributed Saturday to accept the U.N. Security Council's decision to replace the largely ineffective African Union peacekeeping force in Darfur with better-equipped U.N. troops.

"There can be no military solution to the crisis in Darfur," Annan wrote. "All parties should have understood by now, after so much death and destruction, that only a political agreement in which all stakeholders are fully engaged can bring real peace to the region."

Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir rejected his appeal.

"Justice is and remains our objective but through diplomatic, political and other means," he said, according to the English translation of his speech in Arabic. "That's why we reject this position." Al-Bashir made the remarks at a news conference in Cuba, where he and Annan were attending the Nonaligned Movement summit.

At least 200,000 people have been killed in Darfur and more than 2 million have fled their homes since 2003 when ethnic African tribes revolted against the Arab-led government. The government is accused of unleashing brutal Arab militiamen known as janjaweed in the remote western province.

First Vice President Salva Kiir Mayardit welcomed U.N. intervention. He heads the Sudan People's Liberation Movement — a former southern rebel group that made peace with Khartoum in January 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0064830

"The aggravation of the humanitarian and security situation in Darfur necessitates intervention of international forces to protect civilians from the atrocities of the janjaweed militias so long as the government is not capable of protecting them," Kiir was quoted as saying in remarks published Saturday by the independent Al-Sudani daily.

The Darfur Peace Agreement, signed in May, calls for a cease-fire, disarmament of militias and a protection force for civilians — but does not specify the composition of such a force.

Last month, the Security Council passed a resolution demanding a better-funded, larger and more well-equipped U.N. mission take over Darfur peacekeeping duties from the African Union, whose mandate expires Sept. 30.

But the resolution was unlikely to take effect without the consent of the Sudanese government, something nations including the United States have worked — without success — to acquire. Al-Bashir has said that a switch in command would violate the country's sovereignty and has warned that his army would fight any U.N. forces sent to Darfur.

On Friday, President Bush said it could be time to send international peacekeepers into Darfur over the objections of the government in Khartoum.

"What you'll hear is, 'Well the government of Sudan must invite the United Nations in for us to act,'" Bush said. "Well, there are other alternatives, like passing a U.N. resolution saying we're coming in with a U.N. force in order to save lives."

Sudanese VP Backs U.N. Troops In Darfur (AP)

By Mohammed Osman

AP, September 17, 2006

One of two vice presidents in Sudan's power-sharing government said in remarks published Saturday that he would accept the deployment of U.N. peacekeepers in the country's war-torn Darfur region.

First Vice President Salva Kiir Mayardit told the independent Al-Sudani daily that the Sudanese government was incapable of protecting civilians in Darfur, and called on the U.N. to intervene.

He spoke at a meeting Friday of his former rebel group, the Sudan People's Liberation Movement, in the southern city of Juba.

"The aggravation of the humanitarian and security situation in Darfur necessitates intervention of international forces to protect civilians from the atrocities of the Janjaweed militias so long as the government is not capable of protecting them," Kiir was quoted as saying.

Kiir's group signed a peace agreement with the Sudanese government in January 2005, laying down its arms after 21 years of civil war — Africa's longest conflict.

Some see that peace deal as a model for resolving the conflict in the western region of Darfur. Kiir's organization is believed to have influence over the Darfur rebels, though the conflicts were not related.

Sudan VP Takes Issue With President On UN Darfur Force (AFP)

By Mohammed Ali Saeed

AFP, September 17, 2006

Sudan Vice President Salva Kiir said a UN peacekeeping force is vital for the protection of civilians in Darfur, putting himself at odds with the country's veteran president.

Kiir, whose southern former rebel movement forms part of a national unity government with President Omar al-Beshir's National Congress, said UN peacekeepers were essential to protect civilians from the "atrocities" of Arab militias.

"The aggravation of the humanitarian and security situation in Darfur necessitates the intervention of international forces to protect civilians from the atrocities of the Janjaweed militias so long as the government is not capable of protecting them," Kiir told the independent daily Al-Sudani Saturday.

"Our National Congress partners believe that peace in Darfur can only be achieved by ... military force," the vice president was quoted as saying at a meeting Friday of the politburo of his Sudan People's Liberation Movement in the southern regional capital of Juba.

DOJ_NMG_0064831

The SPLM, which signed a January 2005 peace deal with Beshir's regime that paved the way for the national unity government, said it would press the president to heed mounting international pressure to accept the UN force.

The SPLM's stance on the presence of international troops could threaten the implementation of peace accords, an analyst said.

"This position announced by the SPLM by welcoming international troops in Darfur will definitely weaken the position of the government in front of the international community," Adel Al-Baz an independent Sudanese analyst told AFP.

"The government will not find any support from its smaller partner if it insists on its position and tries to impose security and stability in Darfur alone without international troops," he said.

"But while this position will not lead to a split between the National Congress and the SPLM, it will shake the required trust needed to implement the peace agreement," he said.

Before the talks that led to last year's peace deal, the SPLM championed the rights of all Sudan's ethnic minorities, including those in the western region of Darfur, the central Nuba mountains and the east, as well as the south where it fought a two-decade war with the Arab-dominated regime.

Ethnic minority rebels launched their own uprising in Darfur in early 2003, prompting Beshir's regime to unleash the Janjaweed militias in a scorched earth policy which Washington has described as genocide.

The UN Security Council adopted a resolution late last month calling for an extension of the UN peacekeeping mission in south Sudan to Darfur to take over from an overstretched two-year-old African Union force.

But the resolution called for the government's approval of the UN mission, something Beshir has so far defiantly withheld.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair criticised the Sudanese government Saturday over the "completely unacceptable" situation in Darfur and accused it of breaking ceasefire agreements signed with the rebels.

"I am committed to stepping up international efforts to bring a change of mind and action from the government of Sudan," he said, adding that the international community could not "just watch as this tragedy deepens".

Darfur has been in the throes of a civil war since 2003 which has pitched rebel groups against the Khartoum government and allied Arab militia.

The conflict has killed around 300,000 people and displaced more than 2.5 million, according to the UN.

Letter From A Sudanese Prison (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

EL FASHER, Sudan

I came bearing gifts I imagined would be useful to a foreign correspondent trapped in a grubby African prison -- mosquito repellent, books, two recent issues of the Economist and an oversized bar of dark Lindt chocolate. And I came with one big question: How did Paul Salopek, a two-time Pulitzer Prize winner for the Chicago Tribune, a veteran of dicey Third World travel, land himself in a Sudanese lockup?

The answer, on the surface, seemed simple enough. Salopek, 44, had been on assignment for National Geographic when, on Aug. 6, he crossed over the border from Chad, entering the intractable war zone of the Darfur region without a visa. Within two hours, he was picked up by former rebels who had cut a deal with the government. A few days later, including one when a helicopter carrying him took ground fire, Salopek was in the hands of Sudan's notorious secret police. The charges included not just the visa violation, but also espionage and writing "false news." The possible punishments included many years in prison.

I met Salopek four weeks later while on a reporting trip to Darfur. With stamped and signed travel papers in my pocket, I walked into the sandy court compound that had, at this late stage in his captivity, become his home. In late afternoons, the steel-barred doors to his concrete-box lockup were left open, allowing Salopek and his two Chadian colleagues -- a driver and an interpreter -- to move about freely, talk on the phone, chat with visitors and order out for dinner from one of El Fasher's few restaurants.

Salopek, lean and bookish-looking in short hair and glasses, had approached his time in prison as he would a story -- immersing himself in the place with the passion of a devoted observer. He picked up a bit of Arabic, and studied the names and personalities of his captors, all of whom eventually came to treat him as a friend. They talked and shared food and played soccer. And when a senior guard challenged him at chess, Salopek wisely lost 10 of 13 games and muffled his shock that the queen in the Sudanese version is called "the minister," stripping the game of its legacy of female power.

Most of all, he appeared at peace with his situation, which I knew took much effort for a man uncomfortable in the spotlight. The Tribune, National Geographic and a host of U.S. officials were working hard for his release, and despite some encouraging signs, Salopek was preparing himself and his two Chadian associates for a long stay. "If I have to spend two years in Shalla prison," he said, referring to North Darfur's prison, "I'll work on my Arabic."

He said this in an even tone, without a smile or bravado. In fact, the only time his blood pressure seemed to rise was when he contemplated another possible outcome of his captivity -- that he would go free but that other journalists, chastened by his experience, would stop coming to Darfur. It pained him to imagine that his plight might lead to less attention for one of the world's great ongoing tragedies.

Salopek knew better than most what the stakes were. For whatever he learned before entering Sudan (including through visits with rebels and refugees in Chad) he had spent a month mastering firsthand the brutality of the government here. And despite what he suffered -- I leave this for him to tell, but he came far closer to death than has been widely reported -- Salopek expressed much more concern for the hundreds of thousands of people who had died and 2 million made homeless in Darfur.

Salopek was convinced, as was every aid official and African Union officer I met here, that the conflict was about to become worse as the government moved to finish off the rebels who had not signed a May peace deal. With the AU preparing to leave and a planned U.N. mission blocked by the government, the thin margin of safety for journalists and aid groups was about to disappear as well. Salopek was distraught over what could happen to civilians once all the outside witnesses left Darfur, as the government seemed determined to make happen.

When I questioned him about his decision to enter without a visa -- something many foreign correspondents have done in recent years -- he acknowledged the misjudgment. He was in a hurry to complete a project on the Sahel region running along the Sahara's southern edge. Obtaining a visa to Sudan took months, if it came at all, and he wanted a single scene from Darfur for his story. With luck, he would have been back in Chad the next day. But all his luck that day was bad. And he made other mistakes, too, such as carrying several notebooks that he had filled in Chad. They gave Sudan's government plenty of evidence to convict him. To make matters worse, rain flooded a gully on his potential escape route. When the rebels arrived, there was nowhere to retreat to.

Salopek had made a career of illuminating the lives of the world's least powerful people caught in forces beyond their control; now, he had become a character in a quintessential Paul Salopek-type story, though when I spoke to him it was not clear whether he would ever publish it.

He seemed untroubled when I left each night, usually after two hours or more of conversation. He was ready to stay if that was his fate. But he appeared frustrated, knowing that I was leaving to report on the conflict that had drawn him here, but that was now out of his reach.

The last few days we met, it became clear that Salopek's situation was set to improve. His wife, Linda Lynch, Tribune Editor Ann Marie Lipinski and National Geographic Editor Chris Johns were on their way to Khartoum, the capital of Sudan, as part of a mission led by Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, where Salopek has a home. It was unlikely, we all knew, that President Omar Hassan al-Bashir had summoned them only to send them away empty-handed. As the endgame approached, the small contingent of U.S. diplomatic and military officials who had made it their mission to keep Salopek as safe and comfortable as possible began preparing for his departure. A Marine major wielding electric clippers gave him a high-and-tight haircut beneath a full moon. An Air Force lieutenant colonel shared some of his stash of premium cigars. The Americans also stepped up their quiet campaign of bribery for the courthouse staff -- delivering food, water and the occasional plastic tarp to make sure the mood at the prison stayed upbeat.

The day Salopek was freed, Saturday, Sept. 9, he and his two Chadian colleagues sat behind a small row of orange-painted bars, waiting for the judge to rule. It was the only time I saw Salopek bend his head in the pose of defeat, though maybe it was submission or exhaustion or relief. Moments later, at Bashir's request, the judge pardoned them all. They walked out free men, after 35 days in captivity.

In the glare of sunlight, Salopek exchanged hugs with most of his captors, including the judge, who urged him to write "a good story" about his time in Sudan. Salopek's many saviors -- his wife, his editors, Richardson and the U.S. officials -- were jubilant as he drove away, then boarded a plane to Khartoum for the first leg of the long journey home to New Mexico. I could see by the body language of the guards, who had grown accustomed to the warm smiles and steady bribes delivered by their star prisoner, that they were sorry to see him go.

In a strange, selfish way, so was I.

North Korea's No. 2 Leader Blasts U.S. (AP)

By Vanessa Arrington, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

North Korea's No. 2 leader blamed the lack of world peace on the United States Saturday at the Nonaligned Summit, saying that because of its failure to respect the sovereignty of other nations, "the international order is destroyed."

Parliament leader Kim Yong Nam said desires for peace by the 118 countries in the Nonaligned Movement were "confronted with grave challenges owing to the high-handed acts and unilateralism of the superpower, which denies countries and nations the independent choice of development."

The resulting imbalance in global politics constitutes "grave threats to world peace and security," he said.

It was the latest anti-American statement at a meeting that has brought together some of the staunchest U.S. foes, including the presidents of Iran, Venezuela and Zimbabwe.

The summit opened Friday when Cuba took over the three-year leadership of the group from Malaysia. Cuba's Defense Minister Raul Castro stood in place of his ailing brother, Fidel Castro, who is recovering from intestinal surgery.

The United States has declined an invitation to attend the Nonaligned summit in Havana and said it would have no comment on any of the proceedings.

Fidel Castro has yet to make an appearance at the summit, but has met with individual leaders in private, including U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika. Photos and video of the one-on-one encounters in Cuban state media show Castro in his pajamas — likely an unusual sight for summit participants.

Kim also defended the North's nuclear program amid concerns the communist country may be preparing to carry out an atomic weapons test.

North Korea "has been left with no other option but to possess nuclear weapons as a self-defensive deterrent," he said. "The DPRK would not need even a single nuclear weapon if there no longer existed a U.S. threat."

DPRK stands for Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the North's official name.

Kim said U.S. financial restrictions aimed at Pyongyang have created a deadlock in six-nation talks on its nuclear program, pushing the issue into "an unpredictable phase."

Recently, the United States has moved to sever North Korea's connections to outside banks, alleging any transactions conducted by the Pyongyang regime are suspect and could be connected to illegal activity — including money laundering and counterfeiting U.S. dollars.

Nuclear talks among the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States were last held in November, when negotiators failed to make progress on implementing an agreement in which the North pledged to give up its nuclear programs in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

"The DPRK will never go back to the talks under U.S. sanctions," Kim said.

DOJ_NMG_0064834

Also Saturday, Pakistan and India agreed to restart peace talks that were suspended after train bombings killed more than 200 people in Mumbai in June — part of a wave of attacks India blames on Pakistan-based militants.

Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed to Cabinet-level talks by their foreign secretaries after meeting on the sidelines of the summit. Singh also accepted an invitation to travel to Pakistan to further the peace process.

"I look forward to a purposeful visit at a time to be determined through diplomatic channels," Singh said after the meeting with Musharraf.

The Pakistani leader added: "We had a cordial, frank exchange of views on all aspects of India and Pakistan relations. It was agreed that the peace process must be obtained."

New Delhi blames Pakistan's support of the militants for stalling the peace process between the nuclear-armed neighbors, which have fought three wars since gaining independence from Britain in 1947, two over the Himalayan region of Kashmir.

More than a dozen militant groups are fighting to make Kashmir independent from Hindu-majority India or merge it with Muslim-dominated Pakistan. The insurgency has claimed 65,000 lives.

The Nonaligned Movement was formed during the Cold War to establish a neutral third path in a world divided by the United States and the Soviet Union.

Anti-U.S. Allies Back Iran Nukes (WT)

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

From combined dispatches

HAVANA -- Developing countries yesterday wrapped up a multinational summit with North Korea charging that U.S. threats drove it to acquire deterrent atomic weapons and Iran winning solid support for its nuclear ambitions.

Iran, Venezuela and Cuba joined North Korea in leading efforts to forge an anti-U.S. alliance. Summit leaders, in a statement on Iran, "reaffirmed the basic and inalienable right of all states to develop research, production and use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes."

They warned that any attack or threat against any nuclear facility used for peaceful purposes was a violation of international law.

North Korea took the opportunity to assail the United States for unilateral actions against individual countries and called for a revitalization of the 118-nation Non-Aligned Movement (NAM).

"The United States is attempting to deprive other countries of even their legitimate right to peaceful nuclear activities," said North Korea's second-ranking leader, Kim Yong-nam.

Mr. Kim blamed Washington for "threatening Korea using all sorts of maneuvers, accusing it of being part of an 'Axis of Evil.'"

He added: "Korea has nuclear arms as a deterrent to firmly guarantee the peace and security of the Korean Peninsula and the region."

The leaders' statement on Iran, released as the meeting ended, was an updated version of a document adopted in May at a NAM ministerial meeting in Malaysia.

They stressed that the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency found that all nuclear material declared by Iran had been accounted for.

Governments with friendly ties to Washington, among them India, Pakistan, Chile, Peru and Colombia, sought to steer the summit away from confrontation and finger-pointing at the United States.

"I do not see this summit as anti-U.S.," Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi told reporters. "NAM has been set up not to be anti-any country."

The NAM leaders called for a negotiated settlement to the nuclear dispute with Iran. The United States is pushing for sanctions to force Tehran to stop producing enriched uranium, which can be used both for both nuclear power and atomic weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0064835

Leaders took turns on the podium to decry global poverty, unfair trade practices and "arbitrary" actions by the United States and other powerful nations that they complained controlled the United Nations.

In a concrete result, nuclear-armed neighbors India and Pakistan agreed to resume formal peace negotiations that were frozen after the July train bombings in Bombay that killed nearly 200 people.

Cuban President Fidel Castro, a symbol of opposition to Washington, was scheduled to preside over the summit, but was too ill to attend.

Mr. Castro received U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan in a dressing gown in his hospital room. The 80-year-old communist leader, who took power in a revolution in 1959, ceded power temporarily to his brother, Raul, on July 31 after undergoing surgery to stop intestinal bleeding.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, with his penchant for banter and controversy, dominated the summit opening Friday, pledging support for Iran if it is attacked by the United States.

Other countries called for moderation. A Colombian delegate said friendlier nations had tried to soften the anti-U.S. content of the final statement.

The summit brought together some states not only impatient with what they see as a U.S.-dominated United Nations, but eager to strengthen the NAM as an alternative and to foster cooperation within the Third World.

"The United States is turning the Security Council into a platform for imposing its policies. ... We should reinforce NAM, and it should play its role more efficiently," Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Friday at the summit.

Group Puts Focus On N. Korea Rights (WT)

By Se Jeong Kim, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

Liberty in North Korea, a 2-year-old organization with a global reach, has found success drawing attention to human rights atrocities in the isolated communist state.

Its latest effort featured an airing of the movie "Seoul Train" at the American University in Northwest last week. The film opens with a small North Korean boy wandering around a market, searching the ground for bits of food to eat.

In another scene, a family of five attempts to enter the Japanese Embassy in Beijing, but Chinese guards drag them out. According to the film, all were arrested but were eventually granted asylum in South Korea.

The 1995 documentary by filmmakers Jim Butterworth, Lisa Sleeth and Aaron Lubarsky depicts the life-and-death struggle faced by North Koreans who attempt to flee their homeland through China.

"I didn't know specifically how many refugees there were, how many people tried to leave so often, how many were sent back, and how hard it was at all," said Mark Devries, a sophomore at the American University.

Established in 2004, Liberty in North Korea (LINK) coordinates programs raising awareness of North Korean human rights issues, said its executive director, Adrian Hong. LINK has 70 chapters around the world, including in Japan, South Korea and Belgium.

"The more public opinion is shaped on the issue, the more likely governments [will] move on the issue," Mr. Hong said.

That awareness, he said, is bringing tangible results. In 2004, Congress passed the North Korean Human Rights Act unanimously.

In 2005, Jay Lefkowitz was appointed as special envoy for North Korean human rights by President Bush. This year, for the first time, the United States granted asylum to six North Korean refugees.

"Silence is death. By purposefully ignoring the suffering that's happening there [North Korea], it causes more death and despair to North Korean people," said Suzanne Scholte, chairman of a separate organization, North Korean Freedom Coalition. "South Korea must stand up for the rights of the Korean people, whether born in the North or South," she said. Mrs. Scholte's group is part of Freedom House, founded by Eleanor Roosevelt.

The North Korea regime of President Kim Jong-il has endured famine during the past decade, leaving millions of people dead. Tens of thousands have fled to China, hoping to eventually resettle in South Korea or some other country. If caught they are automatically repatriated to North Korea, where they are sent to detention camps and sometimes beaten to death.

Far Across The DMZ (NYT)

By Mary Chi-whi Kim

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

Last December, after 55 years, members of our South Korean family reunited with northern relatives for two hours via satellite. It was one of hundreds of such virtual reunions that the Red Cross has organized for families who have been separated since the 1953 armistice split the country in half.

This was the first time I had ever seen my aunt Bo Ok. My father talked about her in his long prayers blessing our Thanksgiving feasts in America, where we have made our home, but he had not seen her since he was 14. Living in Seoul decades ago, my grandfather could not raise school tuition for both Bo Ok, his firstborn, and my father, his eldest son. He chose his eldest son and sent Bo Ok away to a country village to take the government-financed teacher training there. Persuaded by teachers to pursue more free education, she chose to go north. My grandfather was the last family member to see her; this was on Sept. 27, 1950, just before the United States reoccupied Seoul, still smoldering from bombardment.

On screen, in front of tan drapes in a modest office, Bo Ok flickered alive — a gray-haired matriarch sitting upright at a conference table stocked with bottled water. Her black traditional hanbok dress glimmered with silver beading and 12 military medals. I was startled to see her plump cheeks; I wondered if perhaps extra rations had been allotted before this reunion. She resembled my grandmother, but her fierce eyes cut through the screen. Seated to her right was her eldest son, in his 30's, with jutting cheekbones and a crew cut, dressed just as an American would dress for a funeral. He folded his handkerchief into a perfect square and repeatedly swabbed his gaunt forehead, cheeks, chin and eyes.

In a half-strangled voice, Father read his six-page letter, prepared over the previous two weeks. He had heard about the experience of others who participated in these reunions, in which the northern relatives kept expounding Communist rhetoric, essentially blocking dialogue with southerners. So Father spoke without letting up for an hour and a half, releasing 50 years of memories and dreams about his sister. He told her of our family's life in the United States.

"Sister, in his last moments, our father called for you," he said. "Our mother, on your birthday every March, stared out the window for you. We all did. I'm 70 now. Whenever I see a high-school girl with hair like yours, I become 14 again, searching for my big sister. Had I known, I would have told you this: I love you."

I was stunned by his open declaration. Bo Ok smiled, seemingly indulgent of the American influence that would allow him to speak this way. But sobs escaped from other constricted throats, and tears glistened on both sides of the Demilitarized Zone and on both sides of the Pacific.

He described their ancestral graveyard, which rests on a hometown hillside in the South. "When we got your letter in 2002, we were able finally to have every descendant's name engraved in the lineage on the back of headstones. When you come south," he paused for one second, "you will see all your names waiting there for you." He detailed the lineage on the southern side, counting off the children of his other sister and brother and introducing us, his four grown daughters.

"Rich in daughters, eh?" Bo Ok said. Everyone laughed.

"I have three daughters," she said. "Two sons." Her eyes lighted up. "My eldest daughter is a basketball player who heads the athletic program. Lots of awards. Takes after me, good athlete, good runner."

Bo Ok took 15 minutes to recount 50 years. She was serving as a nurse during the Korean War when a bomb severed her left leg. She was working as a technical editor when she met her husband. After another bomb, both his legs were amputated. "Two cripples married and raised five kids," she said. "Only possible through government help.

"Since I came north, the Honorable Leader cared for us — no hardship, plenty of food, enough to live. How else could two cripples do it? Fifty-five years since I left, I am treated well as a wounded veteran." I looked to my cousin's hollowed cheeks and then at Bo Ok's medal-covered chest.

My father spoke up: "Let us sing 'Tong Il Jang' together." The song was written by southerners to blend the national anthems of both Koreas and is now well known in the North and the South alike. My father's tenor took up the words: "Our hope is for one country, we pray even in dreams." We clapped and sang in unison, and the two-hour satellite meeting began to end.

My aunt's eyes clouded as the screen darkened to black.

Peacekeeping Grows, Strains U.N. (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Group's Troop Numbers Across Globe to Hit New High

UNITED NATIONS -- The United Nations is set to field its largest peacekeeping enterprise in its 61-year history, with more than 100,000 troops and police to be deployed by year's end in missions around the world.

The number could climb -- past 115,000 -- if Sudan accepts a new peacekeeping mission for Darfur, and costs for the forces could surpass $7 billion a year, more than double the $3 billion spent in 2000.

The unprecedented growth in peacekeeping operations is placing strains on the United Nations' capacity to respond to emerging crises in various parts of the world and is draining the pool of available troops both for the world body and for NATO. Global leaders will address those issues this week at annual appearances before the U.N. General Assembly. "When you look around the world today, we are stretched," U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan told reporters last week as he highlighted major themes for the session.

The latest surge in U.N. peacekeeping surpasses the previous peak, in the early 1990s, when more than 80,000 troops served in more than a dozen international missions, including major operations in Cambodia, Bosnia and Somalia.

It also marks the end of a retreat in funding for new missions by the United States, which was reluctant to approve risky and costly undertakings in Rwanda and other conflict zones after the deaths in 1993 of more than 18 U.S. Army Rangers at the hands of Somali militias. The United States still refuses to place its ground troops under U.N. command.

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said that the Bush administration continues to have misgivings about the organization's fitness to effectively manage its peacekeeping operations but that a proliferation of crises has forced U.S. support. "The requirements to establish or change existing peacekeeping missions are dictated by circumstances in the world, and that's why we have responded as we have," Bolton said.

The U.N. Security Council last month authorized an increase of more than 40 percent in the overall size of the peacekeeping force, including 1,600 police officers for East Timor and 13,000 additional troops for Lebanon, where the United Nations is trying to prevent a resumption of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah. The council also authorized more than 22,000 peacekeepers for Darfur, where government-backed militias are believed responsible for the deaths of hundreds of thousands of civilians and the displacement of more than 2 million people.

The Sudanese government, however, has refused to allow the United Nations to send peacekeepers to Darfur and has ably played on Western fears of entering a military quagmire. "The Sudanese have been very clear in exploiting some of these issues, saying, 'If you want to have another Iraq, come,' and this scared away some governments," Annan said.

U.N. officials have expressed concern that creation of these large missions carries risks for some of the organization's less visible operations, particularly in African countries such as Ivory Coast and Congo.

"The risk that there is going to be political neglect is high," Jean-Marie GuÃ©henno, the U.N.'s undersecretary for peacekeeping, said in an interview. "Darfur could be a victim of that overstretch."

According to a paper by Security Council Report, a private monitoring group, "There is simply no precedent in the United Nations for an increase in operations of this magnitude in the space of twenty days." The paper added: "It will present huge management challenges for the United Nations, which has been struggling to improve its capacity to manage the growth in peacekeeping operations."

The United Nations' critics in Congress have highlighted its failure to stamp out corruption in spending programs and to rein in sexual abuses against minors in several peacekeeping missions. The House has passed legislation threatening to cut off funding to the organization if it fails to prove it can better manage its costs.

"I can't say we go into this with a great deal of confidence, but we go into this with a sense that this has got to be done," Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) said of the new missions in Lebanon and Sudan. "The bottom line is right now there aren't a lot of choices."

The Bush administration has struggled to contain U.N. peacekeeping costs by ending or scaling back existing operations to make way for new ones. That strategy backfired in East Timor, where violence erupted between military factions after U.N.

troops pulled out. The United States and other Security Council members responded last month by approving a new force of 1,600 U.N. police for East Timor.

Despite its initial reservations about the virtues of U.N. nation-building, the Bush administration has led efforts to reinforce existing operations and create new ones for Haiti, Liberia, Sudan and Lebanon. It has repeatedly approved operations in countries where it has few national interests.

"You still have this rhetoric about the United Nations being a broken, fractured, incompetent and undependable organization," said James Dobbins, a senior foreign policy emissary for the Clinton and Bush administrations and author of a recent study by the Rand Corp. on U.N. peacekeeping. However, "There is no doubt that the Bush administration . . . embraces the concept of nation-building to a degree the Clinton administration couldn't have gotten away with it."

Dobbins credits the United Nations with providing some of the most inexpensive peacekeeping services in the world, saying it costs $45,000 a year to fund a U.N. peacekeeper, compared with $200,000 to deploy one NATO soldier. He also said the organization relies on a small number of military planners and headquarters staff members to launch a mission. "Four hundred to 600 people are managing the largest expeditionary force in the world other than that of the United States. It's bigger than NATO and the European Union put together," he said.

The World's Elder Statesman (LAT)

By James Traub, James Traub's Latest Book, "The Best Intentions: Kofi Annan And The U.n. In The Era Of American Worl

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Kofi Annan has revalidated and sharpened the U.N.'s role, regardless of his reputation to the contrary.

THE CAREER of U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, which will come to an end Dec. 31 with the completion of his second five-year term, has been bookended by dramatic peacemaking trips to the Middle East.

During the first, in February 1998, he headed off an impending U.S. bombing attack on Iraq by persuading Saddam Hussein to permit U.N. weapons inspectors to return to the country. The Daniel-in-the-lions'-den imagery of that meeting cemented his budding reputation as a moral hero. Last month, the 68-year-old Ghanaian returned from a lightning tour of Middle Eastern states with an agreement to lift Israel's suffocating embargo of Lebanon and reassurances about the brittle cease-fire established by a Security Council resolution.

This is the stuff of diplomatic melodrama — save that the props often turn out to be made of papier-mache. The Baghdad entente of 1998 began to fall apart soon after Annan returned to New York, and by December, British and American warplanes were striking targets in Iraq during four nights of heavy bombardment. As for the recent cease-fire between Israel and Hezbollah, it could give way at any moment because the United Nations lacks the mandate and the capability to disarm the Shiite militia.

In both cases, Annan did everything humanly possible, but a secretary-general, for all that we romanticize him, can do very little to alter the fundamental calculations of states. As the United Nations begins in earnest to choose a replacement for Annan, we must bear in mind that a secretary-general is, in the end, a creature of the geopolitical moment.

A U.N. truism holds that secretaries-general have good first terms and bad second ones. The arc of Annan's career certainly conforms to type. But that's not because he ran out of gas or because he exhausted his store of political capital. Rather, Annan had good luck followed by very, very bad luck.

From 1997 through 2000, the world was largely at peace, none of the horrific civil wars in the Third World rose to genocidal proportions, and the White House was occupied by an internationalist Democrat. Then, in rapid succession, a unilaterally-minded Republican took office, 9/11 shattered the interval of peace, the U.S. invaded Iraq in the teeth of international opposition and one of Sudan's interminable ethnic conflicts erupted into a scorched-earth war. The man who had won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2001 suddenly looked hapless, even pitiful.

Annan's detractors see it differently. They believe that he is very much the author of his own misfortunes. In late 2004, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) called for the secretary-general to resign, accusing him of tolerating an atmosphere of corruption inside the U.N. as the Iraqi oil-for-food scandal unfolded. Others critics in the West have insisted that Annan is hostile to Israel and to Washington's legitimate security interests.

In the developing world, on the other hand, Annan is regularly denounced as Washington's puppet, a charge often flung in his face during his recent swing through the Middle East. Others with no ideological ax to grind, including U.N. insiders, feel that Annan is far too much a creature of the U.N. (where he spent about 30 years before becoming secretary-general) to change its entrenched culture of patronage and idle paper-pushing.

But secretaries-general should be judged according to what they can do, and not what they can't. Even the great Dag Hammarskjold, the Swedish diplomat who served as the second U.N. chief, could do nothing to blunt the hostilities of the Cold War, including the Soviet invasion of Hungary in 1956. Hammarskjold's greatness lay elsewhere: in the immense prestige he lent to his office through the sheer force of his rhetoric and majestic impartiality, and in the development of a wholly new form of intervention known as peacekeeping. Hammarskjold made the U.N. matter as it had not before. Under him, it grew; under his successors — at least until Annan took over — it generally shrank. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, the gifted but sharp-tongued and imperious Egyptian who preceded Annan, so irked policymakers in Washington, including U.N. supporters, that he practically put the institution out of business.

Annan did not get the Nobel Peace Prize for temporarily averting war in Iraq. In fact, he did something harder: He restored the relevance of the U.N. The new U.N. head brought Washington back into the fold through a combination of unflagging solicitude and gentle prodding. Annan's promulgation of a new spirit of self-criticism brought the U.N. to anatomize the mistakes that led to the peacekeeping fiascos in Somalia, Bosnia and Rwanda in the 1990s. This, in turn, encouraged the U.S. and other states to fund new ventures in Sierra Leone, East Timor, the Congo and elsewhere. Finally, Annan restored the status of moral arbiter — of "secular pope" — with which Hammarskjold had first imbued the office.

Here one comes to the aspect of the job easiest to underestimate, or even to ridicule: The power of words. Does it really matter that in 1997, during his first trip to Africa as secretary-general, Annan preached to the continent's gathered heads of state about respect for human rights, admonishing them that to "treat it as an imposition, if not a plot, by the industrialized West" is "demeaning of the yearning for human dignity that resides in every African heart"?

Nine years later, that yearning for dignity is still routinely trampled. Yet Annan's insistence on the universality of human rights has produced a kind of atmospheric change: Third World potentates no longer dismiss human rights as a Western preoccupation. And Annan's willingness to upbraid African leaders on behalf of Western principles — something Boutros-Ghali would never do — gave him the freedom to make demands of the West on issues of development.

The U.N. Annan inherited was a protector of states and their prerogatives; the one he wishes, somewhat forlornly, to leave behind would be a protector of individuals — even against the state. Perhaps the most resonant words he has spoken during his decade in office came during his 1999 address to the General Assembly, when he defined the "core challenge" of the institution as ensuring that "massive and systematic violations of human rights — wherever they may take place — should not be allowed to stand."

Annan's support for the doctrine of "humanitarian intervention" was widely praised in the West and almost as widely condemned in the developing world, where it was seen as a license to violate sovereignty. The issue became unavoidable, and in its 60th anniversary meeting last year, the General Assembly formally accepted the principle that states had a responsibility to protect their own citizens and a duty to intervene to stop extreme cases of abuse in other countries.

To which, of course, one might say: Words are cheap. Indeed, Darfur's endless agonies seem to have been scheduled in order to expose the gross hypocrisy of "the international community." No country, including the U.S., which has been in the forefront of efforts to respond to the atrocities, has suggested sending troops against the will of the Sudanese government — the ultimate "responsibility" entailed in the responsibility to protect. But Annan, who as head of U.N. peacekeeping in 1994 was famously silent about the growing threat in Rwanda, has been a voice in the wilderness when it comes to Darfur.

In the end, the U.N. may be institutionally incapable of meeting this core challenge, in which case Annan's perverse achievement has been to demonstrate the limits of the institution to which he has devoted his life. But the moral imperative remains, as a club with which to beat the recalcitrant and a goad with which to prod the reluctant.

No matter what one thinks of Annan, there can be no doubt about the success of his campaign to revalidate the U.N. (for which many others also deserve to share credit). The U.N. fields more than 80,000 peacekeepers, and by deploying a muscular force in Lebanon, it is playing an indispensable role in the Mideast for the first time in decades. On matters such as development, in which in the past it had only a peripheral role, the U.N. has helped shape the debate by promulgating the Millennium Development Goals in 2000.

Annan wants the U.N. to be so much more than it is, but it sometimes feels like he's the only one who does. His highly ambitious campaign to reform the institution's doctrines and machinery barely avoided catastrophic failure; the achievements, on humanitarian intervention and human rights enforcement and "peace-building," were almost eclipsed by the divisiveness of the debate itself. And despite Annan's very cordial relations with President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the next secretary-general may face an even tougher job of incorporating the U.S. into the U.N. than Annan did.

One comes back, always, to the geopolitical facts of life. The U.N., at least that part dealing with issues of peace and security, cannot be any more effective than its most powerful members want or permit it to be. If China and Russia defend the sovereign rights of abusive regimes tooth and nail, if the U.S. treats the Security Council as either a nuisance or a rubber stamp, if leading Third World nations view reform as a conspiracy designed to rob them of power, then it won't make much difference who succeeds Annan.

The common ground to which Annan is forever beckoning his refractory members seems to exist mostly in his mind. For all Annan's emollient efforts, the atmosphere at U.N. headquarters right now is suffused with acrimony. You do have to wonder sometimes why anybody would want the job at all.

The Place Is A Mess, But It Beats Plan B (LAT)

By David Rieff, David Rieff Is The Author Of "At The Point Of A Gun: Democratic Dreams And Armed Intervention" And "

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

AS KOFI ANNAN'S tenure as United Nations secretary-general limps to its inglorious close, the prestige and even the future of the world organization he came into office determined to revitalize could scarcely seem bleaker.

In the minds of many Americans, the U.N. is little more than a glorified talking shop in which hostility to the United States is perhaps the only common denominator and whose impotence is matched only by its corruption.

Though popular with Americans when he first took over in 1997, Annan — who unwisely came back from a meeting with Saddam Hussein proclaiming that the Iraqi dictator was a man he could "do business with" — soon came to be seen as exemplifying all of the U.N.'s faults. Paradoxically, in much of the world, the U.N. and Annan are denounced for being too servile to Washington — an impression that was certainly bolstered during the recent G-8 meeting near St. Petersburg, Russia, when President Bush was caught saying on an open microphone that he was tempted to "tell Kofi" to call Syrian President Bashar Assad to get him to rein in Hezbollah.

In such an atmosphere of poisonous disenchantment, it is hardly surprising that many U.N. officials (including Annan himself, according to some insiders) despair of the organization's prospects. A few senior people remain upbeat, notably Undersecretary-General Shashi Tharoor, a longtime member of Annan's inner circle who is mounting a strong campaign to succeed him.

But for the most part, pessimism reigns, and understandably so: After all, the U.N., which was intended by its founders to be the premier institution for assuring peace and security in the world, now seems to lurch from crisis to crisis in a global environment that offers little peace and even less security.

In fact, despite the personal popularity Annan enjoyed before 9/11, the U.N. already had been marginalized institutionally as a guarantor of peace and security. The dismal failures of its peacekeeping operations in Bosnia (where at least 8,000 people died in Srebrenica alone in a U.N.-protected "safe area" in 1995) and Rwanda (where more than 800,000 Tutsis and moderate Hutus were killed while U.N. peacekeepers looked on impotently in 1994) seemed to suggest that the U.N. was simply too divided and too weak to keep peace, let alone restore it in a conflict zone.

By the same token, NATO's success (undertaken without Security Council authorization) in rolling back Slobodan Milosevic's campaign of mass deportation in Kosovo and other unilateral interventions, like that of the British military in Sierra Leone in 2000, which succeeded where a U.N.-sanctioned mission had failed, offered the prospect of effective global peace and security initiatives in which the U.N. would play little or no role. Instead of the sclerotic multilateralism that had failed to save the Rwandans or the Bosnians, we had entered an age of dynamic, unilateral peacekeeping and humanitarian intervention.

Or so ran the conventional wisdom, anyway. In retrospect, viewed through the prism of seemingly unwinnable wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, the picture looks rather different. In a world in which the so-called clash of civilizations is no longer an academic hypothesis but increasingly a reality, at least in the minds and hearts of enormous numbers of ordinary Muslims and Christians who each see the other as bent on all-out war (call it jihad or crusade, it makes little difference), the limits of what Western militaries can accomplish politically has become obvious.

To cite only one obvious example: If the population of Darfur were Buddhist, Hindu or Christian, there would be little risk in sending U.S. or Western European troops to protect them. But because Sudan is a Muslim country, the dispatch of a Christian army there is, rightly or wrongly, almost certain to be understood by much of the Muslim world at large not as a humanitarian effort but as an extension of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. Or, to put it another way, one of the unintended consequences of the Iraq war has been to render unilateral humanitarian intervention by the West in the Islamic world suspect in the eyes of many Muslims.

What this means is that unilateralism — and the reliance on "coalitions of the willing" — which seemed so promising in the late-1990s, has turned out not to be a viable alternative to the U.N. system after all. Anyone doubting this need only look at the central role that Annan and the U.N. Security Council played in halting the recent fighting between Israel and Hezbollah. From the outset, it was clear that the Bush administration would have to work through the U.N. and that only a peacekeeping force sanctioned by the world body could possibly be viewed as legitimate by the Lebanese or be effective in maintaining the cease-fire.

Even in the case of the Iranian nuclear program, which the Bush administration has described as posing an existential threat to U.S. security, Washington has opted to work through the traditional channels of Security Council resolutions and U.N.-sanctioned multilateral diplomacy.

In other words, and certainly not through lack of trying, even the most die-hard unilateralists have come to the realization that there is really no viable alternative to the U.N., however much they might wish it otherwise. How else to explain U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton — a man who is on record as having said that if 10 stories were removed from the U.N. headquarters building no one would notice the difference — behaving these days like a U.N. booster?

The hard fact is that, despite its fallen reputation and its many failures, the U.N.'s future is perfectly viable because no one has a good alternative to propose. Iraq has certainly demonstrated the American public's lack of willingness to tolerate long, costly exercises in imperial nation-building. And neither former colonial powers like Britain and France nor rising new powers like China and India want the job of securing peace and security in the world. Which leaves … the U.N.

Obviously, this is a negative endorsement, not a ringing accolade, and there is no reason to think that the world body is suddenly going to become more effective in guaranteeing global stability. But just as even Annan's severest critics have ended up appealing to him in many of the gravest international crises of the last decade, so they will likely tread the same path to the door of his successor, whether it turns out to be Shashi Tharoor of India, South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon or some other candidate.

Doubtless they will do so with bad grace, reluctantly and with the full knowledge of how powerless the U.N. actually is. But they will do so nonetheless because there is no viable alternative and because, in this age of civilizational clash and global turbulence, it is far too dangerous for them to do anything else.

Lighten Up On Bolton (LAT)

Jonah Goldberg

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

He's smart, tough and willing to stick it to the U.N.

I SPEAK NOW not so much in praise of John Bolton as in dispraise of Boltophobia. Bolton is a fine man, a sharp intellectual, a committed public servant and has the most aggressive mustache in American politics today. He's done a first-rate job as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations during his yearlong interim appointment, and were it not for the waffling of Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee, who has sorta-kinda-maybe changed his mind on Bolton in order to get reelected in liberal Rhode Island, we wouldn't be having this conversation.

DOJ_NMG_0064842

Even Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio), who's had a feck transplant since his acute bout of fecklessness last year — when he melodramatically decided that he couldn't support Bolton — has changed his mind. His reason for his opposition back then: Bolton was a meanie. The U.N., Voinovich seemed to be suggesting, needs more Hallmark card moments, and Bolton doesn't come with heart-shaped candies and a tickle-me button on his tummy for the ambassador from Syria to poke when he's blue.

Instead, in Voinovich's view, Bolton was a "kiss-up, kick-down" kind of guy, which made a weepy Voinovich "worried about my kids and my grandchildren." We now know that Voinovich was simply a victim of Boltophobia, a kind of St. Vitus' dance that causes otherwise reasonable people to go into twitching fits over the fact that Bolton doesn't love the U.N. enough. The problem is most Americans agree with Bolton that the U.N. is a cesspool of its own crapulence, stealing American tax dollars intended for global do-goodery while working against American interests.

"We can't argue that this guy is unfit just because he's said mean things about the U.N.," a "top Senate Democrat" admitted to Time magazine last year. "Don't forget, most Americans agree with him."

So instead, his opponents went after him by launching a bizarre assault on his character, using partisan and sometimes loopy accounts of his behavior from more than a decade ago. (Remember Melody Townsel? The Dallas woman who said that Bolton had chased her down the halls of a hotel in Moscow in 1994, throwing things at her and "behaving like a madman.") Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut — who's reportedly hated Bolton for decades because of disagreements over Latin America policy — hysterically claimed that Bolton's behavior toward subordinates "ought to be indictable," and California Sen. Barbara Boxer wanted to send him to "anger management counseling." It was all nonsense, and everyone knew it.

The real, underlying issue was that Bolton (like most Americans) thinks that the U.N. is the problem, while those infected with Boltophobia think that it's the solution — and that the U.S. is the problem.

It is a conflict of visions. Bolton thinks that his role is to use the U.N. as a tool for advancing American interests, and if that means we need to work with others, then hurray for working with others. Boltophobes believe that working with others is its own reward and that any talk of U.S. interests that doesn't involve ceding more sovereignty to Turtle Bay is denounced as "cowboy unilateralism." Bolton believes that his job is to conduct the foreign policy of the president of the United States. Boltophobes think our ambassador to the U.N. should also work as the U.N.'s goodwill ambassador to us. Bolton thinks that he should follow the examples of Jeane Kirkpatrick and Daniel Patrick Moynihan as a vocal and principled defender of American ideals. Boltophobes think that this is hubristic Bush-speak.

Depending on which of these visions you subscribe to, Bolton has either been terrible or terrific. He has rallied the Security Council behind important resolutions on Iran, North Korea and the Israel-Hezbollah cease-fire. He scuttled Kofi Annan's attempts to ban weapons in space and to, in effect, tax wealthy nations through a wealth transfer scheme that ignores U.N. inefficiency and corruption. He stood on principle against the whitewash restructuring of the U.N. Human Rights Commission, which has been more likely to include human rights abusers than to condemn them (earning him praise from the New York Times). And he has put the onus on the U.N. to prove its relevance by fighting genocide in Darfur and cleaning its own Augean stables on the East River.

There's no cure for Boltophobia. The best we can do is keep it from controlling our lives. And that means Bolton should be confirmed. Let the man do his job.

Give Bolton The Boot (LAT)

By Stephen Schlesinger, Stephen Schlesinger Is The Author, Most Recently, Of "Act Of Creation," On The Founding Of The Unite

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

The U.S. shouldn't have an ineffective bully as its U.N. envoy.

ALL SUMMER, the Bush administration has been pressuring the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to make John Bolton the permanent U.S. envoy to the United Nations. Bolton is serving until January on a temporary assignment because his notorious anti-U.N. reputation and difficult temperament (among other things) made the Republican-controlled committee unwilling to confirm him to the post last year.

DOJ_NMG_0064843

Now, Bolton has had 12 months to show his stuff. And frankly, there is still no evidence to suggest that he deserves a full-time posting.

Bolton has never been a diplomat — which, among his supporters, is regarded as a mark of honor. He hails from the Republican Party's extreme conservative wing. Bush chose him to please the most fervent right-wingers in his administration, most of whom either scorn or want to terminate the United Nations.

Bolton has for a long time been an excessive and unrestrained critic of the U.N. Among his infamous utterances: that it wouldn't make a difference if 10 stories were sliced off the U.N. building; that the U.S. has no obligation to pay its dues to the organization; that the Security Council should be reduced to one member, namely the U.S. And, perhaps his most notable sally, that "there's no such thing as the United Nations."

His record since taking over as ambassador in August 2005 has shown that his adversarial stance toward the institution has not softened. In his first month as U.N. envoy, he gleefully undermined the most comprehensive reform movement in U.N. history by insisting on the adoption of hundreds of irrelevant amendments that were never going to be accepted by the General Assembly.

Later, when the U.N. did agree on one important change — creating a new, reformed Human Rights Council — he argued furiously against it, rallied just three other nations to the cause (out of 191) and eventually saw the U.S. go down to a humiliating defeat. Then he turned around and said he would work with the council and help it financially but not join it. Which left Washington looking not just like a loser, but a whiny one at that. As Sen. Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.) remarked, Bolton was not just a bully, but an "ineffective" one.

In furtherance of his mission, Bolton also has promoted various pet causes at the institution. For example, when issues of population control or limiting the use of small arms come up, he brings into his office antiabortion activists and National Rifle Assn. members, respectively, to take the other side.

He has, on occasion, reportedly sneaked around his own nominal boss, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to Vice President Dick Cheney's office to get support for his own hard-line views at the U.N. — for example, his refusal last summer to endorse the U.N.'s Millennium Development Goals aimed at reducing poverty in the developing world. Rice eventually forced him to reverse that stance.

To the extent that he has been able to operate at all at the United Nations — most recently in the Israel-Hezbollah cease-fire — he has had to bow to a new realism within the Bush administration, and yes, sometimes, to international pressure. Even then, though, according to published news reports, he doesn't get along well with our allies. His bristling nature has left many bruised feelings among his colleagues. His accomplishments are marginal at best. He may be among the most ineffective envoys the United States has ever sent to the U.N.

Just when the administration thought Bolton was finally going to be approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) began to raise questions about Bolton's performance and pushed to delay the vote. The Bush administration is said to be exploring other ways to keep Bolton in the job.

A responsible nation that intends to harmonize differing viewpoints and work out compromises to further U.S. national security interests makes a serious error in appointing a Jacobin to work inside a collegial global body.

Bolton's presence on the same roster with previous U.S. envoys such as Henry Cabot Lodge, Adlai Stevenson, Arthur Goldberg, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, Madeleine Albright, Richard Holbrooke and Bush appointees John Negroponte and John Danforth — or, for that matter, with George H.W. Bush — is a blemish on our nation. His nomination should be rejected again by the Senate.

Cambodia Greets A Cash Invasion (LAT)

By Don Lee, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

The fledging democracy has opened its arms to a Chinese spending spree, but U.S. officials are watching warily

American diplomats made a big splash early this year when they opened an embassy near Wat Phnom, the sacred hill of temples where Phnom Penh was founded.

DOJ_NMG_0064844

U.S. Ambassador Joseph A. Mussomeli trumpeted the three-story marble-and-granite outpost as a "powerful symbol" of American interests in the impoverished country.

On the other side of the capital, the Chinese also are giving their embassy a makeover. But they're doing a lot more in Cambodia.

The Chinese are digging up minerals and exploring for oil. They are cutting down forests and in some places planting saplings. And across Cambodia, they are building garment factories, power plants, bridges and roads, some into neighboring Laos.

For centuries, the Kingdom of Cambodia has tried to fend off greater powers such as Thailand, Vietnam and France. But today Phnom Penh is welcoming the Chinese with open arms, praising Beijing as a government that offers its largess unconditionally.

By Phnom Penh's tally, Chinese state-owned and private companies plowed more than $450 million into Cambodia last year — a 460% increase over 2004 — making China by far the nation's top foreign investor. Beijing says it is also giving hundreds of millions of dollars in loans and aid to Cambodia, easily surpassing the $62 million in loans and aid from the U.S.

Some Western diplomats see China's growing influence here as a threat to American political interests in the region. Cambodia, a nation of 14 million, is a fledgling democracy. It conducted open elections in the wake of civil war a decade ago and the brutal Khmer Rouge regime in the 1970s. Its constitutional monarchy provides for a multiparty system, unlike neighbors Vietnam, Laos and China, each ruled by an unopposed Communist Party.

Cambodian politics are dominated by Prime Minister Hun Sen — who came to power in a bloody 1997 coup but has overseen the country's democratic reforms — and analysts say the rule of law and press freedoms have not taken root. Washington has tried to exert influence on Cambodia through its aid, which is earmarked mostly for health and education. But as Chinese support increases, some U.S. officials worry that it will ease the pressure on Phnom Penh to fight pervasive corruption and build democratic institutions.

Cambodia has embraced the Middle Kingdom because "China has proven different from other donors. They don't impose conditions," Cham Prasidh, the minister of commerce, said in an interview here. "Others say, 'You have to do this with human rights, you have to do that with democratic reforms.' China doesn't do that."

China's interest in this country — where income per person was $350 in 2004 — is largely driven by the same need that is sending Chinese to remote regions in Africa, Central Asia and South America: to secure natural resources to fuel its expanding economy and enhance its global political muscle.

China's trek is often secretive, as banker John Brinsden has learned.

The Briton is vice chairman of locally owned Acleda Bank. A field representative in Rovieng, a tiny farming village, recently called by shortwave radio to tell him that a potential client had moved to the remote area.

Brinsden drove eight hours north along mostly dirt roads to the village, which is surrounded by jungle — and land mines.

Next to the bank's outpost, Brinsden could see that a mining company was setting up offices behind a corrugated fence. But in his research later, he could find no permits or other records of the company. To the veteran banker, this was the Chinese way of doing business in Cambodia.

"They're very low-key," he said.

China's spending spree has helped Cambodia's economy come out of the doldrums. Tourism and garment production are growing briskly. Luxury sport utility vehicles are a common sight in the streets of Phnom Penh. The country's banks hold 30% more in deposits than a year ago.

The cash is certainly flowing at Naga's casino next to Buddhist temples on the eastern end of town. A construction firm from China is building a 500-room hotel by the gambling hall for its Chinese Malaysian owner.

"The big rollers are from mainland China," said Michael Nen, a former Long Beach policeman who runs security for Naga Resorts & Casinos here.

Yet many Cambodians are wary of China's growing presence in their homeland. Some talk bitterly about Beijing's support for Pol Pot, the man who engineered the Khmer Rouge's reign of terror, which left more than 1 million Cambodians dead on killing fields or from hunger.

DOJ_NMG_0064845

Other Cambodians complain that the Chinese, along with other foreign companies, are plundering the nation and buying up vast swaths of land in secret deals with corrupt local officials. Such trade has uprooted families and made life harder for many people, they say.

Companies are racing to exploit oil and natural gas deposits found beneath Cambodia's waters last year. Chevron Corp. has locked up key drilling sites, but Chinese enterprises, including state-owned CNOOC Ltd., which lost its bid for Unocal Corp. to Chevron last year, are jockeying for an advantage in Cambodia.

Chinese officials in Beijing and Cambodia declined to talk about China's presence here.

Chinese academics said Beijing had good reason to extend its hand toward Cambodia.

"China needs Cambodia's cooperation on many important issues, such as Taiwan, Tibet and human rights," said Shen Shishun, director of Asia-Pacific studies at the China Institute of International Studies in Beijing.

Throughout Phnom Penh, hundreds of storefront signs are written in both Khmer and Chinese. Ethnic Chinese account for just 1% of Cambodia's population, but as in other Southeast Asian countries, they play a significant role in commerce. Chinese businesspeople are helping to build a $10-million Chinatown near the French Embassy.

Pung Kheav Se, who is ethnic Chinese and was born in Cambodia, is the founder of Canadia Bank, which holds one-fourth of the nation's bank deposits. He fled the country in the late 1970s and made a fortune trading gold bars in Montreal before returning to Phnom Penh in 1991. Pung said China Development Bank officials recently paid him a visit to discuss aid to Cambodia.

"I see a lot of change for the better," he said.

On a recent weekend, the city of Chongqing in central China was recruiting students for its schools at a domed conference center here. Across town, behind the gates of Universal Apparel Co., a red banner welcomed governors from China's Fujian province.

Cham Prasidh, the commerce minister, said the Chinese were not given preferential treatment.

If the United States has lost economic influence in Cambodia to China, the minister suggested, Americans have only themselves to blame.

"The investors from the U.S. say they want more transparency. They don't understand the Asian mentality; they are not flexible in negotiating," he said. "The Chinese feel very much at home in Cambodia."

The Rise Of Baidu (That's Chinese For Google) (NYT)

By David Barboza

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

BEIJING

IN the summer of 1998 at a picnic in Silicon Valley, Eric Xu, a 34-year-old biochemist, introduced his shy, reserved friend Robin Li to John Wu, then the head of Yahoo's search engine team.

Mr. Li, 30 at the time, was a frustrated staff engineer at Infoseek, an Internet search engine partly owned by Disney, a company whose fading commitment to Infoseek did not mesh with Mr. Li's ongoing passion for search. Like Disney, Mr. Wu and Yahoo were also losing interest in the business prospects of search, and Yahoo — in a colossal corporate blunder — eventually outsourced all of its search functions to a little startup named Google.

Mr. Xu, who had called together some friends for a documentary he was making on Silicon Valley, thought the two search guys would hit it off. Mr. Wu says he exchanged greetings with Robin Li, but what most impressed him was that despite all of the pessimism surrounding search, Mr. Li remained undaunted.

"The people at Yahoo didn't think search was all that important, and so neither did I," says Mr. Wu, who is now the chief technology officer at the Chinese Internet company Alibaba.com. "But Robin, he seemed very determined to stick with it. And you have to admire what he accomplished."

Indeed. A year after the picnic, in 1999, Mr. Li founded his own search company in China, naming it Baidu (pronounced "by-DOO"). Today, Baidu has a market value of $3 billion and operates the fourth-most trafficked Web site in the world. And Baidu is doing what no other Internet company has been able to do: clobbering Google and Yahoo in its home market.

While Baidu continues to gain market share in China — and does so with a Web site that the Chinese government heavily censors and that gives priority to advertising rather than relevant search results — some analysts question whether Baidu can withstand competition from Google and Yahoo, which possess superior technology and global work forces.

But Baidu's evolution, and Mr. Li's journey as an entrepreneur, offer textbook examples of the payoffs and perils of doing business in China and suggest that Baidu may prove to be far more resilient than some analysts believe. China has a population of 1.3 billion, about 130 million of whom are Internet users, an online market second in size only to the American market. Because China is the world's fastest-growing major economy, analysts consider it the next great Internet battleground, with Baidu uniquely positioned to prosper from that competition.

In exchange for letting censors oversee its Web site, Baidu has sealed its dominance with support from the Chinese government, which regularly blocks Google here and imposes strict rules and censorship on other foreign Internet companies.

In addition, analysts say, entrepreneurs in China have a knack for pummeling American Internet giants. "The globally dominant U.S. Internet companies have failed to take the No. 1 market share position in any category," says Jason D. Brueschke, a Citigroup analyst, of the Chinese market. "And they came with more money and major brand names. And so there's something fundamentally different about this market."

So fundamentally different, Mr. Brueschke believes, that Baidu will retain its hammerlock on the Chinese search industry. "The real battle in the competitive landscape is not about who's No. 1, it's about who's going to be No. 2," he says.

Google, of course, will have none of this, stressing the independence of its search results and the international reach it offers users. "People want information and they want global information," says Kaifu Lee, the president of Google in China. "We can't be bought."

But Mr. Li says Baidu's model is working supremely well and that the company has built a loyal base of users who value its search capabilities. "At the end of the day, if a user finds relevant information, they'll come back," he says.

ON its corporate Web site, Baidu says that it takes its name from a Song Dynasty poem written several centuries ago that "compares the search for a retreating beauty amid chaotic glamour with the search for one's dream while confronted by life's many obstacles."

Mr. Li, born Li Yanhong in 1968 in what was then an impoverished city 200 miles southwest of Beijing, is familiar with life's obstacles. The fourth of five children, he grew up during China's brutal Cultural Revolution. Despite the oppression that surrounded him, he said he was always able to focus on stamp collecting, performing traditional opera and other interests — including, eventually, computers. He was bright enough to get into the country's most prestigious school, Beijing University, where he majored in library science and dabbled in computer science.

The government infamously cracked down on pro-democracy demonstrations in Tiananmen Square in 1989 when Mr. Li was a sophomore, causing his college campus to be shut down. Mr. Li is mum on the events that followed, saying only that he was apolitical. But he does say that a year later he started thinking of studying abroad and that by the time he graduated in 1991 he was ready to leave his homeland.

"China was a depressing place," he says. "I thought there was no hope."

He applied to the top three graduate programs in computer science in America, but did not get into any of them (perhaps, he says, because China was considered an also-ran in technology). "I blindly sent out 20 applications," he says. "SUNY Buffalo was the only program willing to give me a fellowship."

He enrolled at Buffalo planning to earn a Ph.D. in computer science but grew disillusioned with academia. He completed his master's degree in 1994 and then joined a New Jersey division of Dow Jones & Company, where he helped develop a software program for The Wall Street Journal's online edition. During that time, he also became enamored of the technology boom taking shape in Silicon Valley. He spent much of his time trying to solve one of the Internet industry's earliest problems: sorting information.

A breakthrough came in 1996, he says, when he developed a search mechanism he called "link analysis," which involved ranking the popularity of a Web site based on how many other Web sites had linked to it.

"The moment I created this thing I was very excited," he says. "I told my boss and pushed him. But he wasn't very excited." Soon after, he attended a computer conference in Silicon Valley and set up his own booth to demonstrate his search findings.

William I. Chang, then the chief technology officer at Infoseek, met Mr. Li at the conference and recruited him to oversee search engine development.

"Robin is possibly the single most brilliant and focused person I know," Mr. Chang says. "And his inventions, now widely adopted, are still the gold standards in Web search relevance."

After Disney acquired the small fraction of Infoseek stock it did not already own in 1999, it shifted the company's focus away from search and toward content, leading Mr. Li to form his own Internet company with Eric Xu, who had a Ph.D. in biochemistry and good contacts in Silicon Valley.

The partners raised $1.2 million from two Silicon Valley venture capital firms, Integrity Partners and Peninsula Capital, and with their seed money in hand flew to China and founded Baidu in a hotel room overlooking Beijing University's campus. Nine months later, in September 2000, two other venture capital firms, Draper Fisher Jurvetson and IDG Technology Venture, pumped another $10 million into the startup.

So it was that on the eve of the Internet bubble bursting in the United States, Baidu took off in China.

"When I came back I was prepared for a rough life," Mr. Li says. "It turns out it wasn't so bad."

Baidu started out offering search services to other Chinese portals before developing its own stand-alone search engine. Some members of Baidu's board of directors opposed the shift, saying it would turn customers into competitors. But Mr. Li said he sensed a shift in the market after watching the success of Overture, a company in Pasadena, Calif., that sold advertising space correlated with search results (which meant, for example, that ads for dental clinics might pop up next to search results for cavities).

"We were skeptical about search," says Scott Walchek, a partner at Integrity Partners and a member of Baidu's board. "But we weren't as smart as Robin. Robin said he had a unique opportunity to build a brand around search. And he was right."

In September 2001, Baidu began its own site — Baidu.com — which looked almost exactly like Google's no-frills home page. And even before Google did it, Baidu allowed advertisers to bid for ad space and then pay Baidu every time a customer clicked on an ad. Small and medium-size companies loved it, the site became deluged with traffic and Baidu turned a profit in 2004. By then, Mr. Li was pushing for an initial public offering in the United States, insisting it would be a huge branding event for a company that had come to be called "China's Google."

BAIDU went public on Aug. 5, 2005, at $27 a share. When trading ended that day, shares of Baidu closed at $122, up 354 percent, the biggest opening on Nasdaq since the dot-com peak in 2000. Suddenly, Baidu was a $4 billion company and Mr. Li held stock worth more than $900 million. But not everyone cheered. Many analysts said that by almost every measure Baidu's stock was ridiculously over-valued. It eventually tumbled to as low as $44 before rebounding. On Friday, its shares closed up $3.03 in regular trading, to $87.75, giving the company a market capitalization of about $2.94 billion.

At the time of the I.P.O., some critics attacked Baidu's zealousness for ad revenues. They noted, for example, that a Baidu search for the word "cancer" turned up ads for hospitals that paid for top spots in results rather than returning information on cancer itself. In comparison, Google and Yahoo more clearly separate ads from relevant search results by placing them on the right side of the page.

The company's revenue jumped 190 percent in the first half of this year, to $40.9 million; profit soared 550 percent, to $11.7 million. Baidu's Web site is drawing millions of young people eager to download music files, create blogs or search for pictures of China's "10 Most Beautiful Women." While Baidu is growing fast, its revenue is still anemic compared with Google's, which is expected to top $7 billion this year.

Analysts say Baidu is playing to a different audience than Western Internet companies because the Chinese are far more interested in entertainment than news, books or car rental rates. "The fact is 70 percent of China's Internet users are under the age of 30," says Richard Ji, an analyst with Morgan Stanley. "Most of them are single, only children. They're looking for entertainment."

DOJ_NMG_0064848

That may explain why China's dominant Internet companies are all entertainment focused, like Tencent (which hosts online communities and instant messaging) and Netease and Shanda (which are online gaming sites).

Yet no Internet company in China is growing as fast as Baidu, which had more than 50 percent of the pay-per-click market in the first half of year, up from a 37 percent share in the same period a year ago, according to Analysys, a research firm in Beijing. Google and Yahoo both lost ground, with each company holding 16 percent pay-per-click shares for the first six months of 2006.

Still, Baidu faces significant challenges. The company's stock is in the stratosphere, putting pressure on management to deliver knockout growth every quarter. Google's shares closed up $5.90 Friday in regular trading, to $409.88, meaning investors pay a hefty $60 for every $1 of profit in the stock, far more than other Internet companies. But Baidu investors pay a whopping $190 for every $1 of profit.

Baidu also faces legal challenges, including lawsuits claiming it violates copyright laws on music files. Baidu has been sued over the issue, but continues to provide links to sites that offer music files. The company says it does not believe it should be held responsible for simply offering linking to other sites. In a country rampant with claims of click fraud, a Beijing hospital recently claimed that Baidu orchestrated a scheme in which a Baidu affiliate kept clicking on the hospital's ads to fatten the fees it had to pay Baidu. A Baidu spokeswoman says the company has not reviewed the case, but actively polices click fraud.

LOOMING on the horizon are Google and Yahoo. Google says it plans to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to compete in China, and Yahoo has merged its operations here with Chinese Internet behemoth Alibaba.com.

"Google is fierce," Morgan Stanley's Mr. Ji says. "And Alibaba has the best sales force. Baidu could get hurt on the technical side."

But the Chinese market is littered with the wreckage of American Internet companies that have failed to dominate here. In 2003, eBay bought the largest Chinese auction company — and then lost market share. In 2004, Amazon bought the largest Chinese online merchandiser — and then lost market share.

Now, the real fight begins. Google, which invested $5 million in Baidu just before its public offering last year, sold that stake for a hefty $60 million in June. And now, Google is building up a huge research team in Beijing, not far from Baidu's headquarters. But analysts say it won't be easy for Google.

"The American Internet giants are dominant in the U.S. and dominant in Europe," Mr. Brueschke at Citigroup says. "And then they come to China and fail. And so what I want to know is: What is Google going to do differently?"

For his part, Robin Li seems undaunted.

"Our traffic keeps increasing," he says confidently. "We're now the No. 1 Web site in China."

India And Pakistan To Resume Talks (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

HAVANA, Sept. 16 (AP) — Pakistan and India agreed Saturday to restart peace talks suspended since train bombings killed more than 200 people in Mumbai in July, part of a wave of attacks for which India blames Pakistan-based militants.

Describing their meeting as a breakthrough for peace, the Pakistani president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, and the Indian prime minister, Manmohan Singh, agreed on cabinet-level talks. Mr. Singh also said he had accepted an invitation to travel to Pakistan to further the process.

"I look forward to a purposeful visit at a time to be determined through diplomatic channels," Mr. Singh said after the leaders worked out the details Saturday morning on the sidelines of the Nonaligned Movement summit meeting in Havana.

"I am very happy — it's very good," General Musharraf said. "We had a cordial, frank exchange of views on all aspects of India and Pakistan relations. It was agreed that the peace process must be obtained."

Both leaders also said in a joint statement that they rejected "all acts of terrorism."

Pakistan and India agreed Saturday to restart peace talks suspended since train bombings killed more than 200 people in Mumbai in July as part of a wave of attacks India blames on Pakistan-based militants.

Describing their meeting as a breakthrough for peace, Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed their foreign secretaries would pursue the talks, and said Singh had accepted an invitation to go to Pakistan.

Their joint statement said they had a "cordial, frank exchange of views on all aspects of India and Pakistan relations" and they "strongly condemn all acts of terrorism."

"I look forward to a purposeful visit at a time to be determined through diplomatic channels," Singh said after the leaders reached agreement Saturday morning on the sidelines of the Nonaligned Movement summit in Havana.

"I am very happy — It's very good," Musharraf said.

The breakthrough came when both sides agreed to set up a joint working group to identify and stop terrorists, said Shivshankar Menon, who becomes India's foreign secretary next month. India already has such anti-terrorism groups with more than 20 countries and regional groups such as the European Union, but working with Pakistan this way is unprecedented, he said.

"We're working at eliminating the trust deficit," he said. "This is a new step, a new way."

Earlier, Musharraf had expressed optimism that his meeting with Singh could lead to a cease-fire along their common border in the Himalayan mountains.

"A historic opportunity like this must be seized by the leadership of the two countries to bring to a close the chapter and tension in our region," Musharraf said in his address to the Nonaligned Movement meeting.

But Singh has said Pakistan must do more to control militant groups based in its territory.

"This terrorism will surely act as a dampener. I have said more than once, that I can't carry the Indian public opinion with me if terrorist acts continue to plague our polity," Singh said on his way to Havana.

A series of terrorist bombings have ripped across India in the past year. The most recent was the July 11 attack that hit seven Mumbai commuter trains during peak evening traffic, killing more than 200 people. The bombings have been blamed on Pakistan-based Muslim militants.

New Delhi blames Pakistan's support of the militants for stalling the peace process between the nuclear-armed neighbors, which have fought three wars since gaining independence from Britain in 1947, two over the Himalayan region of Kashmir.

Pakistan's government denies training and funding the Islamic militants, and said it had nothing to do with the train bombings, but it has acknowledged offering the rebels moral and political support.

More than a dozen militant groups are fighting to make Kashmir independent from Hindu-majority India or to merge it with Muslim-dominated Pakistan. The insurgency has claimed about 65,000 lives.

Mumbai was formerly known as Bombay.

Indian, Pakistani Leaders Agree To Resume Talks (AFP)

By Patrick Moser

AFP, September 17, 2006

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed at breakthrough talks in Havana to resume negotiations on the disputed Kashmir region and jointly battle terrorism.

"The leaders decided to continue the joint search for mutually acceptable options for a peaceful negotiated settlement on all issues between India and Pakistan, including Jammu and Kashmir," the Indian premier said, reading a joint statement.

"It was agreed the peace process must be maintained and respected," said Singh, who was flanked by Musharaf.

"In this context, we have directed our foreign secretaries to resume dialogue," he said, adding they would meet "shortly" in New Dehli.

Saturday's talks, held on the sideline of a Non Aligned Movement (NAM) summit in Havana, were the first high-level meeting between the two countries since deadly bombings in Mumbai on July 11. India accused its neighbor of not reining in "terrorists."

DOJ_NMG_0064850

"We met in the aftermath of the Mumbai blasts. We strongly condemned all acts of terrorism and agreed terrorism was a scourge that needs to be dealt with," Singh said.

The leaders also agreed the two countries would put in place a joint system to "identify and implement counter-terrorism initiatives and investigations."

India had earlier indicated a condemnation of terrorism was key to reaching an agreement on the resumption of negotiations over Kashmir.

The Himalayan territory is shared by the two countries but claimed in its entirety by both. It has been the source of three wars since 1947, and at least 44,000 people have been killed since the outbreak of an Islamic insurgency in Indian Kashmir in 1989.

Indian foreign secretary designate Shivshankar Menon said the agreement on terrorism "has made it possible for us to clear resumption of the dialogue."

"What we see is elements in Pakistan connected to terrorism in India. This is one way of dealing with it," he said of the agreement to set up an "anti-terrorism institutional mechanism."

"Terrorist incidents make it very difficult to deal with business as usual. Particularly if they come from Pakistan," he said at a news conference.

The Indian prime minister also held private talks with several of the leaders attending the NAM summit, including Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and Hugo Chavez of Venezuela.

Singh also met with Cuba's acting president Raul Castro, 75, who represented his convalescing brother Fidel Castro, 80 at the NAM summit.

Fidel Castro was named president of the NAM, taking over from Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Badawi, but officials said he would only assume those functions once he has fully recovered from intestinal surgery he underwent in July.

In Russia, Business-Class Killings (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

MOSCOW

VIOLENT deaths continuously punctuate the civic discourse in Russia. The list of victims and motives is grim and long: contract hits on rivals, bombs to settle business disputes, racist attacks on laborers from the Caucasus or Central Asia and students from Africa or South America, and the almost regular killings of police officers in Russian republics where ethnic and religious tensions are inflamed. These are all part of the unsettled life in a nation still recovering from Lenin's failed experiment.

But the murder last week of Andrei Kozlov, one of Russia's top bank regulators, served as a reminder that even the upper strata of society here are not immune from the vicious rules of the Russian street. Mr. Kozlov, who had been spearheading banking reform, was ambushed Wednesday night as he left a soccer game. Two assassins shot him in the torso and the head, then threw their pistols to the ground as they ran away. No arrests have been made.

Investigators and Mr. Kozlov's colleagues say he was almost certainly killed because of his work. He had been closing disreputable banks and pressuring money launderers — risky endeavors by any estimate. As Russia's middle class has grown and its larger cities have undergone surges of development, the image of a nation in the grip of businessmen flanked by thick-necked men with assault rifles has softened. But the violence continues, at a slower pace since President Vladimir V. Putin came to power in 2000, but alarming nonetheless.

The crusading Russian-American journalist, Paul Klebnikov, was murdered by contract killers in 2004; Mr. Klebnikov, an editor at Forbes, specialized in describing the links of Russian money and power. Anatoly Chubais, the architect of privatization who is now head of Russia's electricity monopoly, narrowly dodged a bomb-and-rifle ambush in 2005; he was saved by his armored car as his bodyguards opened fire to allow his escape.

Although the victims are rarely of such high stature, new examples abound of business disputes or efforts at business protection leading to gunfire and bombings. The nation reacts with resigned familiarity. Few foreign business executives have bodyguards, but the possibility of violence is part of the business fabric, along with endemic corruption and an arbitrary state bureaucracy.

While the squeamish may be steering clear, investors seem undeterred. The Russian economy is booming. There is money to be made. On the day Mr. Kozlov was pronounced dead, there was public hand-wringing, but the Russian stock market rose.

The Post-Putin Russia (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

A Smooth Succession Doesn't Guarantee a Prosperous Future

MOSCOW -- Democracy does not march very long or very far. It lunges forward into vacuums created by the collapse of colonial, communist or imperial systems. Democratic reforms must then often creep or ooze or simply abide until the next turn of the political wheel makes new progress possible.

That frustrating zigzag pattern is at work today in Russia as President Vladimir Putin deepens an authoritarian transformation underwritten by surging oil and gas revenue that buys him public calm. But the political and economic centralization he manages may carry the seeds of its own demise.

This transformation of Russia -- as dispiriting as it has seemed recently to many in the West and here -- is not carved in stone. The deep concern that the Kremlin's rulers show for the opinion of their relatively well-educated public is one sign that not even they believe democracy is totally dead here.

"They have created a political theater in which they write the script and set the stage," says a Western diplomat. "But the interesting thing is that they still care what the spectators think of the show."

That reflex surfaces in the already visible efforts being tested by the Kremlin to stage-manage the 2008 presidential elections. "Reformers" inside the Kremlin are said to be grouping around Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev, while "conservatives" cluster with Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov. Who says the voters won't have a choice?

Issues for the campaign are also being shaped. The Kremlin team is building up the image of a Communist Party resurgence that must be turned back at the polls, even though most independent analysts fail to detect signs of any such comeback.

Meanwhile, Western governments are being subtly advised that they should do nothing to undermine Putin's ability to choose his successor. That would play into the hands of a newly threatening left. Dead as a tactic in the West, the Red Scare is being resurrected in a land where communism was decisively rejected 15 years ago.

Not even Putin pretends that the managed democracy he has imposed on Russia is true democracy. He is too smart for that. He acknowledged last week while meeting with foreign visitors that Russia "lacks a real multiparty system." While declaring a hope to create such a system at an undetermined future moment, Putin offered no clues as to how he would do this.

His vagueness on the political future contrasted sharply with the detailed specifics he offered on Russia's economic outlook; he expects growth to reach 7 percent again this year. Windfall profits from the energy industry will be used to establish "high-technology zones" for new industry and increase social welfare spending, he claimed.

Economic power is also being concentrated in the hands of the state and of a small circle of Putin's advisers who sit on the boards of the nation's key natural gas and oil companies. His devotion to centralization also surfaced in his insistence on the need for long-term government-to-government contracts to cut out "intermediaries and speculators" who drive up world energy prices.

Putin's confidence and his competence in the art of control are impressive seen at close range. But will his highly centralized system be responsive when Russia has to face up to the pervasive "disease" of energy-exporting countries, which invariably fail to develop financial infrastructure, labor-intensive industries and the skills to run them?

"This is the Russian disease, which is even worse: We export our resources, our capital and our best people," senior economist Leonid Grigoriev said.

He is actually understating. The Russian population is shrinking not only because of emigration but because of a staggering mortality rate (double that of the United States) and a sharply declining birthrate. The population has fallen from 150 million to 142 million over the past decade, and the public health system is widely acknowledged to be a continuing disaster.

Putin is a successful manager of a Russia benefiting from good times. But it is far from clear that he, or the stand-in he hopes to name to succeed him, could muster the public support that would be needed to lead the country through crises that may lie ahead. It may take leaders with real democratic legitimacy.

An ambitious American effort to spread democracy into Russia under President Bill Clinton in the 1990s faltered and was stalemated when Putin came to power. But seen from today, it did help create a reference point and toehold for future advances. This should offer some solace to Clinton, and perhaps for President Bush's beleaguered push for democracy in the Middle East as well.

From A Literary Lion In Caracas, Advice On Must-Reads (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela

PRESIDENT HUGO CHÁVEZ, it is well known, talks a lot. Whether at home or on the road, in Damascus or Minsk, his speeches can last hours.

Often, as he talks on, Mr. Chávez drops the names of books he is reading or has grown to love, giving insight into the various intellectual and literary influences on his thinking and what he calls his Bolivarian Revolution, an amalgam of socialist-inspired and anti-American policies.

Favorite authors include Victor Hugo, with "Les Misérables" at the top of his must-read list, with its description of passion amid revolutionary barricades. At the swearing-in of ministers for nutrition and the people's economy, Mr. Chávez recited a passage from the introduction about the need to stamp out ignorance and poverty.

"Don Quixote" by Cervantes also features prominently in his speeches, with Mr. Chávez identifying with the eccentric knight errant fighting injustice. To celebrate the 400th anniversary of the book's publication, the government last year paid for a million copies to be distributed free. Venezuela also paid for 70,000 copies in English for Caribbean neighbors and 5,000 in French for Haiti.

Mr. Chávez's supporters, who remain the majority in this country, love such displays, pointing to strides made in reducing illiteracy in recent years. His critics suggest that it is yet another way for the government to boost public spending.

If there is a whiff of 1970's-style third-world intellectual pretension in the populism of his campaign and his championing of certain books, Mr. Chávez does not seem to mind. Indeed, it reflects what seems a wider strategy on his part: he seems determined to articulate and spread a national ideology, in the way of a Castro or Perón.

The government is making more books available to the population through programs like the Kuai Mare Foundation, which operates a chain of more than 50 bookstores stocked largely with nationalist or left-leaning books sold at bargain prices.

Beyond the classics of European literature, Mr. Chávez recommends works by Latin American political theorists and historians and even the occasional North American. Mr. Chávez says he read John Kenneth Galbraith as a boy growing up humbly in Barinas, where his parents taught school.

Galbraith's "Economics of Innocent Fraud," a witty critique of the American economy, stands out for Mr. Chávez. Galbraith, who died this year at the age of 97, "is not a socialist but still he is a critic of capitalism," Mr. Chávez recently said on his Sunday television program, "Hello, President." He has described himself as "Galbraithiano."

Some of Mr. Chávez's reading preferences may be predictable, given his dislike of just about anything to do with President Bush. One of his anti-Bush staples is "Dude, Where's My Country?," a book by the filmmaker Michael Moore.

Other references are a bit more obscure, like "The Turning Point," by Fritjof Capra, an Austrian-born physicist. Mr. Chávez plucked a theme in the book, on moving away from centuries of exploitation, to discuss his opposition to American efforts to form a free trade zone across the Americas. Mr. Chávez cites books recommended to him by Mr. Castro, another voracious reader, including "The Hydrogen Economy," by Jeremy Rifkin, a look at moving the world beyond its dependence on oil. "The book is based on something which is no longer a hypothesis — it is a thesis," he said on a visit to Tehran in July. "Oil will run out one day."

Here in Venezuela, which has the largest oil reserves outside the Middle East, people have become accustomed to Mr. Chávez's literary recommendations. What really seems to interest many Venezuelans are books about Mr. Chávez himself.

Bookstores in Caracas carry more than a dozen titles about him, from unauthorized biographies to exposés of Bush administration efforts to oppose his government. Cristina Marcano, the co-author of a best-selling biography, "Hugo Chávez Without His Uniform," said that in his army days Mr. Chávez cited the influence of "The Green Book" by Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi of Libya, first published in the mid-1970's. "Chávez read Qaddafi with great admiration," Ms. Marcano said in an interview. One of Mr. Qaddafi's ideas was to ban commercial retail activity, an event inducing economic chaos that the Venezuelan leader has wisely ignored.

How does Mr. Chávez, burdened by other responsibilities, manage to read so much? One possibility is offered by Herma Marksman, the subject of "The Other Chávez," one of 16 books on Mr. Chávez by Alberto Garrido, a noted political analyst here.

Ms. Marksman, a history professor who was Mr. Chávez's mistress from 1984 to 1993, said he would often have her read aloud to him from books while he drove a car. "He would hang on every word, especially if it was fiction by García Márquez," she said in an interview.

However eclectic Mr. Chávez's taste in books might appear, there is one constant on his bookshelf. Mr. Chávez often refers to maxims by military or guerrilla leaders, admiring their rise to power through the barrel of a gun.

They include Simón Bolívar, the father of Venezuelan independence, Napoleon, Che Guevara and Mao Zedong. In an appearance this month at the national military academy, Mr. Chávez read from Mao's writings.

"No one does this anymore in China," the newspaper El Nacional said in an editorial, "though he hasn't figured this out in his five trips to the country of Deng Xiaoping."

Throng Calls Loser Mexico's 'Legitimate' President (NYT)

By James C. Mckinley Jr.

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Sept. 16 — More than 150,000 supporters of the losing leftist candidate for president flooded into the capital's historic square on Saturday and declared him "the legitimate president" of Mexico.

As his supporters roared approval, the candidate, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, a former Mexico City mayor, vowed to set up his own government and to fight against "a band of white-collar crooks and corrupt politicians" who he has said stole the election from him.

"I accept the responsibility of being president because I reject the imposition of their candidate and rupture of the constitutional order," he said. "They can keep their pirated institutions and their phony president, but they cannot keep our fatherland and our national dignity."

Described as a national democratic convention, the massive rally seemed intended to keep Mr. López Obrador and his political agenda from fading out of the national debate.

Mexico's highest electoral court ruled Sept. 5 that Mr. López Obrador narrowly lost the July 2 election to Felipe Calderón, a conservative from President Vicente Fox's party. The leftist maintains there was a broad conspiracy among business leaders, the Fox administration and news media barons to keep him from winning, using tactics like illegal attack ads and old-fashioned fraud.

Having lost a court battle for a full recount, Mr. López Obrador resorted Saturday to a tactic with deep roots in Mexican history: he convened a "national convention" of his supporters to draw up a new agenda for the country.

By a show of hands, the crowd unanimously denied Mr. Calderón had won. They declared Mr. López Obrador president, asked him to form a cabinet and supported a constitutional convention. "It's an honor to be with Obrador," they chanted.

Some historians said the convention echoed the alternative plans for Mexico put forward by revolutionary heroes like Emilio Zapata and Francisco I. Madero 100 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0064854

"The slow, difficult, incremental construction of the Mexican nation and state has passed through dozens of plans, made in the heat of political conflict," said one historian, Lorenzo Meyer. "The idea of conventions and plans is something very much part of Mexican history."

Mexican Left Creates 'Parallel Gov't' (AP)

By Lisa J. Adams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of supporters of leftist Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador elected him the leader Saturday of a "parallel government" opposed to President-elect Felipe Calderon's administration.

The symbolic "vote" — a show of hands in the packed Zocalo plaza — was the latest development in Mexico's nearly three month electoral dispute. Lopez Obrador claims fraud and illegal government spending were responsible for Calderon's victory by less than 234,000 votes in the July 2 election, and he has vowed to be the new leader's biggest opponent.

It was unclear what the "parallel government," complete with its own Cabinet, would entail.

Lopez Obrador supporters said they would travel the country and set up committees to spread Lopez Obrador's message of helping the nation's millions of poor and opposing the elite.

They also said they would continue protests against the government.

"This is the firm and honorable response to those who have converted our political institutions into a grotesque farce," Lopez Obrador said.

Lopez Obrador will be "sworn in" to his new post on Nov. 20. Calderon will be inaugurated on Dec. 1.

"They won't move forward. Today in our country there exists the collective will to stop them," Lopez Obrador said.

Convention delegates also agreed to boycott major national and international companies that they say supported Calderon's campaign, and agreed to support the formation of a "Progressive Front" to replace the former coalition of leftist parties that backed Lopez Obrador in the national election.

Lopez Obrador said the Front's principal objective would be to fight what he called a large right-wing bloc formed by Calderon's conservative National Action Party and the former ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party.

"Two groups will exist in the country: The rightists and the progressives," he said.

Lopez Obrador retains a strong following despite a Federal Electoral Tribunal ruling this month that rejected most of his fraud allegations and awarded the presidency to Calderon.

Organizers claimed 1.2 million packed the Zocalo and surrounding streets.

"This convention is the most palpable proof of how the people of Mexico feel," said Antonio Romano Hernandez, a 56-year-old baker from Mexico City.

Deeply Divided Mexico Marks Independence Day (AFP)

By Alexandre Peyrille

AFP, September 17, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of Mexicans turned independence day into a protest for a losing presidential candidate in Mexico City, while President Vicente Fox and the president-elect celebrated outside the capital citing fears of violence.

Organizers said 750,000 to a million of Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador's supporters chanted "The people united will never be defeated" in the capital's Zocalo square.

The crowd convened a so-called National Democratic Convention, which proclaimed Lopez Obrador the "legitimate president" of Mexico, set his inauguration for November 20, and, despite driving rain, even set to work on his political agenda.

Lopez Obrador, a former Mexico City mayor, has organized massive protests since his narrow July 2 defeat to conservative Felipe Calderon.

Calderon, a member of Fox's conservative National Action Party, is to be inaugurated December 1 as Mexico's new president after winning by less than a one percent of the vote.

Mexico's electoral court only last week handed down its final decision, declaring Calderon as Mexico's president-elect.

DOJ_NMG_0064855

The ruling, which cannot be appealed, came after the losing side launched weeks of street protests and filed dozens of corruption allegations and scores of legal objections.

Although Obrador lost the election by a narrow margin, his protest campaign has drawn dwindling support among the wider public. A poll released last week showed some 74 percent accept the decision of the electoral court declaring Calderon the winner.

Lopez Obrador, however, vows to set up a parallel government. The three leftist parties that had formed a coalition for the presidential election have extended their alliance through 2009 and adopted as their campaign slogan: "For the Good of All, the Poor First."

Lopez Obrador's supporters temporarily struck their tent city in the heart of the capital for the independence day military parade, which took place without incident.

The occupation began July 30 to block major streets, at a cost in disrupted business estimated by a business group Friday at 709 million dollars.

For weeks, Fox had insisted he would not deviate from the regular presidential agenda, but on Thursday the Mexican Senate ordered him to find an alternative after reported threats of disruptions from the leftists.

The Mexican president traditionally appears on the balcony of the National Palace, rings a historic bell and leads crowds in chants of "Viva Mexico!" on the eve of the September 16 holiday.

However, on Friday, Fox backed down on appearing at the public ceremony for security reasons.

"The government had learned from intelligence services that some of the radical organizations within 'For the Good of All' plan violence against those attending celebrations in the Zocalo," presidential spokesman Ruben Aguilar said Friday.

Lopez Obrador vowed to deliver a rival ceremonial public call for independence late Friday at the Zocalo, the giant downtown square where the protests are centered.

Instead of marking the day in the capital, Fox celebrated in Dolores Hidalgo, 260 kilometers (160 miles) from Mexico City.

Dolores Hidalgo, in the central Guanajuato state, is where Father Miguel Hidalgo rang church bells and called on Mexicans to take up arms against Spain in 1810, starting the revolution that culminated in Mexico's independence from Spain in 1821.

Lopez Obrador insists he is the rightful leader of Mexico, and this week rejected Calderon as an "illegitimate president" responsible for a "coup d'etat" which he said was sending "Mexico's institutions to hell."

It was the second time in two weeks the leftists forced Fox to break with tradition.

On September 1, lawmakers from the opposition Party of the Democratic Revolution blocked Fox, who supported Calderon in the presidential race, from taking the podium to deliver his annual address to Congress.

He delivered the speech via television instead.

Mexico Crowd Vows Loyalty To Runner-Up (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Rally participants agree to recognize leftist Lopez Obrador as the rightful president and join his campaign of boycotts and civil disobedience.

MEXICO CITY — Hundreds of thousands of Mexicans celebrated their Independence Day in a mass rally to denounce the winner of the July 2 presidential election and pledge their allegiance to the losing candidate.

With a show of hands, the huge crowd of delegates to the so-called National Democratic Convention on Saturday agreed to recognize leftist politician Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador as the country's rightful president and join a campaign of boycotts and civil disobedience under his direction.

"This is the beginning of the road to building a new republic," Lopez Obrador said in an acceptance speech that lashed out at Mexico's rich and politicians who protect them.

Although it was unclear how Lopez Obrador would establish a parallel government, or whether the vote was merely a political threat, the rally was a strong rebuke of National Action Party candidate Felipe Calderon, who defeated Lopez Obrador by slightly more than half a percentage point.

Lopez Obrador's presidency has no legal standing, and federal government officials had no response to the convention late Saturday.

Delegates agreed Lopez Obrador should take office Nov. 20, a national holiday commemorating the start of Mexico's 1910 revolution. They also supported a boycott of major firms, such as Wal-Mart and Coca-Cola, that are among a group of businesses Lopez Obrador accused of illegally supporting Calderon's campaign.

The presidential election divided Mexico between those who believed the country was advancing well enough with expanded trade and investment, and Lopez Obrador supporters, who believed the global market was leaving many people behind.

Lopez Obrador, a charismatic speaker and hard-ball politician, has energized core supporters and alienated many others for failing to accept the election outcome.

International observers said the vote count was legitimate, but Lopez Obrador alleged it was illegally tilted in favor of Calderon.

After Lopez Obrador lost his court battle for a national recount, he began building an opposition movement that he promised would reduce Mexico's poverty, end corruption and expand public social services.

Critics say Lopez Obrador is more like an autocratic politician out of Mexico's past than a progressive democratic leader. The convention appeared mainly a popularity contest with no doubt as to the outcome.

The dozen questions put to a vote by delegates were printed before Saturday's assembly. One asked, for example: "Should Lopez Obrador be recognized as president? Or coordinator of the resistance?"

When the question was put to the multitude, the crowd began to chant, "Presidente, presidente, presidente," and it was quickly approved. When the convention's moderator asked whether anyone was opposed, the crowd jeered.

Delegates, unanimous in their support, appeared to represent a broad economic group.

"Everybody's trying to paint him as some kind of messiah figure, and that his supporters are fanatics," said Alfredo Campos Martinez, 51, who traveled nine hours from Tampico by bus. "But look at me. I'm a lawyer. The seeds of this movement may be among the poor, but it has support among the middle class. We just haven't seen this economic system working very well."

Saturday's rally filled Mexico City's central square, known as the Zocalo, and spilled into surrounding blocks.

Hours earlier, President Vicente Fox presided over the annual Independence Day military parade at the spot, drawing a few hecklers.

Fox had planned to give the traditional shout for independence — an echo of Miguel Hidalgo's call for rebellion against Spain 196 years ago — from a balcony overlooking the Zocalo on Friday night, as he did last year.

But Lopez Obrador, whose supporters had transformed the square into a protest camp, said he also planned to give the shout there.

Fears of confrontation with Lopez Obrador supporters forced Fox in last-minute negotiations to move his ceremony to Dolores Hidalgo, the site of Hidalgo's original call. The mayor of Mexico City, a Lopez Obrador ally, gave the cry in the Zocalo.

It is the second time this month that Lopez Obrador has faced down Fox.

The losing candidate had promised to block Fox's annual State of the Nation address to a joint session of Congress. Soldiers formed a perimeter around the congressional hall, expecting a wave of street protesters. Instead, congressional members of Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party took over the dais and turned Fox away.

Fox, who made history in 2000 by ending seven decades of single-party rule by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, leaves Calderon a country divided.

Both men have supported Mexico's decade-long transition to a more open, free-market economy that relies on private investment to create new jobs.

Now Calderon, who takes office Dec. 1, faces the difficult task of persuading Lopez Obrador supporters that he too is serious about Mexico's lackluster job growth, high rate of poverty and the concentration of wealth among a small elite.

DOJ_NMG_0064857

Lopez Obrador appears ready to wage a civil resistance campaign that will use both street protests and his party's growing political clout to pressure the incoming administration on behalf of Mexico's poor. Delegates agreed to try to block Calderon's inauguration.

So far, the Fox government has resisted pressure to crack down on demonstrators who blocked streets in the capital for much of the summer.

Elected members of Lopez Obrador's party will also face pressure in the coming weeks as they decide whether to remain loyal to their leader as his movement shifts further left.

Lopez Obrador and his supporters seized the capital's central square and main boulevard July 30. He joined thousands of protesters who lived in tents through summer rain and hailstorms until the camps came down Friday.

BERLIN - Elections in a northeastern German state this weekend could prove a breakthrough for a far-right party and bring more woe for Chancellor Angela Merkel.

Mecklenburg-Western Pomerania, a depressed state of isolated hamlets and tree-lined lakes in former East Germany, elects a new legislature on Sunday, as does the capital Berlin.

Polls indicate the Social Democrat governors of both areas should hold on to power in coalition with the former communist Left Party. But the extreme-right National Democratic Party is expected to make significant gains in Mecklenburg, clearing the 5-percent vote hurdle to enter the state's parliament for the first time.

"We must do everything in our power to prevent this," said Till Backhaus, the leader of the Social Democrats in the state, who fears desperately courted investors would ignore the region. "The damage would be enormous."

The far right is a fringe player at the national level, where its affinities with Adolf Hitler's Nazis turns off the vast majority of voters. But it has found relatively fertile ground in the economically struggling east, where it already sits in the parliament in Saxony state.

Successive governments have failed to tackle the massive unemployment that has afflicted much of the east since German reunification in 1990. The unemployment rate in Mecklenburg was 18.2 percent in August - the highest in the country.

Leaders of the state, which abuts Poland and the Baltic Sea and has Germany's best beaches, insist it is on the right track. Backhaus claims that hundreds of new firms have set up in the region in recent years and the state's farming and tourism sectors are thriving.

But the National Democratic Party, known by its German initials NPD, looks set to make large gains after a campaign designed to tap growing disillusionment with the main parties.

The NPD has campaigned for more help for working parents in order to reverse falling birth rates. It has also made no secret of its harsh anti-foreigner stance and expressed sympathy for Nazi-era economic and education policies.

If the polls prove accurate, the elections would be a setback for Merkel's Christian Democrats, whose popularity is sinking nationally amid a dispute over health service reform.

Merkel's party still has an outside chance of winning the most votes in Sunday's election, which could see them lead a coalition with the Social Democrats - mirroring the left-right government that Merkel leads at the federal level.

In Berlin, Social Democrat mayor Klaus Wowereit is expected to remain in office. Wowereit remains highly popular, despite cutting thousands of jobs in a bid to contain Berlin's $76 billion debt.

Algerian Program Offers Amnesty, But Not Answers About Past (WP)

BLIDA, Algeria -- For nearly a decade, this city nestled at the foot of the Atlas Mountains anchored one corner of Algeria's "triangle of death," a killing field overrun by bomb throwers, throat-slitters and masked gunmen during an apocalyptic civil war that killed an estimated 200,000 people.

Peace has gradually returned to Blida, an oasis of orchards and fields north of the Sahara. Stability has been restored as well to most other parts of Algeria where a military-controlled government fought Islamic radicals, although clashes are reported almost daily in remote areas.

Now, in an effort to bring a final end to violence that began in 1992, the Algerian government is pinning its hopes on an ambitious national reconciliation program, which grants official forgiveness to combatants if they set aside their weapons.

Under terms of the reconciliation, which expired Aug. 31 but might be extended, about 2,500 prisoners convicted or accused of terrorism have gone free. Also covered by the amnesty are members of the Algerian security services, blamed for the disappearance of 8,000 civilians and accused of systematic torture. The only people not eligible: rapists and those responsible for mass murder or planting bombs in public places.

Reconciliation and amnesty programs have been embraced by other nations plagued by enduring conflicts. After the end of apartheid in South Africa, a Truth and Reconciliation Commission pardoned human rights violators who confessed their crimes in public. In Morocco last year, a similar commission collected testimony on more than 22,000 documented cases of political repression that occurred under the reign of King Hassan II. The Moroccan and the Algerian programs both include provisions to compensate victims and their families.

More recently, some government officials in Iraq have raised the prospect of offering an amnesty in a bid to end the sectarian warfare that followed the U.S.-led invasion.

Although Algerian voters overwhelmingly approved the terms of their national reconciliation in a referendum last year, few people are predicting that it will heal the rifts and psychological wounds that run deep here.

In dozens of interviews, Algerians said they hoped the amnesty would stop the lingering violence. But many lamented that it would not provide any accountability or answers regarding the countless atrocities that occurred.

Fatima Yous, president of SOS Disappeared, a group that investigates missing persons believed to have been abducted by the government, called the reconciliation an attempt to bury the past. She said she still aches to know what happened to her 20-year-old grandson, who was detained by police in 1997 and has not been seen since.

"All we want is the truth," she said. "We are ready to forgive, but we want our families back and we want the truth. We are not going to sue the guy who killed him. But I do want to know if they killed him, why they killed him and where his bones are."

No one here will be able to forget what happened anytime soon.

Mass graves are still exhumed in sandy ditches and dry outdoor wells. Houses remain pockmarked by bullet holes. Razor wire and uniformed patrols are omnipresent.

But supporters of the amnesty warn that tougher measures -- anything designed to seek justice or dig up the past -- could easily backfire and drag the country back into civil war.

"What we survived was just horrible, terrible," said Mustapha Farouk Ksentini, a lawyer in Blida who serves as chairman of an official human rights commission that has advised the government on the reconciliation plan. "The country is tired. The national unity is very fragile."

"We know that this national reconciliation will forgive a lot of criminals, but it's the price we have to pay to turn the page," he added. "Algeria doesn't have the means to press ahead with trials. We made a choice and said the national interests of Algeria are more important than this."

The reconciliation is only the latest attempt by the Algerian government to bring stability to a country that has suffered greatly over the past half-century.

The second-largest country on the African continent, Algeria won independence from France in 1962, but only after a war that lasted eight years. Three subsequent decades of a military-led government and socialist policies failed to modernize the economy.

In 1992, after Islamic fundamentalists appeared on the verge of winning power in national elections, the military intervened and dissolved the government. That led to civil war, as Islamic radicals took up arms.

The conflict spiraled as rebel factions embraced terrorism and targeted civilians, annihilating entire villages as part of a strategy to weaken popular support for the government. Government security forces also showed little regard for human rights, relying on torture and other tough tactics to break the rebellion.

By 2000, the violence was starting to ebb. Voters in a referendum that year approved a "civil concord," Algeria's first attempt to end the conflict by offering amnesty to those fighting the government. While thousands of Islamic guerrillas accepted pardons, many continued to fight because the measure effectively disenfranchised Islamic political parties.

More disasters followed, both natural and political. In 2001, ethnic Berbers rioted for weeks to protest their treatment by the government. A few months later, several hundred people were killed by floods in Algiers. Another low point was reached in 2003, when more than 2,000 people died in a massive earthquake.

"We lost 15 years of our history," said Aboudjerra Soltani, chairman of Movement of Society for Peace, a party of Islamic fundamentalists that professes nonviolence and is part of the ruling government coalition. "Our economy crumbled. We lost a lot of confidence. It takes a lot of strength to recover from this."

Since then, however, signs of hope have emerged. A global rise in energy prices has lifted the economy and has helped Algeria, the world's second-leading exporter of natural gas, erase foreign debts and invest billions in public works projects.

In 2004, in an election that international observers judged as legitimate, Algerian voters gave a second term to President Abdelaziz Bouteflika. Soon after, he announced another amnesty program, which took effect in March.

According to government officials, about 300 Islamic fighters have accepted the new deal. They estimate that another 800 to 1,000 guerrillas remain at large, down from about 50,000 in the mid-1990s.

While the amnesty offers reconciliation to terrorists and others with blood on their hands, opponents say some provisions in the law are far from conciliatory.

For instance, the measure clamps down on public debate over what happened during the civil war, making it a crime to criticize government actions of that period "or to tarnish the image of Algeria internationally." It has been assailed for those reasons by rights groups, including Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch.

Mostefa Bouchachi, a human rights lawyer in Algiers, said it was unrealistic to expect Algeria to prosecute large numbers of people. "It would result in another bloodbath. But at least we would like to know who did what, and why, and who is responsible. In the Algerian reconciliation, they just tell you to turn the page. We think it's a culturalization of impunity for both camps: the security forces and the Islamists."

Some military officials, however, have complaints of their own. After struggling for 15 years to win the civil war, they questioned whether it made sense to release 2,500 enemies of the state from prison.

Gen. Fodil Cherif Brahim, the army commander in charge of the region surrounding the capital, Algiers, until he retired in 2004, predicted that many former prisoners would return to the mountains or the desert and resume their fight.

"These people are fanatics to the extreme," he said. "They don't know anything about the real Islam. This is what they did: They committed horrible crimes. They put knives in the bellies of pregnant women."

"These people, you have to kill them," he added. "They will never give up."

Such sentiments are common in Blida, where few families escaped the violence of the war.

Zohra Khelafi, 51, said her husband was killed by Islamic radicals in a 1997 firebombing because he worked for the local government as a municipal guard. That same year, militants murdered two dozen other members of Khelafi's family, including a 3-year-old niece who was stuffed into a giant kettle and boiled alive.

"I want the government to punish them, to kill them, just like they did to us," she said. "Instead, the government has released them and they are back on the streets."

‘Save My Wife’ (NYT)

YOKADOUMA, Cameroon

DOJ_NMG_0064860

Prudence Lemokouno was lying motionless on a bed in the bleak hospital here, her stomach swelled with a fetus that had just died, her eyes occasionally flickering with fright but mostly dull and empty.

Dr. Pascal Pipi, the lone doctor in the public hospital, said she had a few more hours to live, and then she would join the half-million women a year who die around the world in pregnancy and childbirth.

Her husband, Alain Awona, was beside himself. "Save my wife," he pleaded. "My baby is dead. Save my wife."

In the spring, I held a contest to choose a student to take with me on a reporting trip to Africa, and now I'm on that trip with the winner, Casey Parks of Mississippi. I had wanted to introduce Casey to the catastrophic problem of maternal mortality in the developing world, because it should be an international scandal that the number of women dying in pregnancy worldwide has been stuck at a half-million for a quarter-century.

Indeed, here in Cameroon the maternal mortality rate has risen since 1998, and over all an African woman now has one chance in 20 of dying in pregnancy. In much of the world, the most dangerous thing a woman can do is to become pregnant.

When we arrived on Friday at the hospital here in the remote southeastern corner of Cameroon, we found Prudence dying for the reason that usually accounts for maternal death — a complicated childbirth with no emergency obstetric service available.

Prudence, a 24-year-old who has three children, went into labor on Monday. A village midwife assisted her, and after three days she was hoisted onto the back of a motorcycle and carried to this hospital.

And then nothing happened. The hospital demanded $100 worth of surgical supplies for a Caesarian section, and family members said they could raise only $20. I asked the chief nurse, Emilienne Mouassa, how often a woman dies in the hospital because the family can't pay. She hesitated. "Not often," she replied.

She said that when patients like Prudence are at death's door, the hospital sometimes prefers not to operate. It is easier to explain a pregnant woman who has not been treated at all and died than one who has undergone an emergency Caesarian and then died.

Dr. Pipi, a bit embarrassed that a patient was dying in front of foreign journalists, said that he could find a way to operate without the money. But in addition Prudence had lost so much blood that she needed a transfusion.

"We don't have a blood bank here," he explained, "so we sent someone off to bring in other relatives to see if they are compatible. But the village is far, 120 kilometers away, and it takes a long time to bring them here." A few more hours, he estimated, and she would be dead.

These women die because they are poor and female and rural — the most overlooked and disposable people throughout the developing world.

Politics also complicates Western efforts to help. The United Nations Population Fund has helped lead the effort to reduce maternal deaths — yet the Bush administration has cut off all U.S. funding for the agency because of (false) accusations that it supports abortions in China.

We inquired what Prudence's blood type was. The nurse checked and reported that it was A positive. We looked at each other.

I'm also A positive. Casey's blood did not seem to be compatible. But Naka Nathaniel, the Times multimedia maven who often travels with me, is O positive and thus compatible.

Would Dr. Pipi really operate if he could obtain blood? He said he would.

So Naka and I each gave blood, after a nurse went into town to find a plastic bag to put it in. It was promptly pumped into Prudence, and she began to look a bit better. Dr. Pipi promised to operate on her shortly.

Her husband cried with joy, but begged us not to leave. "If you go," he warned, "Prudence will die."

We waited, and six hours passed. The hospital began shaking down Prudence's family for more money before the surgery could begin. The husband had nothing, so we chipped in.

Then when everything seemed to be ready, Dr. Pipi simply vanished. "Oh, he's gone home," a nurse explained. "He'll operate tomorrow."

We cajoled, pleaded and threatened, but the hospital staff was unmoved. "What if Prudence dies in the night?" I asked.

The nurse shrugged and said: "That would be God's will."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Digs In Heels Over Detainee Bill (AP)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

President Bush is standing firm in his battle to get Congress to approve the White House plan for detaining, interrogating and prosecuting suspected terrorists. The Senate, though, isn't backing away from its plan either.

The president's standoff with lawmakers is over legislation authorizing military tribunals and harsh interrogations of terror suspects.

In his radio address Saturday, Bush said his proposal provides clear rules for U.S. personnel involved in detaining and questioning alleged terrorists held by the CIA.

"The information the Central Intelligence Agency has obtained by questioning men like Khalid Sheikh Mohammed (the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks) has helped disrupt terrorist plots, including planned strikes inside the United States and on a U.S. Marine base in East Africa, an American consulate in Pakistan and Britain's Heathrow Airport," Bush said.

"This CIA program has saved American lives, and the lives of people in other countries," he said.

The Senate Armed Services Committee defied Bush on Thursday and approved legislation the president has vowed to block.

The president's measure would go further than the Senate measure, allowing classified evidence to be withheld from defendants in terror trials and using coerced testimony. The legislation approved by the Senate panel also would change the law that interprets the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions — the treaty that sets the standard for treatment of war prisoners — so that harsh interrogations of detainees would not be questioned in court.

Republican Sens. John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina oppose the legislation drafted by the White House because they say barring a defendant from access to evidence — even if it's done under rare circumstances — would undermine the credibility of the court.

"Weakening the Geneva protections is not only unnecessary, but would set an example to other countries, with less respect for basic human rights, that they could issue their own legislative 'reinterpretations,'" McCain said in a statement released Friday. "This puts our military personnel and others directly at risk in this and future wars."

McCain said there is nothing in the Senate bill that would require the administration to close its CIA detainee program. He said it protects CIA interrogators from unfair exposure to criminal and civil liability and keeps intact international obligations that protect the rights of U.S. personnel.

"To do any less risks our reputation, our moral standing and the lives of those Americans who risk everything to defend our country," McCain said.

DOJ_NMG_0064865

Graham, likewise, remained insistent on the Senate approach, saying his legislation accomplishes the necessary goals of protecting CIA personnel from legal liability "without destroying Geneva Convention protections."

"What is being billed as clarifying our treaty obligations will be seen as withdrawing from the treaty obligations," Graham said in a statement. "It will set precedent which could come back to haunt us."

Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee, supports a House bill that takes the administration's position to move the process along, but he said he will attempt to amend the measure next week to look more like the McCain-Warner-Graham measure. He said the Senate bill would be less likely to be challenged by the Supreme Court as unlawful and violating the nation's treaty obligations.

"I don't want to give any terrorist a free pass or get-out-of-jail-free card," Skelton said.

Bush Urges Congress To Act On His National Security Measures (BLOOM)

By Catherine Dodge

Bloomberg, September 17, 2006

Sept. 16 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush, facing resistance from his own party over part of his national-security plan, urged Congress to pass two measures he called essential to winning the war on terrorism.

``By passing these critical bills, we will bring terrorists to justice, continue collecting vital intelligence from captured terrorists in a lawful way and monitor terrorist communications," Bush said in his weekly radio broadcast.

The president in a news conference yesterday said CIA intelligence-gathering that has thwarted terrorist attacks would stop unless Congress passes his proposed rules for the treatment of suspected terrorists.

Members of his own Republican Party are objecting to parts of Bush's proposal. The Senate Armed Services Committee this week approved a measure that would give more legal protection to suspected terrorists than the administration wants.

Republicans are focusing on security issues as they try to retain their majorities in the House and Senate in the November midterm elections. The intra-party squabble over the treatment of suspected terrorists has disrupted Republican plans to highlight their differences with Democrats over national security before the elections.

``There is debate about the specific proposals in this bill, and my administration will work with Congress to find common ground," Bush said.

The legislation is needed to restart war-crimes tribunals Bush set up at the U.S. Navy Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The Supreme Court invalidated those tribunals in June, ruling that they fail to incorporate the 1949 Geneva Conventions on the treatment of war prisoners.

The second measure, which would authorize Bush's domestic eavesdropping program to monitor calls between al-Qaeda operatives overseas and suspected confederates in the U.S. without court warrants, was passed by a separate Senate committee this week.

Frist Expects A Deal On Detainee Bill (AP)

By Jim Davenport, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Saturday he has to do more to get Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., in line with other Republicans and the White House on how terrorist suspects should be prosecuted.

Graham and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., helped Democrats push a bill through the Armed Services Committee that Frist said doesn't come close to what the White House wants or what is needed to let CIA officials interrogate suspected terrorists without fear of lawsuits.

Getting his GOP members in line "is a fundamental challenge from a leadership standpoint," said Frist, a potential candidate for president in 2008. He said he expects a compromise to emerge in the next two weeks, even though McCain and Graham haven't budged.

Frist spoke about Graham at a fundraiser Saturday for Lt. Gov. Andre Bauer's re-election bid. The event raised more than $30,000 and Frist's Volunteer PAC donated $3,500 to the campaign.

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) — Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney also talked Saturday about the need for legislation to help CIA officials question suspected terrorists.

"I'm foursquare behind the president on this," Romney said. "We need to provide to the interrogators the definitive rules that they need" so that they are "not be subject to lawsuits" that might come from their work.

"The people we are facing are individuals who have no interest in the Geneva Convention," Romney said. "They slit the throats of our servicemen. They target civilian populations for terror and destruction."

Romney, a potential GOP presidential candidate in 2008, was in Columbia to speak to the state Republican Party's leadership.

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Sen. Joe Lieberman on Saturday launched his second radio ad since losing Connecticut's Democratic primary last month, touting his record and ability to work with both Democrats and Republicans.

The 60-second ad, which is running statewide for a week, casts the three-term incumbent as a principled leader who has helped keep Americans safe from terrorism, stood up to big oil companies and worked to lower gas prices. His campaign is spending $70,000 on the spot.

"I'm sticking with Joe because he stands up for what he believes in," a supporter says in the ad.

"He works with both parties. He works for the people," says another.

Lieberman is running as an independent after losing the primary to Greenwich businessman Ned Lamont. The Senate race is seen as a referendum on President Bush's policies and the Iraq war.

Lieberman, the Democrats' nominee for vice president in 2000, has long been a maverick in his own party, but his support of the war helped fuel Lamont's victory. Lamont spent more than $4 million of his own money in attacking Lieberman's support of the war and his perceived closeness to Bush.

Lamont launched a new 30-second spot Saturday that evokes the storied rivalry between the New York Yankees and the Boston Red Sox, two teams that split Connecticut's baseball loyalties. In the ad, a Yankees fan and a Red Sox fan agree that "Lieberman's gotta go."

Lamont spokeswoman Liz Dupont-Diehl said Saturday that the amount being spent on the ad was not available.

How 3 G.O.P. Veterans Stalled Bush Detainee Bill (NYT)

By Carl Hulse, Kate Zernike And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 16 — Senators John McCain and Lindsey Graham cornered their partner, Senator John W. Warner, on the Senate floor late Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. Warner, the courtly Virginian who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, had been trying for weeks to quietly work out the three Republicans' differences with the Bush administration's proposal to bring terrorism suspects to trial. But Senators McCain, of Arizona, and Graham, of South Carolina, who are on the committee with Mr. Warner, convinced him that the time for negotiation was over.

The three senators, all military veterans, marched off to an impromptu news conference to lay out their deep objections to the Bush legislation. Mr. Warner then personally broke the news to Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, and the next day the Armed Services Committee voted to approve a firm legislative rebuke to the president's plan to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions.

It was a stinging defeat for the White House, not least because the views of Mr. Warner, a former Navy secretary, carry particular weight. With a long history of ties to the military, Mr. Warner, 79, has a reputation as an accurate gauge to views that senior officers are reluctant to express in public. Notably, in breaking ranks with the White House, Mr. Warner was joined by Colin L. Powell, the former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in a rare public breach with the administration he served as secretary of state.

As Mr. Warner left his Senate office on Friday afternoon, he carried a briefcase of material to prepare for a potential legislative showdown in the coming days. At stake, he said, was more than the fate of "these 20-odd individuals," a reference to the high-level terrorism suspects awaiting possible trial at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

"It's how America's going to be perceived in the world, how we're going to continue the war against terror," Mr. Warner said.

Then he showed off the motto on his necktie: "Democracy is not a spectator sport." Ronald Reagan had a similar tie, Mr. Warner said, and had given him a copy.

Democrats and Republicans alike had assumed that Mr. Warner, a smooth negotiator not given to public confrontation, would relent to the administration, especially considering the importance Republicans had placed on passing the legislation as midterm elections approached.

DOJ_NMG_0064867

The thinking was that Mr. McCain, who was tortured as a Vietnam prisoner of war, would not budge, nor would Mr. Graham, a military lawyer and zealous guardian of military standards. That left Mr. Warner as the best potential target for the White House. But as he considered the consequences of the proposal, the chairman decided to stick to his guns, saying he believed the nation's reputation was at stake.

"He is a man of the Senate," said Mr. Graham, arguing that Mr. Warner's stance spoke volumes because it went against his nature to have so visible a conflict. "He is also a military man and has thought long and hard about this."

Mr. Bush seems equally determined to win provisions he says are needed to interrogate and prosecute terrorism suspects. He and his allies are ratcheting up pressure on Senate Republicans who support alternate rules adopted this week by the Armed Services Committee. Mr. Warner, like his two colleagues, has a network of high-ranking current and retired military officers who provide regular guidance and support. While he has been consulting them privately, some are expected to weigh in publicly in the days ahead. One aide said on Saturday that the number of Senate Republicans behind the three senators was widening beyond the 8 or 10 they had anticipated, with lawmakers — heavily influenced by Mr. Powell's stance — preparing to soon go public with their views.

In interviews, two senior Bush administration officials acknowledged that the White House had underestimated the depth of opposition Mr. Bush's proposal would provoke. They also said they had focused mostly on gaining Mr. Graham's support and mistakenly believed they had it, based on statements he made about the Geneva Conventions in Senate hearings. A Republican senator separately described the clash between the White House and Mr. Warner's group as "a train wreck."

The administration officials and the Republican senator were granted anonymity because they would not openly discuss negotiations between the White House and Congress.

Mr. Warner's convictions about how military trials should proceed appear to stem largely from his personal experience, beginning with his Navy service in World War II. Hanging with the photographs on his office wall is a worn, small placard that his mother displayed on the door of their Washington home from 1944 to 1946: "There's a Man from this family in the Navy."

"I'm a man that's been through a lot," Mr. Warner said, recounting his days as secretary of the Navy in the early 1970's when he was personally confronted with issues of military prisoners. "I mean, I've been through this before."

Mr. Graham has similarly drawn on his legal and military background in challenging the White House. "The Geneva Convention means more to me than the average person," he said. He said "some people" considered the conventions "a waste of time, but I know they have been helpful."

Mr. Graham acknowledged that the political battle was bruising, but said he could not tolerate a change in the American interpretation of the conventions if it meant short-term benefits at long-term costs.

"President Bush is very sincere in wanting the tools he needs to fight the war on terror," Mr. Graham said in an interview. "I don't want the tools they are given to become clubs to be used against our people."

In a letter sent Friday to Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, Mr. Graham also took issue with a provision of the administration's approach that would allow the use of secret evidence in trials of terrorism suspects.

"Where in American jurisprudence do you find support for the concept that a person accused can be tried and convicted on evidence which that person has no opportunity to see, confront or rebut?" Mr. Graham wrote. The bonds between Mr. Warner, Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham were forged in difficult times. Mr. Warner and Mr. McCain first met when Mr. Warner was the Navy secretary and Mr. McCain was returning to his Navy career after his captivity. Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham became close during the 2000 primaries in South Carolina, when Mr. McCain came under attack from Bush Republicans. They teamed up last year in forcing the White House to accept a ban on torture.

After the Supreme Court struck down the administration's earlier plan for military tribunals in June, they joined with top military lawyers to form the chief bulwark against what they said were efforts to undermine military law and the 60-year-old protections of the Geneva Conventions.

"It's not a question of defiance or intransigence, it's the way we've worked," Mr. Warner said. "We've continued to indicate a willingness to look at situations — is there a bridge that we can build between certain provisions? And our core principles are very rooted in the three of us."

Mr. Graham added, "There are three branches of government, not one."

Mr. Warner sought to serve as a counterbalance to the occasionally combative Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham during a turbulent week that fractured the Republican majority on its signature issue, national security. It saw Mr. Powell enlisting with the three Republicans against Mr. Bush, and left Mr. Graham chewing out General Michael V. Hayden, the C.I.A director, in a closed meeting.

In the Senate, Mr. Warner is known for hearing out colleagues and trying to find consensus.

DOJ_NMG_0064868

"John Warner is always very gracious," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, who is also on the Armed Services Committee and sided with Senators Warner, McCain and Graham. "He is patient and he is thoughtful. And people sometimes mistake that for uncertainty about his position."

Administration officials said they had focused on Mr. Warner as the key to overcoming Republican opposition in the Senate. When he raised a question with General Hayden about the State Department's view on the matter, Mr. Warner received a phone call within hours from Ms. Rice.

Ms. Rice followed up with a letter to Mr. Warner, which administration officials distributed on Capitol Hill on Thursday to counter the letter from Mr. Powell, which had objected to the administration's plan to redefine Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

But once it became clear that Mr. Warner was dug in, the administration began setting its sights on other senators, inviting them to the White House. On Friday afternoon, Mr. Frist's office arranged a conference call between staff members for Senate Republicans and Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, to emphasize talking points for making the administration's case on Capitol Hill.

As the fight swirled around him last week, Mr. Warner got a call from his grandson, Nicholas, a boarding school student who was an intern in his office this summer, asking what all the fuss on television was about.

"I took the time to try to explain it to him," Mr. Warner said. "That's one of the jobs we have to do, explain to the American people." He added: "Neither McCain nor Graham nor I nor anybody wants to tie the hands of the intelligence community."

Tribunal Dispute Could Ruin GOP Strategy (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Bush-McCain Standoff Over Terrorism Trials Overshadows Electoral Battle

Congressional Republicans had carefully orchestrated the finale of the legislative year to be a showdown with Democrats over which party is best equipped to keep the country safe, a handpicked fight on traditional Republican turf.

But the high-stakes standoff between President Bush and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) over military tribunals could ruin that legislative strategy, political analysts and strategists say. Instead of fighting Democrats, Republicans find themselves in the middle of an intraparty struggle between an embattled president and two of the most respected figures in their party, McCain and his ally on the issue, former secretary of state Colin L. Powell.

"Purely from a strategic point of view, this is another mess," said Stuart Rothenberg, a political analyst and editor of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report. "Every time Republicans think they have an issue to unite them and divide the Democrats, the Republicans end up spending most of the time fighting among themselves."

Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio agreed: "If the goal of this process was to show stark differences between Republicans and Democrats, what is being portrayed is stark differences between George Bush and some Republicans. From that standpoint, you aren't hitting the message mark."

When Congress returned from its August recess, GOP leaders understood that they had four weeks to regain political momentum or face the real prospect of losing control of one or both chambers of Congress. Two court decisions seemed to give them an opening: the Supreme Court's ruling that Bush's military tribunals are unconstitutional and a Detroit federal judge's opinion that the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program is also illegal.

By codifying the president's military commissions and ratifying what they called his "terrorist surveillance program," Republican leaders had hoped to dare Democrats to vote against programs framed as insurance policies against terrorism.

It has not worked out that way. Three Republican senators -- McCain, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (Va.) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) -- have stood in the way of Bush's tribunal plan, saying it violates basic principles of American fairness and would endanger U.S. troops. A rebellion of civil-liberties-oriented Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee has stymied legislation that would allow warrantless wiretapping to continue. At a closed-door pep rally with Republicans on Thursday, Bush received pointed questions on both policy initiatives, according to participants.

"Congress needs to give this the intensity of consideration necessary," said Rep. Daniel E. Lungren (R-Calif.), a supporter of both programs. "We are not going to be led around by the nose."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) acknowledged: "It's the legislative process. It's never predictable."

But Boehner and other Republicans remain confident that they are on the right track. Republicans point to recent polls showing a slight uptick in the president's popularity and say that the focus on national security issues is working. A spate of new polling also indicates that the race between Republicans and Democrats for control of Congress has tightened slightly, although Democrats still maintain a lead.

DOJ_NMG_0064869

Indeed, Charlie Cook, a nonpartisan congressional analyst, said any day the media is not focused on Iraq is a good day for Republicans. For most voters, he said, the tribunal flap will be seen as politicians fighting with politicians -- "not exactly man bites dog," but a good diversion from troubling war news.

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) noted that the unfavorable political landscape leaves GOP leaders little choice but to fight it out on defense and terrorism.

"People aren't paying attention to the economy. We've given up on immigration. We need to send people home with some significant accomplishments, and we have no other choice," LaHood said. "We have no other issue."

But misgivings over the agenda set out by the president and GOP leaders are growing. Rep. Steve Buyer (R-Ind.) said he told Bush on Thursday that he should heed the military's top uniformed lawyers, who have opposed some provisions of the president's tribunal plan. Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.), one of several moderate Northeasterners in tough reelection campaigns, said he has no problem with Bush's bills. He is likely to vote against them.

The problem, Lungren said, is that the complexity of the tribunal and wiretapping issues do not lend themselves to the quick action Bush wants.

"This is a big deal to drop in our laps," he added. "There is some discomfort with the time period we've been given."

Then there's McCain, a decorated Vietnam War veteran who spent years as a captive of the North Vietnamese.

"If Americans know anything about John McCain, it's the guy was tortured. People listen to him on this issue," said John J. Pitney Jr., a professor of politics at Claremont McKenna College who studies House Republicans.

Last week, House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) did his best to ignore McCain's position on the tribunals and to blame Democrats for the stalemate. But Democrats are using McCain and his allies as a shield.

"Instead of picking fights with Colin Powell, John McCain and other military experts, President Bush should change course," Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said Friday.

Fabrizio and other analysts said that argument is smart politics.

"It appears John McCain has given Democrats body armor against Republican attacks," Pitney said.

Moreover, the showdown between Bush and McCain is grabbing the spotlight from Republican initiatives that were supposed to undergird their case that they are the stronger party on national and homeland security. Just Thursday, the House passed legislation that would authorize the construction of 700 miles of double-layered fencing on the U.S.-Mexico border, while the Senate approved a long-promised port security bill. Both actions were buried by media coverage of the tribunal battle.

And the intraparty fights over tribunals and wiretapping are likely to dominate Congress until the lawmakers adjourn for their campaigns at month's end. That could swamp any uptick that Bush and the GOP enjoyed before the fights broke out.

"Even the best start with a bad finish doesn't help," Fabrizio said.

CIA In Middle Of Election-year Battle (AP)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

The CIA believed it was operating lawfully in detaining and interrogating 96 suspected terrorists at locations from Thailand to Europe, until the Supreme Court this summer demolished that legal foundation.

The CIA is now squarely in the middle of election-year politics as Congress tries to write new definitions that could reshape the intelligence agency's program.

"At the end of the day, the director — any director — of the CIA must be confident that what he has asked an agency officer to do under this program is lawful," CIA Director Michael Hayden wrote employees on Thursday.

President Bush was more blunt: "They don't want to be tried as war criminals," he said at a news conference Friday.

The high court's ruling in June, in a case involving Salim Ahmed Hamdan, essentially said that the Geneva Conventions on the rights of wartime prisoners should apply to the suspected terrorists in CIA custody.

That meant that for the first time since the interrogation program was born in 2002, the Justice Department could not give the CIA a written opinion on whether its techniques still were legal.

Spy agencies rely on such opinions to justify activities that get little, if any, public scrutiny.

To Bush, the CIA and their allies, the law urgently needs to be changed to protect the interrogation program, which they consider one of the most important ways to deter attacks against the United States.

"The Hamdan decision in effect calls a time-out in the war on terror," said Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

But the program's detractors say a fix is needed to prevent further damage to the U.S. image abroad and to reduce risks to U.S. military personnel who may be caught by enemies.

DOJ_NMG_0064870

"The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," retired Gen. Colin Powell, the former secretary of state, wrote Sen. John McCain. The Arizona Republican is resisting Bush's call for more lenient rules on interrogations.

The CIA's practices raised concerns almost from the day that the agency began questioning detainees suspected of terrorist links.

Early in the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan in 2001, senior military officers were so concerned about the CIA's practices that they took steps to ensure that military personnel were not in the room during CIA interrogations, said a government official familiar with both military and intelligence operations. The official and others in government and on Capitol Hill spoke recently about the sensitive CIA activities on the condition they not be identified.

But Gary Berntsen, the commander of a CIA team in Afghanistan in the fall of 2001, said CIA personnel initially did not have time for interrogations — a term from the military and intelligence world that implies the use of specific techniques to coerce information from prisoners.

Instead, he said, intelligence officers conducted cursory interviews of newly captured fighters to see if they had information they wanted to share.

"We were seizing one city after the next," Berntsen said. "There were hundreds of people" in custody.

He credits a British team in Afghanistan with finding a tipster in December 2001 who knew the details of a Singapore plot to use 21 tons of explosives to try to blow up the U.S., British, Israeli and Australian embassies in a follow-up attack to the Sept. 11 strikes. "We were desperate to find the next attack," Berntsen said.

Not long after the March 2002 capture of top al-Qaida operative Abu Zubaydah, the CIA's practices became more formal. Agency operatives knew Zubaydah had a wealth of information because of his role as a recruiter and his close ties to al-Qaida's senior leadership, but he was not cooperative.

The CIA decided it would need to hold high-value terrorists such as Zubaydah for an extended periods in an effort to extract information. They also began using some "enhanced interrogation techniques" with success.

One senior U.S. official said "only a fraction" of the agency's 96 high-value detainees have experienced those techniques because "the least obtrusive means are used."

Yet by mid-2004, the CIA's inspector general had completed a report on the treatment of detainees after the possible involvement of CIA personnel in the deaths of at least four prisoners. The review covered interrogation tactics.

Current and former U.S. officials say some techniques are well-known: exposing prisoners to cold, disorienting them or depriving them of sleep. The most controversial is waterboarding, when a detainee is strapped to a board and has water run over him to simulate drowning.

Bush administration officials say the Justice Department has deemed the CIA's practices lawful. In addition, the senior U.S. official said the House and Senate Intelligence committees have now been told everything about the CIA's overseas prisons and interrogation program, except the countries where the prisons were.

But a congressional aide disputed that. The aide said briefings for the Senate committee took place only recently and that the administration has denied the committee access to materials it needs to fulfill its oversight role of the CIA. For example, the committee's top Democrat, West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller, has not been able to see the Justice Department's legal opinions.

The Supreme Court's decision froze the interrogations and led the administration to turn over the last 14 prisoners in CIA custody to the military officials running a prison for detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The next step is up to Congress. Lawmakers are struggling over how to write legislation creating rules for how to try suspected terrorists and how to specify the lengths that authorities can go in questioning these detainees.

A bill favored by McCain and two other influential Republican senators would prevent CIA personnel involved in the detention program from being sued or prosecuted for their actions. The CIA wants the Congress to go one step further and bless its actions.

In his memo last week to CIA personnel, Hayden also said he wants Congress to define in U.S. law terms of the Geneva Conventions that bar "humiliating and degrading treatment" and "outrages upon personal dignity."

Human rights groups see the effort as an end run and contend established military rules could be applied to all government agencies, including the CIA.

Said Tom Malinowski, Washington director for Human Rights Watch: "The only point in having a CIA program is to use techniques that go well beyond what is permitted by the Army Field Manual."

The Battle For Guantánamo (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0064871

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

1. A Warning From Shaker Aamer

Col. Mike Bumgarner took over as the warden of Guantánamo Bay in April 2005. He had been hoping to be sent to Iraq; among senior officers of the Army's military police corps, the job of commanding guards at the American detention camp in Cuba was considered not particularly challenging and somewhat risky to a career. He figured it would mean spending at least a year away from his family, managing the petty insurgencies of hundreds of angry, accused terrorists.

"Is this what I went to bed at night thinking about?" he would ask nearly a year later, as he whacked at mosquitoes on a muggy Cuban night. "No."

Bumgarner, then 45, received his marching orders from the overall commander of the military's joint task force at Guantánamo, Maj. Gen. Jay W. Hood. A few weeks earlier, General Hood dispatched the previous head of his guard operation and two other senior officers for fraternizing with female subordinates. He was known as a flinty, detail-oriented boss with low tolerance for bad judgment, and his instructions to the colonel were brief: He should keep the detainees and his guards safe, Bumgarner says Hood told him. He should prevent any escapes. He should also study the Third Geneva Convention, on the treatment of prisoners of war, and begin thinking about how to move Guantánamo more into line with its rules.

It had been three years since President Bush declared that the United States would not be bound by any part of the Geneva treaties in dealing with prisoners in the fight against terrorism. He ordered that American forces treat captives in ways "consistent" with the conventions but hadn't explained what that meant. Now, Bumgarner thought, the mandate seemed to be shifting a little. He was being asked to get more specific.

In the cramped bungalow headquarters of his Joint Detention Operations Group at Guantánamo, Bumgarner had his operations officer look up the conventions on the Internet and print out a copy. After nearly 24 years as a military police officer, Bumgarner knew the document well. He thought it obvious that many of the rights would never apply to Guantánamo detainees. No one was going to allow the distribution of "musical instruments" to suspected terrorists, as the 1940's-era conventions stipulated for the captured soldiers of another army. No one was going to pay the detainees a stipend to spend at a base canteen.

But the assignment was more complicated than just cutting and pasting where he could. On some level, Bumgarner thought, he was being asked to weigh how far the military should go to improve the lives of prisoners whom the president and his aides had labeled some of the most dangerous terrorists alive. Or, as the colonel put it to me during our first conversation at Guantánamo in March: "How do you deal with an individual whom the president of the United States and the secretary of defense have called the worst of the worst?"

At that point, in the spring of 2005, he had little time to consider an answer. Tensions in the camp were surging, as the detainees tested a fresh rotation of Army and Navy guards. Of the 530 prisoners then being held at Guantánamo, most were classified as "noncompliant." The two segregation blocks, which held prisoners who had assaulted guards, were full. So were two other blocks where detainees were sent for lesser infractions. "People were in a waiting pattern to get in and serve their time there," Bumgarner said.

In older parts of the camp, the detainees would sometimes bang for hours on the steel mesh of their cells, smashing out a beat that rattled up over the razor wire into the thick, tropical air. Occasionally they would swipe at the guards with metal foot pads ripped from their squat-style toilets, declassified military reports say. The detainees rarely tried to fashion the sort of shanks or knives made by violent prisoners in the United States. But they did manage to unnerve and incite the young guards, often by splattering them with mixtures of bodily excretions known on the blocks as "cocktails."

By the time Bumgarner took command at Guantánamo, information had emerged to suggest that many of the detainees were not, in fact, the hardened terrorists whom Pentagon officials had claimed to be holding there. Bumgarner did not doubt that his new prisoners were dangerous, but neither was he wary of getting to know them better. As he walked the blocks in Camp Delta, the fenced-in core of the prison, he soon began trying to engage some of the more influential detainees.

Military and C.I.A. analysts had been studying the Guantánamo population since the camp opened in January 2002. They observed that there were detainee spokesmen, who tended to speak English, and religious leaders, or "sheiks," who issued opinions on questions of Islamic law. There was also a more hidden cadre, whose leadership the analysts defined as "political" or, when they could direct the protests of others, "military." Nonetheless, there was much debate over who the most important leaders were, intelligence officials later told me. Like most guard officers before him, Bumgarner gravitated toward those who spoke English.

His ambitions were modest. "I was looking for a way, with what General Hood was wanting, just to have a peaceful camp," he recalled recently. He said his initial message to the detainees was "Look, I'm willing to give you things, to make life better for ya, if y'all will reciprocate." What he asked in return was "Just do not attack my guards."

Bumgarner considered himself a take-charge, solve-the-problem kind of commander. A big, balding, garrulous man who speaks with a faint Carolina drawl and carries his 250 pounds easily on a 6-foot-2-inch frame, he grew up the son of a career Army sergeant in a family where military service was proudly taken for granted. In high school in Kings Mountain, N.C., a small town in the Blue Ridge foothills, he played quarterback for the football team and applied to West Point at his father's urging. He quit the academy after only a few months but joined the R.O.T.C. to help pay his way through Western Carolina University. At Guantánamo, he was one of those officers who seemed to relish calling out, "Honor bound!" (shorthand for the camp motto, "Honor bound to defend freedom"), when a soldier saluted. Saying goodbye, he favored "Hoo-rah" over "See you later."

But that image could be deceiving. Before deploying to Cuba, Bumgarner oversaw the development of detention doctrine at the Army's Military Police School at Fort Leonard Wood, Mo. Like many military police officers, he had been deeply embarrassed when the Abu Ghraib scandal erupted in May 2004 and was determined to see its legacy undone. "We were not going to let that happen to us," he said.

At Guantánamo, Bumgarner moved quickly to try to reduce tensions in the camp. If the detainees wanted clocks on the cellblock walls, he saw no reason they shouldn't have them. In response to endless complaints from the detainees about their tap water, he persuaded Hood to approve the distribution of bottled water at mealtimes. The only stocks available were the soldiers' own, bottled with a stars-and-stripes label under the vanity brands Patriot's Choice and Freedom Springs. To avoid any problems, guards were ordered to peel off the labels before they passed out the bottles.

The detainees did not respond as the military authorities hoped. In late June 2005, two months after Bumgarner took command, some prisoners went on a hunger strike, calling for better living conditions, more respectful treatment of the Koran by guards and — most important — fair trials or freedom. Although it was hardly the first such protest, the camp's medical staff worried about the unusually large number of prisoners involved.

Soon after the strike began, Bumgarner was alerted to a disturbance in Camp Echo, an area of more isolated cells on the eastern edge of the detention center. The problem was with a 38-year-old Saudi named Shaker Aamer. The colonel had not previously encountered Aamer, but he was already familiar with the legend of detainee No. 239 — the one his guards called the Professor. They marveled at his English, which was eloquent, and his presence, which was formidable. Some intelligence officials said they believed he had been an important Qaeda operative in London, where he lived and married before moving to Afghanistan in the summer of 2001. (Aamer has denied having anything to do with Al Qaeda or terrorism.)

The colonel's immediate concern was that Aamer was giving his guards fits, pressing one of the sporadic civil disobedience campaigns for which he was famous. "I finally said: 'That's it! I'm gonna go down to talk to him myself.'" As Bumgarner remembers it, he burst into the small, hospital-white room as Aamer sat on his bunk, fuming behind the painted mesh that caged him into one corner. "You're either gonna start complying with the rules," Bumgarner recalls warning him, "or life's gonna get really rough." The colonel said he did not mean to threaten physical force, only to emphasize strongly that Aamer's few privileges — like, say, his use of a toothbrush — hung in the balance.

Aamer, who wore a thick black beard and had his hair pulled back in a ponytail, was unimpressed. The prisoner, who was not wearing his glasses, squinted for a moment, trying to read the officer's insignia. "Colonel," he finally said, "don't come in here giving me that."

As Bumgarner settled into a white plastic chair, Aamer crossed his legs on the bunk and began to talk about his life. He spoke about his family, his travel to Afghanistan, his feelings about the United States. He told of working as an interpreter for American troops in Saudi Arabia during the first gulf war, and of later working at a coffee shop outside Atlanta.

"I got the impression that he was hanging around in clubs, drinking," Bumgarner told me. "He loved women. But he said he had realized the error of his ways." Aamer had a revelation, he told the colonel, "that this life of running around with women and boozing it up was the wrong path."

"It was part of his charisma, that drawing me in," Bumgarner said later. "He became a person."

Much of the conversation centered on Aamer's thoughts on the detention operation and what could be done to improve it. The Saudi's ideas, it seemed, were perhaps not so far from Hood's. "His implication was that if you applied the Geneva Conventions fully, everything would be just fine in the camps," Bumgarner recalled.

After almost five hours, Aamer asked the colonel if he had made someone very angry. "Otherwise, you wouldn't be in Guantánamo.

"Nobody survives Guantánamo," he added. "You won't survive, either."

II. A Permanent Place

As part of the military's standard tour of Guantánamo, visitors are driven to the end of a two-lane road that winds up to the northeast corner of the naval base on which the prison sits. They pause there on a small hill overlooking a locked gate that leads into Fidel Castro's part of the island. The tour guide, usually a young Marine corporal with a black Beretta pistol strapped to his thigh, then recounts a brief history of Communist efforts to drive the American forces away.

DOJ_NMG_0064873

At one point, the corporal says, the Cubans tried to cut off the Americans' water supply. They trained floodlights on an American guardhouse to keep the soldiers inside from getting any sleep. But such annoyances were merely that. The United States never surrendered an inch of the 45 square miles it has occupied under a disputed lease since 1903, following the Spanish-American War. "We're not as big a presence as we once were," one tour guide, Cpl. Denis R. Espinoza, who is 22, said earlier this year. "But we're still here, and we're going to stay."

In the Land of Unsubtle Metaphors that is Guantánamo Bay, the message of the tour is transparent: the United States fought a dangerous, implacable enemy here once before, in another war that seemed without end. Had we not held our ground then, the argument goes, the world might now be a darker place.

Despite the intense criticism it has drawn, the detention camp at Guantánamo has proved one of the more resilient institutions of the Bush administration's fight against terror. It has weathered a 2004 Supreme Court decision that allows prisoners to challenge their detention in the federal courts. Scandals over the abuse of the detainees have come and gone, but Guantánamo has endured.

When President Bush announced broad changes in policies for the detention and prosecution of terror suspects on Sept. 6, he said the government "will move toward the day when we can eventually close the detention facility at Guantánamo Bay." But by sending 14 important C.I.A. captives there and pushing to try prisoners before reconstituted military tribunals, he appeared to be extending the life of the detention center for the foreseeable future. Even if many more detainees are sent home and dozens are tried, administration officials acknowledged, the United States could easily end up with 150 or 200 others whom it would want to hold indefinitely and without charge. As to how the military should treat such men, Washington offered only the most general guidance.

What impact the C.I.A.'s prisoners might have on the camp's operations is unclear. Already, though, Guantánamo has been the scene of an extraordinary struggle between the detainees and their guards. Only a few episodes of this conflict have come to light, like the suicides of three prisoners in June. But what has hardly been glimpsed is the dynamic that developed as military officers tried to deal more closely with the detainees, easing the harsh conditions in which they have been held and asking for compliance in return.

This article presents a view inside the prison based on interviews with more than 100 military and intelligence officials, guards, former detainees and others. It shows that as pressure built among the prisoners and some threatened even to kill themselves in protest, Bumgarner and other guard officers — acting as much on instinct as policy — took surprising steps to contain the upheaval.

That experiment illuminates the challenge the United States faces in continuing to detain indefinitely some 460 men at Guantánamo, only 10 of whom have been formally charged with crimes. Perhaps not surprisingly, the military has sought to keep what has taken place there under wraps. Asked recently about his dealings with the detainees and those of his staff officers, General Hood would respond only through an Army spokesman, saying, "Operational security precludes any public discussions that could potentially jeopardize the lives of detainees or the security force at Guantánamo."

Rather than making Guantánamo go away, the administration has tried to make it smaller and less objectionable. The ruins of Camp X-Ray, the provisional facility where the first prisoners were held in cages, are slowly being swallowed by the jungle. Tour guides display them as proof of Guantánamo's progress. Inside the existing camp, a barricaded precinct of the quaint, 50's-era naval base where off-duty soldiers play softball and stop to eat at McDonald's, the guides point out Camp 6, a new $30 million facility modeled after a county jail in southern Michigan.

But the detainees have long memories, and the portraits drawn by those who have been released — sometimes horrific, often impossible to verify — have shaped global perceptions in ways that the Bush administration has been unable to overcome. Their stories have been set down in books, films, plays and raps, most of which depict an Orwellian world that is by turns brutal, calculated and inept.

"Every country has its own way of torturing people," Rustam Akhmiarov, a 26-year-old Russian who was arrested in Pakistan and ended up in Guantánamo, told me after his release. "In Russia, they beat you up; they break you straightaway. But the Americans had their own way, which is to make you go mad over a period of time. Every day they thought of new ways to make you feel worse."

Over the last two years, human rights groups and the International Red Cross have noted some improvements. Hood said that the use of more extreme interrogation methods was curtailed within months of his taking command, around the time that the Abu Ghraib scandal became public. Yet the larger questions that indefinite detention at Guantánamo raises — how to forestall the radicalization of the detainees; how to control men who have only the slimmest hope of freedom — have never been resolved by senior policy makers. They have been left to military officers on the ground.

III. Out of the Dark Ages

DOJ_NMG_0064874

As Colonel Bumgarner landed at Guantánamo in April 2005, he sensed that the military was in the midst of what he called "sort of an effort to normalize things." The Pentagon wanted to streamline the guard operation as part of a push toward a more modern, less labor-intensive detention facility. It also wanted to present a more humane face to the world. Both goals required lowering the level of conflict within the camp.

After his first briefing from Hood, Bumgarner put the printout of the Geneva Conventions on his desk and left it there. "I had my staff look at it," he said. "For me, it was the only black-and-white piece of something that I could reach out and grab for guidance."

At that point, White House officials were still opposed to adopting even the most basic Geneva standard for the treatment of prisoners, a provision that bans "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment." Bumgarner considered such issues above his pay grade. He tried to deal with the detainees man to man. "Human beings are human beings," he said in one of a series of conversations. "I always think that I can deal with anybody. I feel like dialogue can't hurt."

Weeks before he would meet the Saudi prisoner Shaker Aamer, Bumgarner came across a tall, wild-eyed detainee who was screaming at the guards in British-accented English. It wasn't clear what his problem was, but when the colonel asked, the man quickly calmed down. "You are creating these problems by the way you are treating us," the prisoner said.

A day or two later, Bumgarner had guards deliver the man to Juliet block, a small, fenced-in courtyard beside his command center where Red Cross representatives meet with detainees at aluminum picnic tables. He asked a guard to uncuff the prisoner's hands. "It puts them in a much better mood to talk to you," the colonel explained.

Prisoner No. 590, Ahmed Errachidi, was a handsome 39-year-old Moroccan who spent 17 years in London. He worked as a chef at a string of restaurants, including the Hard Rock Cafe, before traveling to Afghanistan after the United States began bombing the country in October 2001. The military authorities accused him of belonging to a radical Moroccan Islamist group and training at a Qaeda camp in Afghanistan, charges that his lawyers have disputed. Intelligence officials told me they did not consider him a high-value detainee and noted that he had been hospitalized for manic depression. But the guards, impressed by his influence and sense of self-importance, had nicknamed him the General.

Errachidi seemed rather surprised to be sitting down with the commander of the detention group, Bumgarner told me. But in that meeting on June 6 and a second, longer one two days later, Errachidi seized the chance to inventory the prisoners' grievances: The water was foul, he said, and the food terrible. The detainees were angry about the guards' habit of walking loudly through the cellblocks at prayer times and even angrier that "The Star-Spangled Banner" sometimes played over distant naval-base loudspeakers during or right after the evening call to prayer.

The General "kept talking about 'the dark ages,'" Bumgarner would later recall. The prisoner complained, for example, that the guards often referred to the detainees in demeaning ways, calling out when they were moving a prisoner that they had "a package" ready.

"We are not 'packages,'" Errachidi told the colonel. "We are human beings."

After the first meeting, Bumgarner received a piece of paper from a guard. It was a drawing by Errachidi, a sort of map. In one corner, it showed a shaded area labeled "the Dark Ages." From there, a path wound through a thicket of obstacles. They had labels like "No 'packages,'" "Better food" and "Turn the lights down." At the end of the path, Errachidi had drawn what looked like an oasis, with water and palm trees.

Back at Bumgarner's command center, some of his staff officers wondered about the wisdom of trying to solve such complaints. They were used to their commanders walking the blocks and occasionally speaking to prisoners; they were not accustomed to sit-downs. Nor did they see why they should be the ones to pick through the Geneva provisions and suggest whether the detainees might be entitled to elect their own representatives or attend educational programs.

"We're the guys on the ground," the detention group's former operations officer, Maj. Joseph M. Angelo, told me not long ago. "So why was I making recommendations on what portions of the Geneva Conventions we should implement? That just struck me as kind of weird."

Still, the unease of Bumgarner's staff did not compare with the reaction he got from the intelligence side of the Guantánamo task force. There had long been tension between the two military units, but this time members of the Joint Intelligence Group "were furious," one staff officer recalled. There were few privileges to give out at Guantánamo, this officer and others said, and interrogators felt they should be the ones to dispense them — in return for cooperation from the detainees.

Before he deployed to Cuba, Bumgarner's military police superiors had been emphatic that he should stick to his responsibilities and leave his counterparts in military intelligence to their interrogations and analysis. Bumgarner wasn't worried about stepping out of his lane. "I run the camps," he said.

Bumgarner set about trying to solve the problems he saw. He instructed members of the guard force to stop referring to the detainees as "packages." On compliant blocks, he had guards start turning down the lights between 10 p.m. and 4 a.m. and stop moving prisoners during those hours to allow the detainees to sleep. To avoid disturbing their prayers, he ordered guards to place yellow traffic cones spray-painted with a "P" in the cellblock halls at prayer times. He asked his aides to see that "The Star-Spangled Banner" recording would be played at least three minutes before the call to prayer.

Another of Bumgarner's senior staff officers, Maj. Timothy O'Reilly, a reservist who is a lawyer in civilian life, began to recognize some of what he was seeing from jails and prisons in the United States. "The ultimate nirvana for anybody in law enforcement or corrections is compliance," he said earlier this year. "In order to run an effective prison, you need to have people comply with your orders, and that's no different from the smallest jail to the biggest high-security prison."

But Guantánamo was clearly unlike other prisons in one important respect: The detainees found much less incentive to obey the rules. To some, exile to the discipline or segregation blocks was a source of status and pride, military intelligence officials said. And the punishments were limited. Striking or spraying urine on a guard brought 30 days' segregation, the maximum length of any punishment under Geneva rules. There was no such thing as getting a few more years tacked on to your sentence.

In an American prison, O'Reilly and others noted, an inmate could be a sworn enemy of the prison authorities, respected among other prisoners, and still try to "run a good program" — avoiding trouble in an effort to reduce his time behind bars. At Guantánamo, compliance with the rules brought only prayer beads, packets of hot sauce, a slightly thicker mattress. It would not bring early parole.

Former detainees I met insisted that their defiance was provoked not only by their despair over their uncertain futures but also by unnecessarily harsh and arbitrary treatment from the guards. "If people's basic human rights were respected, I don't think they would have had any of these problems," said Abdul Salam Zaeef, a former Taliban cabinet minister and ambassador to Pakistan who was the pre-eminent leader of Afghan prisoners at Guantánamo before his release in the late summer of 2005. "There were no rules and no law. Any guard could do whatever they wanted to do."

Like other small, insular groups that live at the mercy of a more powerful force, the detainees have woven intricate, conspiratorial theories about their fate. In a closed world where prayer gives structure to daily life and the Koran is the one possession guards are never supposed to take away, prisoners were acutely sensitive to any perceived disrespect for their faith. But there were many other grievances. Some former detainees told me that early on, they were injected at Guantánamo with psychotropic drugs, a claim that military officials denied. Later, detainees continued to suspect hidden agents of social control in everything from the cloudy tap water to the configuration of their cells.

"Those blocks are designed so that you will not rest," says Mohammed al-Daihani, a government accountant from Kuwait who was sent home last November. "There is metal everywhere. If anyone drops anything, you hear it. If anyone shouts or talks loudly, it disturbs everyone. If there is a problem at the other end of the block, you cannot possibly rest. After two or three weeks, you think you will lose your mind."

Although the detainees came from diverse backgrounds and more than three dozen countries, there was only one real prison gang at Guantánamo. The authorities were convinced it was controlled by Al Qaeda members. An August 2002 study by the C.I.A. asserted that Qaeda detainees at Guantánamo had quickly begun "establishing cellblock leaders and dividing responsibility among deputies for greeting new arrivals, assessing interrogations, monitoring the guard force and providing moral support to fellow detainees, among other tasks." (The study was posted in July on the Web site The Smoking Gun; two officials confirmed its authenticity to me.)

Such conclusions may have been drawn from the actions of detainees like Shaker Aamer, the man with whom Bumgarner spoke for hours at the end of June. Abdullah al-Noaimi, a Bahraini student who was released from Guantánamo last November, described in interviews at his home in Bahrain in June how Aamer initially organized their cellblock through sheer force of personality. "He's always laughing and talking, very extroverted," al-Noaimi said. "He was born to be a leader."

Soon after his own arrival in Cuba, al-Noaimi recalled, Aamer rallied the detainees on the block to refuse to be weighed by the medical staff — a largely meaningless protest, he said, but one that infuriated the guards and thrilled the detainees. Eventually, he added, Aamer organized the 48-cell block into four groups of 12, with representatives for each unit and a spokesman for the block. "It's the same thing John McCain did in Vietnam," said Lieut. Col. Kevin Burk, who commanded the army's first military police battalion at Guantánamo. "You continue your resistance."

Some parts of the camp were easier to manage than others. The guards looked on the roughly 110 Afghans then at Guantánamo as relatively cooperative. They filled much of Camp 4, the newer wing where Level 1, or "highly compliant," prisoners were allowed to live in communal barracks, serving their own food and moving freely in and out of small recreation yards. Most of the rest of the Afghans were in Camp 1, for Level 2, or "compliant," detainees. Only a handful were held in Camp 5, the maximum-security area. Yet as more prisoners were released, the remainder were becoming a more cohesive group, military officials and former detainees said. They were also overwhelmingly Arab, and more likely to have endured more extreme interrogation techniques like sleep deprivation, sexual humiliation and threats.

Several former detainees insisted that it was not Al Qaeda that bound them at Guantánamo but a common adversary. In standard prison fashion, they developed ingenious ways to organize and communicate. They attached messages to long threads from their clothing with wads of hardened toothpaste and then cast them into neighboring cells. They shouted into the plumbing to talk between floors in the maximum-security unit. And as their frustration grew, their ability to organize was brought to bear in new ways.

IV. Aamer the Hero

The hunger strike that confronted Colonel Bumgarner in mid-June 2005 escalated quickly. Of the many strikes since early 2002, few had gone far enough to prompt doctors to force-feed the detainees through stomach tubes. This time, however, there were not a handful of hunger-strikers but dozens.

As they often had before, military spokesmen dismissed the protest as a publicity bid typical of Al Qaeda-trained terrorists. Officers at Guantánamo had tabulated hundreds of incidents of what they termed "manipulative, self-injurious behavior." Privately, though, they began to discuss how to respond to a potential suicide. At the Pentagon, officials dusted off contingency plans for dealing with a body that would need prompt burial under Islamic law.

Senior members of the Guantánamo staff began to meet regularly with General Hood to monitor the strike. The chief medical officer, Navy Capt. John S. Edmondson, M.D., worried about the prospect of having to force-feed large numbers of detainees. The medical risk was relatively low, but there were other considerations. "Anytime you're doing a procedure that the patient doesn't want, it's not a place you want to be," he would tell me later. "What takes precedence? The patient's rights, or their life? It's not an easy question."

Bumgarner soon turned to Aamer, who had been on strike since around the time of their first meeting in Camp Echo. During that first encounter, he said, the prisoner had been "trying to convince me, in a very subtle way, that he could help control things in the camp." He decided to consider the proposal.

Over a couple of more conversations with Aamer, Bumgarner made his case: He wanted the detention camp to run more smoothly, to make things easier for detainees who obeyed the rules. He was prepared to move closer to the standards of the Geneva Conventions in some parts of the operation, including discipline. What did Aamer think it would take, the colonel wanted to know, for the hunger strike to end?

Aamer summarized his discussions with Bumgarner in a statement he dated Aug. 11, 2005, and later gave to his lawyer, Clive Stafford Smith. In it, he said the hunger-strikers demanded ending "the secret abuse project of Camp 5" (which he did not explain) and either bringing the detainees to trial or sending them home. Meanwhile, they wanted better medical and living conditions. Aamer wrote that the colonel promised him "that justice would come to Guantánamo at last." The prisoner, his lawyer said later, had "decided that this was a man who he could trust."

Bumgarner said he tried always to bring the talks back to what he could deliver: modest improvements in the detainees' living conditions. He said Aamer told him: "'If you can get me to go around the camps, I can turn this off.'"

There were no precedents for chaperoned consultations among detainees. But by July 26, 2005, the number of detainees refusing to eat was at 56, and doctors were becoming concerned about the health of several of them. Bumgarner decided to act. "I saw the chance to end it, and I just did it," he said.

The colonel went to see Aamer at a small hospital inside the detention camp. He was sitting on a bed, one ankle chained to the frame, surrounded by some of the other more determined hunger-strikers. According to Bumgarner, Aamer told him that several of the detainees had had a "vision," in which three of them had to die for the rest to be freed. Still, he agreed to try to persuade them to drop the protest.

Aamer agreed to suspend his own strike on July 26, his lawyer said, but was unsuccessful in persuading others. That evening or the next, Bumgarner said, he had guards retrieve Aamer from the hospital and meet him at Camp 5, the imposing maximum-security unit. Once inside the heavy doors, they went through the cellblocks one by one, as Aamer spoke with a handful of the most influential detainees.

Aamer went first to see Saber Lahmar, an Algerian-born Islamic scholar who was arrested in Bosnia in a supposed conspiracy to bomb the American Embassy in Sarajevo. (Lahmar denied any involvement in such a plot.) Trailed by the colonel and a military interpreter, Aamer continued through the tiers, crouching down to speak to a handful of others through the slots by which they received their food. His last stop was the cell of Ghassan al-Sharbi, a 30-year-old Saudi who studied electrical engineering in Prescott, Ariz. Al-Sharbi, who was later charged in the military tribunals with joining in an Al Qaeda conspiracy to manufacture bombs for attacks in Afghanistan, was reluctant to give up the strike. When he finally agreed, the others went along, two military officials said.

As they prepared to leave Camp 5, Bumgarner says, he asked Aamer if he needed to speak with some of the other hunger-strikers there as well. "No," Aamer answered matter-of-factly. "The others will put the word out."

The colonel and his prisoner drove to Camps 2 and 3. As they entered some of the blocks — Bumgarner in his camouflage fatigues, Aamer handcuffed to a chain around his waist — the cells erupted with applause.

"He was treated like a rock star, some of the places we would go in," Bumgarner recalls. "I have never seen grown men — with beards, hardened men — crying at the sight of another man." He paused, searching for an analogy. "It was like I was with Bon Jovi or something," he said.

Former detainees who witnessed the visits recounted to me that Aamer, speaking in Arabic, proposed to end the hunger strike and explained that other detainees in Camp 5 were in agreement. In return, he said, the military authorities promised to try to resolve problems the prisoners faced and to observe parts of the Geneva Conventions.

The colonel's subordinates had grown accustomed to his hands-on style of leadership. But they worried more openly about his meetings with Aamer. The Saudi, one officer pointedly said, "has an almost hypnotic power over some people." Two others referred to Aamer as "Svengali."

Bumgarner himself struggled with Aamer's frequent demands. One morning, as Aamer was being sent off with other officers to brief detainees, he had a new one for the colonel: Now he wanted to move around without the leg shackles that were standard for detainees being transported outside their cellblocks.

"Look, Shaker, don't make a big deal out of this," Bumgarner recalled telling him. "Let's get on to the bigger thing here. I can't take you out of those shackles."

"I'm not going unless you just handcuff me," the prisoner responded.

"Shaker, don't do this to me," the colonel said. "It's just going to make it harder."

"No," he quoted Aamer as saying. "I'm not doing any of this."

Bumgarner ordered the shackles removed. The handcuffs stayed on. Aamer finally went ahead with his briefings to the other prisoners. "It was clearly a risk — not in terms of putting anybody in danger, but in terms of perception," Bumgarner told me later. "But I thought that in the end, in order to keep things going, I was going to have to do it."

Mullah Zaeef, the former Taliban ambassador, had just finished his prayers in Camp 4 when a sergeant came to his dormitory. "There is someone who wants to see you," the sergeant said. Zaeef had never had an unannounced visitor at Guantánamo before.

He found Aamer waiting. The two men had known each other in Camp 1, where they were briefly neighbors. Zaeef, who spoke Arabic, noted that many of the Arabs respected the Saudi's leadership. Aamer told Zaeef about his conversations with the colonel.

"We thought maybe they were becoming softer in their policies," Zaeef recalls. "Or we thought maybe they were trying to trick us. But we thought that we should see which one it was."

When I met him in Afghanistan almost a year later, Zaeef still seemed a bit uncertain about what had taken place. He is an elegant, professorial man who wears wire-rimmed glasses and the black silk turban favored by the Taliban. He described the episode during two long interviews in the well-guarded government guest house on the dusty outskirts of Kabul, where he has lived since returning home last September.

According to Zaeef, Aamer described a scheme of representation for the detainees that he had worked out with Bumgarner — one that vaguely echoed the Third Geneva Convention's rules for a prisoner-of-war camp. Detainees in Camp 4 were to choose two inmates to represent them, one for the Afghans and another for the rest. With guards by his side, Zaeef said he then went from one block to the next, explaining the situation. After some discussion, he was chosen by acclamation to represent all of the Camp 4 detainees. Still, Zaeef recalled, "people were very skeptical."

Nonetheless, most of the hunger-strikers suspended their protests by July 28. Disciplinary problems on the blocks eased. The mood in the camps swelled palpably, some military officials told me. Later Bumgarner would refer to this interlude as "the Period of Peace."

The colonel then turned to some of the issues the detainees had raised during their strike. He and Aamer were sitting at one of the picnic tables near his office, debating the camp food, when Aamer insisted that the detainees' meals were being poisoned.

"That's asinine!" Bumgarner said.

"I don't see you eating the stuff," he said Aamer shot back.

Over a dinner of fish sticks and fries, they began working out a solution. Not long after, Aamer sat down with the head of the mess hall, the base nutritionist and a logistics officer on the military staff. According to one officer briefed on the meeting, Aamer unfolded a piece of paper on which he had drawn up an elaborate two-week meal plan with daily suggestions for four different diets: a standard menu, a vegetarian menu, a vegetarian-with-fish option and a bland diet for older prisoners and those with intestinal problems. Two officials said Aamer's proposal eventually became the basis for a new meal plan that raised the amount of food offered to detainees each day from 2,800 calories to 4,200 calories.

DOJ_NMG_0064878

After weeks of discussion with his aides, Bumgarner also instituted a new program to simplify the discipline in the camp. Under the previous four-level system, misdeeds were punished with the loss of various "comfort items" like prayer beads and books, or stints in the discipline or segregation blocks. The system was so complicated, military officials said, that its application often seemed arbitrary.

The new plan called for all or nothing. Every detainee was restored to compliant status and issued all of the comfort items generally available, including prayer beads and bigger bars of soap. Those who broke the rules would be busted down to "basic issue," or B.I., with nothing in between. To symbolize the new order, all detainees in punishment-orange uniforms would be reoutfitted in tan.

The change might have made a dent in the prisoners' abiding sense of humiliation. The problem, some officers said, was that the plan was set in motion before enough tan clothing could be requisitioned to outfit all the detainees. Some of those left in orange complained loudly.

"We did not think that through like we were playing chess," Major Angelo said. "We thought like we were playing checkers. And that didn't work."

V. The End of Peace

A couple of days after Aamer visited Zaeef to explain the new plan for prisoner representation, a guard approached Zaeef with a cryptic message. "At 6 o'clock you are going to go somewhere," he said. At the appointed hour, Zaeef was led out of the camp and put on the rumble seat of one of the small John Deere utility vehicles used to transport detainees around the detention center and driven to Camp 1.

The guards led him to the small, fenced-in exercise yard for Alpha block, where two picnic tables had been placed. Ala Muhammad Salim, an influential Egyptian religious leader in the camp who was known as Sheik Ala, was already there. The two prisoners sat down and began quizzing each other about what was going on. Four others trickled in. They included Aamer and two of the men he met with in Camp 5: Saber Lahmar, the Algerian scholar, and Ghassan al-Sharbi, the Saudi engineer. The sixth was Adel Fattoh Algazzar, a former Egyptian Army officer with a master's degree in economics. Bumgarner did not attend the meeting, but when all of the detainees were seated, his deputy arrived with two other officers. Al-Sharbi acted as the Arabic interpreter.

According to other officers I spoke with, the deputy delivered a simple message: The six were being asked to provide their input on how to improve conditions in the camp. Each of the detainees responded in turn.

"Do not mistreat us anymore," Zaeef recalled saying. "Be respectful of our religion and our Koran. Respect us as human beings, because we are human beings. If we are criminals, take us to court. But if we are innocent, let us go."

News of the meeting buzzed through the camp. Right away, several former detainees said, the prisoners began to debate what was taking place. "We had never talked to the colonels before," Abdulaziz al-Shammari, a Kuwaiti teacher, said. "But this Bumgarner came around all the time, wanting to negotiate with us."

The younger detainees pressed Aamer to push past the matter of living conditions and focus on their demands for trial or release. "The shabab said to him, 'We must not go only for the small things; we should go to the core issues,'" al-Shammari said, using the Arabic word for "young people" or "youth."

Mohammed al-Daihani, the Kuwaiti accountant, now released, said that soon after the colonel and Aamer visited his cellblock, Ahmed Errachidi, the Moroccan known as the General, challenged others there to analyze the possible motives of their captors. "He said: 'Why is a colonel from the most powerful country in the world coming to negotiate with the detainees? They must be under some kind of pressure.'"

The skeptics on Bumgarner's side were also growing more vocal. "I was one of the few who thought we should let the leaders come talk to us," the colonel acknowledged. Hood was clearly uneasy with the negotiations, other officers said. He told aides not to refer to the six as "the council," as the detainees did. Still, several officers emphasized, the talks would never have gone forward if Hood had not approved them.

On the evening of Saturday, Aug. 6, shortly after the council's first meeting, the colonel convened the six again, officers said. This time, he sat with the group himself. Aamer had insisted that they should not be handcuffed or shackled. "These are leaders," he told the colonel.

Bumgarner agreed, and the handcuffs were removed. Guards armed with pepper spray stood by, while an immediate-reaction team waited just out of sight. The colonel later summarized his introduction thusly: "You're here. I'm here. You've got my attention. Tell me what the grievances are, and we'll work through them." He added, "This place ain't going away, so we might as well make the best of it."

As Zaeef recalled the encounter, Bumgarner made several promises: He would allow the circulation of religious books among the detainees and try to resolve problems that arose with the guards. He would assure that the prisoners' food was "adequate." Zaeef said the most important thing the colonel pledged was to send another official who would be able to speak with the detainees about their "future." Bumgarner said he promised only that guards would act "in the spirit of the Geneva Conventions" and that he would see that Guantánamo's discipline was consistent with its terms.

On the following Monday, the officers said, the six detainees were allowed to meet alone in the fenced-in yard. A pair of military interpreters were positioned nearby to monitor their conversation, officers said. According to both Zaeef and military officials, the detainees began using pens and paper they had been given to write notes. An officer observing the meeting interrupted them: they were not to pass notes, he said. When they insisted on confidentiality, he stepped forward again. But as the officer moved to confiscate the notes, some of the detainees popped them into their mouths and began chewing.

Hood pronounced the experiment over. "'This group is not meeting anymore,'" the colonel recounts him saying. "'And you are not going to be meeting with them anymore.'"

The "period of peace" came to an abrupt end. According to various sources — military officials, former detainees and Aamer's lawyer, Clive Stafford Smith — the detainees were also angered by a few incidents that had taken place over the weekend before the second council meeting. In one case, a prisoner had been forcibly extracted from his cell, only to sit waiting for hours to be interrogated. In another, the questioning of a slight Tunisian detainee by a much larger criminal investigator ended in a violent scuffle involving a cut nose, the possible hurling of a mini-refrigerator and the investigator's being ordered off the island.

A couple of days after the negotiations were shut down, officials said, a riot broke out in Camps 2 and 3. Dozens of detainees tore up their cells, wrenching foot pegs from their toilets and using them to try to pry loose the mesh that separated them. Guards were pulled from the tiers and deployed to surround the perimeter of the blocks. Water and electricity were shut off, and Bumgarner finally got on a bullhorn with an Arabic interpreter to persuade the detainees to be escorted from their ruined cells. The repairs took weeks.

The guard officers were unsure what the detainee leaders had been up to. According to military and intelligence officials, there were indications that Aamer and al-Sharbi had been at odds. Al-Sharbi, the accused Al Qaeda bomb maker, once told a military review panel it was his "honor" to be classified as an enemy combatant, declaring, "May God help me to fight the infidels!" Paradoxically, he was believed to be the more pragmatic negotiator, urging that the detainees try to improve conditions in the camp. But Aamer, who had denied any involvement in militant activities, took a different position. According to the officials, he argued more directly that the detainees should use the talks to pressure the military into either trying them fairly or setting them free.

Aamer told his lawyer the military had "sadly betrayed its word on every occasion a promise has been made." He blamed the colonel personally. At the time, Bumgarner said, he felt similarly betrayed. But when he recounted the story months later, he sounded merely disappointed. "We almost liked each other," he said of the two Saudis, Aamer and al-Sharbi. "I shouldn't say we liked each other, but when we spoke together, there was no animosity."

By mid-August, the hunger strike that military commanders thought they had resolved was picking up strength. Complaints about living conditions were de-emphasized, military officials and lawyers for the detainees told me. Instead, the prisoners focused on their future legal status. The renewed protest hit a peak just after Sept. 11 of last year, with 131 prisoners refusing meals for at least three straight days, officials said.

Many of the officers doubted that the protesters were willing to take their own lives. Islamic law strongly forbids suicide. Abdulaziz al-Shammari, the Kuwaiti teacher who was one of the most frequent hunger-strikers, said he never considered taking his own life. "We saw that they would not let us die," he said of the military doctors. "This was merely the most extreme side of the protests."

Al-Shammari, who has a university degree in Islamic law, was one of a half-dozen more learned detainees to whom others turned for religious rulings on countless problems of their captivity. He said he knew of no relevant exceptions to the prohibition against suicide.

Two officials familiar with intelligence reporting from Guantánamo said that sometime in the late summer of 2005, Saber Lahmar, the Algerian religious leader who served on the six-man council, told other detainees of a fatwa that said it was lawful to take your own life in order to protect state secrets or to defend the common good. Other detainees spoke about the prophetic dream that Shaker Aamer mentioned to Bumgarner, in which three prisoners had to die for the rest to be free, the officials said.

As doctors began to tube-feed the more recalcitrant hunger-strikers, the strike consumed the medical staff. Specialists were flown in from naval hospitals in Florida. Most of the detainees maintained their weight at above or near 80 percent of their so-called ideal body weight. But as the strike dragged on, several slipped below 75 or even 70 percent of that measure, doctors said.

For detainees who obeyed the rules, the military offered new perks. Exercise time was extended once more. On Hood's instructions, Gatorade and energy bars were given out during recreation periods. Wednesday became pizza night. Guard officers suggested soccer and volleyball tournaments to the compliant detainees in Camp 4. The detainees came back asking that a prize — two-liter bottles of Pepsi — be awarded to the winners. (The detainees disdained Coca-Cola, guards said.) Before the games could begin, however, the detainees changed their minds, the officers said. They had concluded that the contest was a scheme by the military to divide them.

While increasing the incentives for compliance, the colonel also tried to clamp down on disruptive behavior. The segregation and discipline blocks were overhauled. The rules became stricter, the guards tougher. When detainees in segregation tried to shout to one another through the walls, the guards were to turn on large, noisy fans to drown them out.

Worried about Shaker Aamer's influence, Bumgarner also took an unusual step. In September, he had Aamer moved to Camp Echo, where he would be even more isolated than he would be on the segregation blocks. But Bumgarner did not cut off contacts with the detainee leaders entirely. He approached Zaeef to assure him that he wanted to continue to improve things for compliant detainees. He also developed a rapport with Ghassan al-Sharbi.

Al-Sharbi was described by people who know him as an intelligent, almost ethereal man from a wealthy Saudi family. (In an appearance before a military tribunal, he sat placidly with his hands folded at the defense table and told the presiding officer in plain English: "I'm going to make it easy for you guys. I fought against the United States.") The colonel said he found al-Sharbi a useful interlocutor and met with him repeatedly. After August, he never spoke with Aamer again.

The guard officers saw some indications that the tougher approach was working. The number of detainees in the discipline and segregation blocks fell substantially. Only later did the officers begin to suspect that the more combative detainees were so focused on the hunger strike that they had little energy for other protests.

VI. The Suicides

To some of Colonel Bumgarner's officers, it seemed that the latest group of hunger-strikers were being allowed to get too comfortable. They had hospital beds, air-conditioning, attentive nurses and a choice of throat lozenges to ease the pain of their feeding tubes. The arrangement also allowed some of the hospitalized detainees to communicate relatively easily.

By late November, while many of the strikers were maintaining their weight, four or five of them were becoming dangerously malnourished, Dr. Edmondson said. By sucking on their feeding tubes, they had figured out how to siphon out the contents of their stomachs. Others simply vomited after they had been fed.

On Dec. 5, the guard force ordered five "restraint chairs" from a small manufacturer in Iowa. If obdurate detainees could be strapped down during and after their feedings, the guard officers hoped, it might ensure that they digested what they were fed.

Days later, a Navy forensic psychiatrist arrived at Guantánamo, followed by three experts from a Bureau of Prisons medical center in Missouri. Bumgarner said the visitors agreed with him that the strike was a "discipline issue": "If you don't eat, it's the same as an attempted suicide. It's a violation of camp rules." In addition to feeding prisoners in the chair, some of the more influential hunger-strikers were sent off to Camp Echo with the hope of weakening the others' resolve. The number of strikers, which was at 84 in early January, soon fell to a handful.

Lawyers for the detainees were appalled. The lawyers quoted their clients as saying detainees had been strapped into the chairs for several hours at a time, even as they defecated or urinated on themselves. The doctors told me later that they had run out of options. "I would have preferred to have waited," said Dr. Edmondson, the chief base physician, who other officials said opposed the restraint chairs. But he added, "I seriously believed that we were going to lose one of those guys if we didn't do something different."

In the spring of 2006, General Hood and Colonel Bumgarner were suggesting that the mood at Guantánamo had turned. A handful of hunger-strikers were still at it — a few young Saudis and Yemenites, and Ghassan al-Sharbi. But the officers saw them as zealots whose threat to the smooth operation of the camp could be controlled. Otherwise, disciplinary infractions and attacks on the guards were down, they said, and many of the detainees were responding positively to new incentives for good behavior.

In an interview in late March, Hood said he believed that many young Arab detainees — sheltered, passionate young men who had gone to Afghanistan to fight what they thought would be a noble jihad — were beginning to see the light. They hadn't been radicalized at Guantánamo, he insisted. Rather, as conditions at the camp had improved, their preconceptions about Americans had worn away. "They discover, 'You guys aren't so bad.'"

"I think the hard-core people have lost ground over the last four years," Hood said. "They are clearly losing ground."

As he prepared to turn over his command in April to Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., Hood was upbeat about the future. "We are going to establish the most world-class detention facilities, and we are going to show the world that we're doing this right," he said. "Every provision of the Geneva Conventions related to the safe custody of the detainees is being adhered to. Today at Guantánamo — and, in fact, for a long time — the American people would be proud of the discipline that is demonstrated here."

Six weeks later, as guards in Camp 1 patrolled one of the blocks, they came upon a detainee comatose in his cell and frothing at the mouth — symptoms of an apparent overdose. "Snowball" — the guards' radio code for a suicide attempt — was called out over and over. In all, five detainees were found to have ingested medication that they and others had hoarded, and guard officers concluded that at least three were making serious suicide attempts. (Military spokesmen said that only two had really tried to kill themselves.)

Later that afternoon, May 18, a riot broke out among the "highly compliant" detainees in Camp 4 as guards moved to search their dormitories — and their Korans — for pills and other contraband, officials said. Detainees in one block of the camp set on guards who stormed their barracks after another guard saw a staged hanging and mistakenly called out "blizzard," the code for multiple suicide attempts. The guards' quick-reaction force fired rounds of rubber bullets and voluminous blasts of pepper spray to contain the disturbance.

Doctors later determined that the detainees had ingested sleeping pills, antianxiety medication and antipsychotics — whatever they could get their hands on. Since none of the men had been prescribed the medicines they took, it was evident that other detainees had colluded in the plan. (A cache of about 20 more pills was later found in one prisoner's prosthetic leg.) Still, the military authorities seemed uncertain how to respond.

Some officials recalled the detainees' premonition about three of them having to die. The medical staff tried to more closely monitor detainees with mental-health problems. But that screening apparently did not factor in the possibility that the men might have been determined to kill themselves for other reasons — like loyalty to a cause.

Sometime before midnight on June 9, three young Arab men, who were being held near one another in a single block of Camp 1, moved quietly to the backs of their small cells and began to string up nooses that had been elaborately made from torn linens and clothing. The bright lights had been turned down for the night. Still, the prisoners had to work quickly: guards were supposed to walk the block every three minutes.

After anchoring the nooses in the steel mesh walls of their cells, the three — Mani al-Utaybi, and Yasser Talal al-Zahrani, both Saudis, and Ali Abdullah Ahmed, of Yemen — piled clothing under their bedsheets to make it appear that they were asleep. They stuffed wads of fabric into their mouths, either to muffle their cries or perhaps to help themselves suffocate. At least one of the men also bound his legs, military officials said, apparently so he would not be able to kick as he died.

With the nooses pulled over their heads, the prisoners slipped behind blankets they had hung over the back corners of their cells and stepped onto their small, stainless-steel sinks. The drop was short — only about 18 inches — but adequate. By the time they were discovered, doctors surmised, the men had been asphyxiated for at least 20 minutes and probably longer. Military and intelligence officials said it appeared that the other 20-odd prisoners on the block knew that the suicides were being prepared. Some may have prayed with the men, the officials said, and a few may have assisted in carrying out the plan. What is certain is that in contrast to most previous suicide attempts at the camp, none of the detainees made any effort to alert the guards.

When doctors reviewed their files on the three men, they found that none of them had shown signs of depression or other psychological problems. All three had been on hunger strikes — one of them since the previous August — and at least two of them had been evaluated when they abandoned their protests. One doctor recalled one of the men telling him brightly: "I'm sleeping well. I feel well. No problems."

What the men hoped to communicate by their deaths may have been contained in brief notes they left behind in Arabic. The notes have not been made public, and a Navy investigation into the suicides continues. But military leaders at Guantánamo were not waiting on its outcome. They concluded immediately that the suicides were a blitzkrieg in the detainees' long campaign of protest. At a news conference hours after the suicides, the new Guantánamo commander, Admiral Harry Harris, described them as an act of "asymmetric warfare."

VII. Tightening Up

I sat down with Colonel Bumgarner one blazing afternoon in late June, as he was preparing to give up command. He looked tired and stressed, and slumped into a chair in his small, cluttered office. As Shaker Aamer did the previous summer, Bumgarner used words like "trust" and "betrayal." Bumgarner, at the time we spoke, was briefly suspended from duty while the military investigated whether he improperly disclosed classified information to a North Carolina newspaper reporter who, around the time the suicides occurred, had been in Bumgarner's headquarters reporting a feature article on the colonel from Kings Mountain. (He was absolved of any wrongdoing.) But he seemed more worried by something else: Had he completely misunderstood the prisoners he was trying to reach?

"We tried to improve their lives to the extent that we can — to the point that we may have gone overboard, not recognizing the real nature of who we're dealing with," he said. "I thought they had proven themselves. I'm ashamed to admit it, but I did not think that they would kill themselves."

Bumgarner said he could not discuss the suicides because of the Navy's continuing investigation. But several officials said that the three detainees had taken advantage of some of the colonel's quality-of-life reforms, including the nighttime dimming of lights and the availability of extra clothing. There were also indications that Ghassan al-Sharbi, the colonel's onetime interlocutor, had helped plan the suicides, two of the officials said.

Looking back, Col. Kevin Burk, the commander of the military police battalion, said: “With any population like this, you’re going to have a battle. It wasn’t like we were all going to ‘Kumbaya’ together. But we were trying to find that middle ground, where the tension in the camp would even out. As far as we could see, no one had really tried to find that equilibrium before.”

It is unclear if or when the military might try again. By most appearances, Guantánamo has been tightening up. Since the May riot and the suicides, the military has increased security to prevent further disturbances or deaths. In its ruling on the military tribunals in June, the Supreme Court left the government no choice but to abide by the minimum standards of treatment contained in the Geneva Conventions. But what other privileges and freedoms the detainees are allowed may come even more into question as the Guantánamo population is winnowed down to a harder core and joined by the most notorious terror suspects captured by the C.I.A.

One hint of Guantánamo’s future may lie in the retrofitting of Camp 6, the brand-new medium-security facility that was to have opened this summer. Until this spring, the new camp was to embody the sort of conditions Colonel Bumgarner and other officials had hoped to institutionalize, with spaces for communal meals and larger recreation areas where compliant detainees could play soccer and other sports. After the riot and the suicides, the camp was substantially remade. When it eventually opens, military officials said, it will look somewhat more like Camp 5, the maximum-security unit down the road.

Don't Jettison Geneva Conventions, Ex-POWs Say (FLSUNSEN)

By Howard Goodman

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 17, 2006

Morton Brooks was only 19 when captured by German soldiers in World War II.

The Germans herded him up with 80 other American soldiers who were Jewish, like Brooks -- and another 270 who looked Jewish or were otherwise "undesirable," the Germans thought.

They were shipped by cattle car to a satellite of the notorious Buchenwald death camp called Berga. They were put to work as slave laborers: mining tunnels for a planned underground factory.

"When we brought up the Geneva Conventions," says Brooks, "they laughed in our faces."

It was a chapter of the war that lay buried for years, a story of soldiers who were treated more like Holocaust victims than captured combatants.

They were denied their rights as prisoners of war. Starved. Brutalized.

Down to 140 men, weakened from lack of food, they were sent on a death march as the Allies closed in on Germany, Brooks said. Their ordeal ended only with liberation.

Brooks had been imprisoned four months, and he weighed no more than 75 pounds. But he was alive.

"Forty percent of our group died," Brooks says.

A retired psychologist, he now lives in Boynton Beach.

Larry Treff, also of Boynton Beach, was only 20 years old when he was put in charge of 42 men during the Allied push into Germany.

Treff was leading his platoon up a hill when machine-gunned, hit twice in the leg and captured by Germans. Behind their lines, he was nearly killed in a U.S. artillery bombardment that was "the most horrible 10 minutes of my life."

Mel Pollack, of Delray Beach, spent almost six years in captivity after his fighter jet was shot down in 1967.

He was held at the notorious "Hanoi Hilton" prison, where the beds were concrete and the captors were vicious.

He was a cellmate of the future senator, John McCain, a man he admires immensely.

"He fought the North Vietnamese with his crutches," Pollack said.

On Friday, the three bowed their heads in memory of men who didn't make it. They saluted as they said the Pledge of Allegiance and never hesitated to say "under God." They shook hands with their thinning ranks of fellows.

It was National POW/MIA Recognition Day, and about 35 people gathered in the chapel of the VA Medical Center in West Palm Beach.

Fifteen had been prisoners of war in the Second World War. Two were held during the Vietnam War. Along with the white hair and polo shirts, there were erect postures in that room.

And a lot of courage.

"Through their strength and perseverance," Pamela McFrederick, a VA social-services supervisor, said in apt remarks of tribute, "They give the rest of us hope."

We live in a complicated time, when the Bush White House is pressing for permission to loosen time-honored rules regarding our treatment of war captives.

There's some logic to this. As Bill Acuri, a Vietnam POW, noted, the Geneva Conventions make sense in terms of opposing armies. "And the terrorists don't have an army."

DOJ_NMG_0064883

But Treff, who felt lucky to spend only 17 days as a captive in an impoverished German hospital before the war ended, says the United States must treat prisoners of war "with dignity and not abuse them."

Prisoners "must be interrogated toughly," Treff said, but never tortured. Brooks, who suffered so greatly at Nazi hands, concurred.

"The experts say that when you torture, you don't get adequate information anyway," he said.

And Pollack, who knows first-hand the brutal realities of war, says the United States must resist the calls to jettison the Geneva Convention on the humane treatment of war prisoners.

"If we abandon it," Pollack says, "then everybody is going to do it against us."

Call me crazy, but I trust ex-POWs on this more than a president and vice president who never were imprisoned and never went to war.

Who, Exactly, Is A POW? Museum Exhibit Asks Visitors To Think On It (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 17, 2006

Andersonville — His captors branded him a war criminal, but for the more than seven years Bill Robinson spent in North Vietnamese prison camps, he knew exactly what he was: a prisoner of war.

"When you wear the uniform of your country and are held by a foreign government, you are in a POW status," said Robinson, a retired Air Force captain from Madisonville, Tenn., who frequently comes to the National POW Museum here to talk to visitors about his experiences.

The question of who was a POW, and who was not, once seemed to have a relatively easy answer.

But the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have made that answer less clear. The only two service members unaccounted for since the Persian Gulf War, Navy Capt. Scott Speicher and Army Staff Sgt. Matt Maupin, are referred to by their own government as "missing/captured," not as POWs.

On Friday, National POW/MIA Recognition Day, officials at the infamous Civil War prison camp here opened a new exhibit posing the question: "Who is a POW?"

Fred Boyles, superintendent of the Andersonville National Historic Site, said the exhibit is an expansion of a portion of the POW Museum.

"What this exhibit seeks to do is to ask our 150,000 annual visitors to ponder this question, which is often difficult to answer," Boyles said.

The confusion over who is a POW and who is not dates back to the Revolutionary War, Boyles said, when Americans captured while fighting the British were considered war criminals and not legitimate prisoners.

It remains an issue of debate as the U.S. government struggles with its definition of those captured in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the Americans still unaccounted for there.

The fact that the U.S. government has virtually abandoned the designation POW has raised the ire of some former POWs and activists who are keeping alive the issue of missing Americans from all wars.

"It diminishes the focus on the issue of prisoners of war and missing in action. It makes it sound like those people are not missing or unaccounted for," said JoAnne Shirley of Dalton, chairman of the board of the National League of POW/MIA Families.

Shirley, whose brother, Air Force Maj. Bobby Jones, is unaccounted for in Vietnam, said more than 1,800 service members are still missing in Southeast Asia, some of whom were known to be alive when captured.

Larry Greer, spokesman for the Pentagon's POW/MIA office, said the terminology "prisoner of war" was one used by the Geneva Conventions and other nations, not the Pentagon.

"The distinction is that missing/captured is a Department of Defense term," Greer said. "To the layman, it means the same."

Not so, said Lynn O'Shea, director of research for the National Alliance of Families, a POW/MIA activist group.

"When you don't give [a prisoner] the designation that the international community under the Geneva Conventions gives, we're just diminishing the value of our captured personnel if we can't say the words 'prisoner of war,' " she said.

O'Shea said there are literally tens of thousands of pages of Pentagon documents from the Vietnam War that frequently refer to America's POWs. And, as recently as the 2003 invasion of Iraq, the Pentagon referred to captured Americans, including Pfc. Jessica Lynch, as POWs.

"We've been trying to get the Defense Department to acknowledge the reality that when the enemy parades a battered serviceman or woman on TV, it is an insult to call him or her missing/captured and not a prisoner of war," O'Shea said.

DOJ_NMG_0064884

Speicher, a Navy pilot, was shot down the first day of the Gulf War in 1991. Originally listed as Killed in Action/Body Not Recovered, his status was changed late last year to missing/captured when accumulated evidence indicated he may have survived the shootdown and been taken prisoner by Iraqi forces.

"There were intelligence reports that seemed to give enough credence to doubts for the secretary of navy that he was killed in action," Greer said of the reason for the change.

"We still have people on the ground investigating where he might be," he added.

Maupin, an Army Reservist, was captured by insurgents in April 2004 when his convoy was ambushed near Baghdad.

A few weeks later the Arabic television network Al-Jazeera showed a video of Maupin in captivity. Later, another video was aired in which a group calling itself "The Sharp Sword Against the Enemies of God and His Prophet" claimed to have executed Maupin.

Greer said there are also teams in Iraq still looking for Maupin, but declined to provide any information about their progress.

"In the case of Matt Maupin, it's a different environment. It's not a nation-state holding him, so we use the term missing/captured," Greer said.

While Article 4 of the Geneva Conventions has an extensive list of those who should be considered a POW, there is no mention of the status missing/captured.

"This missing in action/captured is very impersonal," O'Shea said. "You don't have to explain prisoner of war to anybody. But if you say missing in action/captured, what does that mean?"

Retired Army Col. Ben Purcell of Clarkesville, who spent more than five years in North Vietnamese prison camps, said he never considered himself anything other than a POW, despite the best efforts of his interrogators to convince him otherwise.

Eventually, Purcell said, "I became a prisoner at war. I argued with my interrogators, I went on hunger strikes and I tried to escape."

But, he said, he found strength in knowing he was a POW and should have been treated according to the articles of the Geneva Conventions.

Boyles said the new $80,000 exhibit might explode a few myths and start a few arguments over the definition of POWs.

For example, of the 52 Americans held hostage at the U.S. embassy in Tehran in 1979, only 13, the uniformed Marine security guards, were considered POWs.

And Francis Gary Powers, the U-2 pilot shot down and imprisoned in the Soviet Union in 1960, initially was not considered a POW because he was working for the CIA. Later, when it was discovered he also had an Air Force mission, his designation was changed.

The issue of who is a POW, Boyles said, "is something I've been scratching my head over for a long time."

Bush Fails To Recapture The Nation's Post-9/11 Unity (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

It's a truism that the world of Sept. 10, 2001, is gone, vaporized in the attacks of the next day.

But the world of Sept. 12 is gone too.

In the aftermath of Sept. 11, Americans came together in shock and sorrow and resolve. Members of Congress, from both parties, symbolized that powerful connection when they stood on the Capitol steps and sang "God Bless America" hours after the attacks.

Last week, on the fifth anniversary of Sept. 11, they tried that again. Not that many legislators showed up. The ones who did couldn't decide whether they wanted to hold hands. The whole thing fizzled out.

The symbolism couldn't be much plainer. The national unity that emerged from the rubble of New York's twin towers is gone too. Even President Bush's nationally televised speech commemorating the attacks, a surprisingly pointed defense of his decision to invade Iraq, drew angry criticism from Democrats who said he politicized the anniversary.

Across the range of national security issues, the two parties now agree on virtually nothing. The war in Iraq is dividing Congress and the country more than any military commitment since Vietnam. Full-scale confrontations between the White House and most Democrats joined by some Republicans are gathering over the rules for the warrantless National Security Agency wiretapping Bush authorized in 2001 and the procedures for bringing to trial detainees in the war on terrorism.

These conflicts hardly seem remarkable in an era when the two parties wage political war about almost everything. And yet from other angles, the degree of division over national security five years after Sept. 11 is extraordinary.

The struggle against Islamic radicalism is not like the Vietnam War, when a meaningful share of Americans questioned our stake in the outcome. Virtually all Americans recognize the nihilism symbolized by Osama bin Laden as a threat to our values and interests. In that specific sense, the fight against Islamic extremism is much more like World War II, when almost all Americans condemned the goals, methods and beliefs of our fascist enemies.

Given that starting point, it was not inevitable that America would divide so sharply over the strategy for combating that enemy. Looking back, there's plenty of blame to go around. Bush's decision to invade Iraq amid ambivalence at home and widespread resistance abroad was obviously a critical fork in the road.

Looking forward, there's no question that Bush has the greatest opportunity to bridge today's divisions. The president sets the tone for America's debates, especially on foreign policy. Except for the period immediately after Sept. 11, Bush simply hasn't placed a high priority on establishing consensus for his national security strategy.

It's easy to understand why he felt a sense of urgency and mission about constructing a comprehensive response to the threats that crystallized on that late-summer's day five years ago. But by pursuing a course that concedes so little to contrasting views, Bush has dissipated one of any democracy's greatest assets: a united sense of purpose. He has also virtually ensured that America will reopen almost all of his decisions as soon as he leaves office. A narrow consensus is rarely a lasting one.

In his various remarks last week remembering the Sept. 11 attacks, Bush — as he has before — invoked Presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman. But Bush still shows no indication of having learned from their approach to building domestic support for foreign policy.

As America moved into World War II, Roosevelt named Republican Henry Stimson, President Hoover's secretary of State, as his secretary of war. He also tapped Frank Knox, the Republican vice presidential nominee in 1936, as his secretary of the Navy. And FDR sent Wendell Willkie, his GOP opponent in 1940, on a global goodwill mission.

After the war, Truman built bipartisan support in Congress by consulting exhaustively, and compromising regularly, with Republican Sen. Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan over every aspect of America's emerging strategy for the Cold War. They built a consensus broad enough to endure: Truman's strategy of containment guided American policy for more than 40 years.

Neither Roosevelt nor Truman was a saint. Both sought to squeeze political advantage from their role as commander in chief. But they set boundaries on the mingling of war and politics. When Edward J. Flynn, the Democratic National Committee chairman, suggested in 1942 that a Republican takeover of the House might hurt the war effort, Roosevelt publicly rebuked him.

Bush has set a very different tone. He has provided Democrats and even skeptical Republicans little voice in shaping his national security strategy. Bush has also shown himself to be willing, even eager, to frame national security debates in ways that maximize their political impact. In 2002, Congress spent the last weeks before the midterm election arguing over guidelines for the Department of Homeland Security and authorization for the use of force in Iraq. Now the White House is pressing Congress to act on the NSA surveillance and the detainee trials just weeks before another critical election.

Let's be clear. Debate is good. Argument is healthy. In a democracy, dissent is not only a right, but an obligation, especially during wartime. It's pointless to deny the presence of genuine disagreements. But after all the arguments have been raised, all the dissent and disagreements aired, and all the debates conducted, political leaders' responsibility is to build a consensus most of their citizens can accept.

Both parties have failed that test too often since Sept. 11. But the president has the greatest opportunity to create that consensus and so he bears the greatest responsibility for its absence. The hole in the skyline of Lower Manhattan, and in the hearts of many Americans, is now matched by the tear in the sense of common purpose that inspired so much of the country five years ago.

How The Presidency Regained Its Balance (NYT)

By John Yoo

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

Berkeley, Calif.

FIVE years after 9/11, President Bush has taken his counterterrorism case to the American people. That's because he has had to. This summer, a plurality of the Supreme Court found, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, that Congress must explicitly approve military commissions to try suspected terrorists. So Mr. Bush has proposed legislation seeking to place the tribunals, and other aggressive antiterrorism measures, on a sounder footing.

But the president has broader goals than even fighting terrorism — he has long intended to make reinvigorating the presidency a priority. Vice President Dick Cheney has rightly deplored the "erosion of the powers and the ability of the president of the United States to do his job" and noted that "we are weaker today as an institution because of the unwise compromises that have been made over the last 30 to 35 years."

Thus the administration has gone to war to pre-empt foreign threats. It has data-mined communications in the United States to root out terrorism. It has detained terrorists without formal charges, interrogating some harshly. And it has formed military tribunals modeled on those of past wars, as when we tried and executed a group of Nazi saboteurs found in the United States.

To his critics, Mr. Bush is a "King George" bent on an "imperial presidency." But the inescapable fact is that war shifts power to the branch most responsible for its waging: the executive. Harry Truman sent troops to fight in Korea without Congressional authority. George H. W. Bush did not have the consent of Congress when he invaded Panama to apprehend Manuel Noriega. Nor did Bill Clinton when he initiated NATO's air war over Kosovo.

The Bush administration's decisions to terminate the 1972 antiballistic missile treaty and to withdraw from the International Criminal Court and the Kyoto accords on global warming rested on constitutional precedents going all the way back to Abraham Lincoln.

The administration has also been energetic on the domestic front. It has re-classified national security information made public in earlier administrations and declined, citing executive privilege, to disclose information to Congress or the courts about its energy policy task force. The White House has declared that the Constitution allows the president to sidestep laws that invade his executive authority. That is why Mr. Bush has issued hundreds of signing statements — more than any previous president — reserving his right not to enforce unconstitutional laws.

A reinvigorated presidency enrages President Bush's critics, who seem to believe that the Constitution created a system of judicial or congressional supremacy. Perhaps this is to be expected of the generation of legislators that views the presidency through the lens of Vietnam and Watergate. But the founders intended that wrongheaded or obsolete legislation and judicial decisions would be checked by presidential action, just as executive overreaching is to be checked by the courts and Congress.

The changes of the 1970's occurred largely because we had no serious national security threats to United States soil, but plenty of paranoia in the wake of Richard Nixon's use of national security agencies to spy on political opponents. Congress enacted the War Powers Resolution, which purports to cut off presidential uses of force abroad after 60 days. It passed the Budget and Impoundment Act to eliminate the modest presidential power to rein in wasteful spending. The Foreign Intelligence and Surveillance Act required the government to get a warrant from a special court to conduct wiretapping for national security reasons.

These statutes have produced little but dysfunction, from flouting of the war powers law, to ever-higher pork barrel spending, to the wall between intelligence and law enforcement that contributed to our failure to stop the 9/11 attacks.

The 1970's shifted power from the president to Congress, and the latter proved a far more accommodating boss to federal agencies looking for budget dollars — a fragmented legislature is obviously much easier to game than a chief executive. But 535 members of Congress cannot manage day-to-day policy. A legislature's function is to draft the laws of the land, set broad goals and spend taxpayer revenues in the national interest, not to micromanage.

The judiciary, too, has been increasingly assertive over the last three decades. It has shown far less deference to the executive in this war than in past conflicts. This energetic judiciary is partly a response to Congress's bulked-up power; the courts have had to step in to try to repair the problems created by vague laws that try to do too much, that state grandiose goals, while avoiding hard policy choices.

Congress's vague legal mandates are handed off to the states or the agencies or the courts to sort out. Our legislators rarely turn their attention to the problems created by laws that are old and obsolete, or of dubious relevance to new issues. (This is why the Hamdan decision was less a rebuke of the presidency than a sign of frustration with Congress's failure to update our laws to deal with the terrorist menace.)

Unfortunately, much of the public misunderstands the true role of the executive branch — in large part because today's culture transforms presidents into celebrities. On TV, a president's every move seems central to the universe, so he has the image of power that far exceeds the reality. But as the presidential scholar Richard Neustadt, a liberal icon, argued, the presidency is inherently weak, while mythic things are expected of and attributed to it — like maintaining national security and economic growth.

Today many pundits and political scientists seem to want the president's power to be the sum of his communication and political skills, his organizational ability, his cognitive style and emotional intelligence. It is almost as if any president who uses the constitutional powers allocated to his office to effect policy has failed, not succeeded.

But the presidency, unlike Congress, is the only office elected by and accountable to the nation as a whole. The president has better access to expertise from the unified executive branch — including its top secret data — than the more ad hoc information Congress develops through hearings and investigations.

That is why, while jealous of its prerogatives, Congress usually goes along with a president's policy decisions. A strong executive can accept responsibility for difficult choices that Congress wants to avoid. The Republican Congress, for instance, wanted to give President Bill Clinton a line-item veto, only to be blocked by the Supreme Court. Despite hearings and criticism of the energetic executive, Congress has yet to pass laws reining in Mr. Bush very much.

DOJ_NMG_0064887

Congress has for years been avoiding its duty to revamp or repeal outmoded parts of bygone laws in the light of contemporary threats. We have needed energy in the executive branch to fill in that gap. Congress now must act to guide our counterterror policy, but it should not try to micromanage the executive branch, particularly in war, where flexibility of action is paramount.

Bush Untethered (NYT)

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

Watching the president on Friday in the Rose Garden as he threatened to quit interrogating terrorists if Congress did not approve his detainee bill, we were struck by how often he acts as though there were not two sides to a debate. We have lost count of the number of times he has said Americans have to choose between protecting the nation precisely the way he wants, and not protecting it at all.

On Friday, President Bush posed a choice between ignoring the law on wiretaps, and simply not keeping tabs on terrorists. Then he said the United States could rewrite the Geneva Conventions, or just stop questioning terrorists. To some degree, he is following a script for the elections: terrify Americans into voting Republican. But behind that seems to be a deeply seated conviction that under his leadership, America is right and does not need the discipline of rules. He does not seem to understand that the rules are what makes this nation as good as it can be.

The debate over prisoners is not about whether some field agent can dunk Osama bin Laden's head to learn the location of the ticking bomb, as one senator suggested last week. It is about whether the United States can confront terrorism without shredding our democratic heritage. This nation is built on the notion that the rules restrain our behavior, because we know we're fallible. Just look at the hundreds of men in Guantánamo Bay, many guilty of nothing, facing unending detention because Mr. Bush did not want to follow the rules after 9/11.

Now Mr. Bush insists that in cleaning up his mess, Congress should exempt C.I.A. interrogators from the Geneva Conventions. "The bottom line is simple: If Congress passes a law that does not clarify the rules — if they do not do that — the program's not going forward," Mr. Bush said. But clarity is not the issue. The Geneva Conventions are clear and provide ample room for interrogating terrorists. Similarly, in the debate over eavesdropping on terrorists' conversations, Mr. Bush says that if he has to get a warrant, he can't do it at all. Actually, he has ample authority to eavesdrop on terrorists, under the very law he is breaking, the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Senator Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat who is on the Senate Intelligence Committee, says that after being briefed on the wiretapping, she concluded that "this surveillance can be done, without sacrifice to our national security," within the law. She has introduced a bill to affirm FISA's control over all wiretapping. It would also give the authorities far more flexibility to listen first and get a warrant later when it's really urgent. But the only bill Mr. Bush wants is a co-production of Vice President Dick Cheney and Arlen Specter, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, that gives the president more room to ignore FISA and chokes off any court challenges.

The best thing Congress could do for America right now is to drop this issue and let the courts decide the matter. Mr. Bush can't claim urgency; it's not as though he has stopped the wiretapping.

Legislation is needed on the prisoner issue, although not as urgently as Mr. Bush says. Three Republican senators, John McCain, John Warner, and Lindsey Graham, have a bill that is far better than the White House version but it, too, has some huge flaws that will take time to fix. It will be hard in an election year, but if the Republicans stand firm, and Democrats insist on the needed changes, they might just require Mr. Bush to recognize that he is subject to the same restraints that applied to every other president of this nation of laws.

A License To Abuse (WP)

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Mr. Bush says he has "one question" for Congress. The right answer to it is "no."

PRESIDENT BUSH made crystal clear Friday that he has one overriding concern about the legislation on foreign detainees before Congress. His "one test," he said, was whether Congress would authorize what he repeatedly called "the program" -- that is, the CIA's network of secret prisons and its brutal treatment of the people in them. "Congress has got a decision to make," Mr. Bush declared during a news conference. "Do you want the program to go forward or not?"

That is indeed the most important question before Congress and the nation. So allow us to elaborate, again, exactly what Mr. Bush means by "the program." He's talking about the practice of sequestering terrorist suspects indefinitely and without charge in secret foreign locations and holding them incommunicado even from the International Red Cross. Until recently, such "disappearances" were the signature of Third World dictatorships. U.S. adoption of them has roiled relations with our closest European allies and impeded collaboration with foreign police and intelligence services.

Mr. Bush also wants the CIA to be able to treat its detainees to such practices as "cold cell," or induced hypothermia, in which detainees are held naked in near-freezing temperatures and repeatedly doused with water; "long standing," in which prisoners are handcuffed in an uncomfortable standing position and forced to remain there for up to 40 hours; and prolonged sleep deprivation.

Throughout the world and for decades, such practices have been called torture. That's what the United States called them when they were used by the Soviet KGB. As the president himself tacitly acknowledges, they violate Geneva and other international conventions as well as current U.S. law. News that the United States has used these techniques -- as well as waterboarding, an ancient torture technique that simulates drowning -- has gravely damaged U.S. standing in the world and the fight against terrorism. It increases the danger that captured U.S. servicemen will be exposed to similar treatment by nations that might otherwise feel obliged to respect the Geneva standards.

When Mr. Bush was asked Friday whether he wasn't in effect seeking sanction for torture, he responded with an evasion. He claimed that the Geneva Conventions' Common Article 3 is "very vague" and that his proposal would provide "clarity" for CIA professionals. In fact, the opposite is true.

Common Article 3, which prohibits cruel treatment and humiliation, is an inflexible standard. The U.S. military, which lived with it comfortably for decades before the Bush administration, just reembraced it after a prolonged battle with the White House. The Army issued a thick manual this month that tells interrogators exactly what they can and cannot do in complying with the standard. The nation's most respected military leaders have said that they need and want nothing more to accomplish the mission of detaining and interrogating enemy prisoners -- and that harsher methods would be counterproductive.

Mr. Bush wants to replace these clear rules with a flexible and subjective standard -- one that would legalize any method that does not "shock the conscience." What shocks the conscience? According to Mr. Bush's Justice Department, the torture techniques described above -- and at least in the past, waterboarding -- do not, "in certain circumstances." So Mr. Bush's real objection to Common Article 3 is not that it is vague. It is that it will not permit abusive practices that he isn't willing publicly to discuss or defend.

Rather than admit that he wants to legalize disappearances and torture, Mr. Bush ominously warns that "the program" won't continue unless Congress passes his bill. He says "time's running out," even though it's not. There are no detainees in the CIA prisons at the moment, according to the president, and the only clock running out is that measuring the midterm election campaign. There is no need for Congress to act in the next two weeks. But if it does, the clear answer to Mr. Bush's question, endorsed by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), former secretary of state Colin L. Powell and a host of other responsible Republican and military leaders, is "no." For both moral and practical reasons, the country should reject this fundamental violation of its principles.

No Rubber Stamp For Bush (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

The president deserves even more resistance to his method of waging war on terror.

PRESIDENT BUSH MADE FULL USE of the 9/11 anniversary last week. In his speeches and remarks, he reminded the nation of the stakes involved in what he calls the war on terror, and he conveyed a renewed sense of urgency to prevent attacks and bring those responsible for 9/11 to justice. Yet if his goal was also to pressure Congress into acting as a rubber stamp for the administration's questionable legal tactics in conducting this war, it was a disappointing week for the president — and a heartening one for anyone outside the White House.

On the treatment of detainees, the president has been especially disingenuous. He has never been a fan of international law, so it's absurd for him to pretend to want to "clarify" the Geneva Convention. What he clearly wants to do is gut the treaty's humanitarian protections for wartime detainees, with an eye toward retroactively legitimizing abusive CIA interrogation tactics used on terrorism suspects.

In what has to be considered one of the high points of this so-called war on terror — if one considers democracy and the rule of law among the prime targets of "terror"— last week prominent Republicans blocked the White House's cynical move.

Backed by Colin L. Powell, former secretary of State and former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, four Republican senators — John McCain of Arizona, Susan Collins of Maine, John W. Warner of Virginia and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina — joined the 11 Democrats on the Senate Armed Services Committee in rejecting the White House's proposal to weaken detainees' protections in the judicial process. Legislation authorizing military tribunals to try terror suspects was mandated by June's Supreme Court ruling invalidating the White House's attempts to create the tribunals, and their rules, on its own.

The committee transcended partisanship to protect not only constitutional norms but the interests of U.S. troops who may be detained overseas in the course of active duty. How would you like to be a prisoner of war in a world in which the U.S. government is encouraging others to "clarify" the Geneva Convention to serve their own purposes?

At issue is the Convention's Common Article 3, drafted in 1949, barring "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment." The administration considers this language inconveniently vague and would like to tinker with it to legalize an "alternative set of procedures" employed by CIA operatives in secret facilities.

The bill passed by the Senate committee doesn't reinterpret the Convention, and it preserves some important procedural guarantees that the White House would deny its military commissions — including the right of defendants to confront the evidence against them. Bush was flustered that Senate Republicans hadn't fallen into line. In his news conference Friday morning, the president said: "The intelligence community must be able to tell me that the bill Congress sends to my desk will allow this vital program to continue. That's what I'm going to ask."

On another front in the nation's war on terror and the administration's war to expand executive powers, the Senate Judiciary Committee took up the issue of how to bring the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping of Americans under legal control. And on this matter, like small children at a birthday party, everyone was a winner last week.

The committee approved a bill by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) that would essentially legalize what the Bush administration has been doing outside the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. But the committee also approved two other bills — one by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) that would allow a secret court to rule on the constitutionality of what Bush calls the Terrorist Surveillance Program, and another by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) that would reiterate that FISA governs all domestic electronic surveillance while making it easier for the NSA to act without a court order in a terrorist emergency.

Instead of hedging its bets, the committee should have approved the Feinstein bill and discarded the others.

Some defenders of the spying program have hinted that it cannot be pursued under FISA because its courts deal with permission to listen in on the conversations of individuals, as opposed to "data mining" of telephone and e-mail records that might throw up hundreds or thousands of exchanges or e-mail addresses. It is also argued that the FISA approval process is too sluggish — something that can be remedied by more permissive procedures for emergencies. The Bush administration has only itself to blame if there is confusion about what exactly the NSA is doing and why it cannot be squared with FISA. Feinstein, who as a member of the Intelligence Committee is privy to details about the NSA program that are denied the rest of us, is confident that it can continue to operate under a modification of the FISA scheme. If she is wrong, the administration has not made the case.

All three bills that emerged from the Senate Judiciary Committee acknowledge what the administration is loath to admit: that Congress was improperly excluded from the design and implementation of this spying program. But the Specter bill gives too much to the president and limits the role of the FISA court to a "program-wide" determination of the program's constitutionality. The DeWine bill, while providing for congressional oversight, is also too deferential to the president.

Whether the issue is NSA spying or the application of the Geneva Convention to the interrogation of suspected terrorists, the administration makes the same argument: "Trust us." This is not healthy.

As Powell wrote in a letter to McCain, speaking in support of the Geneva Convention, "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." No matter how grave the challenges the nation faces, those doubts spread every day that Bush refuses to accept that there are checks and balances on his power.

The View From Guantánamo (NYT)

By Abu Bakker Qassim

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

Tirana, Albania

I HAVE been greatly saddened to hear that the Congress of the United States, a country I deeply admire, is considering new laws that would deny prisoners at Guantánamo Bay the right to challenge their detentions in federal court.

I learned my respect for American institutions the hard way. When I was growing up as a Uighur in China, there were no independent courts to review the imprisonment and oppression of people who, like me, peacefully opposed the Communists. But I learned my hardest lesson from the United States: I spent four long years behind the razor wire of its prison in Cuba.

I was locked up and mistreated for being in the wrong place at the wrong time during America's war in Afghanistan. Like hundreds of Guantánamo detainees, I was never a terrorist or a soldier. I was never even on a battlefield. Pakistani bounty hunters sold me and 17 other Uighurs to the United States military like animals for $5,000 a head. The Americans made a terrible mistake.

It was only the country's centuries-old commitment to allowing habeas corpus challenges that put that mistake right — or began to. In May, on the eve of a court hearing in my case, the military relented, and I was sent to Albania along with four other Uighurs. But 12 of my Uighur brothers remain in Guantánamo today. Will they be stranded there forever?

Without my American lawyers and habeas corpus, my situation and that of the other Uighurs would still be a secret. I would be sitting in a metal cage today. Habeas corpus helped me to tell the world that Uighurs are not a threat to the United States or the West, but an ally. Habeas corpus cleared my name — and most important, it let my family know that I was still alive.

Like my fellow Uighurs, I am a great admirer of the American legal and political systems. I have the utmost respect for the United States Congress. So I respectfully ask American lawmakers to protect habeas corpus and let justice prevail. Continuing to permit habeas rights to the detainees in Guantánamo will not set the guilty free. It will prove to the world that American democracy is safe and well.

I am from East Turkestan on the northwest edge of China. Communist China cynically calls my homeland "Xinjiang," which means "new dominion" or "new frontier." My people want only to be treated with respect and dignity. But China uses the American war on terrorism as a pretext to punish those who peacefully dissent from its oppressive policies. They brand as "terrorism" all political opposition from the Uighurs.

Amnesty International reports that East Turkistan is the only province in China where people may face the death penalty for political offenses. Chinese leaders brag about the number of Uighur political prisoners shot in the head. I was punished for speaking against China's unjust policies, and I left because of the threat to my life. My search for work and refuge took me from Kyrgyzstan to Afghanistan and Pakistan.

I heard about the Sept. 11 attacks for the first time in Guantánamo. I was not aware of their magnitude until after my release, when a reporter showed me images online at an Internet cafe in Tirana. It was a terrible thing. But I too was its victim. I would never have experienced the ordeal and humiliation of Guantánamo if this horrific event had not taken place.

I feel great sadness for the families who lost their loved ones on that horrible day five years ago. And I would be sadder still to see the freedom-loving American people walk away from their respect for the rule of law. I want America to be a strong and respected nation in the world. Only then can it continue to be the source of hope for the hopeless — like my people.

Yemen Arrests Militants Accused In Plot (AP)

By Donna Abu-nasr

AP, September 17, 2006

Four suspected al-Qaida members who were plotting attacks for Yemen's capital were arrested Saturday, a day after security forces foiled near-simultaneous attempts to blow up two oil installations, authorities said.

Interior Minister Rashad Rashad al-Eleimi said the suspects had links to the four suicide bombers who tried to strike the oil installations Friday but were killed during the attacks.

Security forces confiscated 12 bags each containing about 88 to 110 pounds of highly explosive material Saturday as well as masks and women's clothing, which militants sometimes use to disguise themselves, al-Eleimi said.

He said the four arrested men planned to stage attacks on Yemeni and foreign targets in San`a but did not provide any details.

The arrests were made Saturday morning after an hours-long standoff that began Friday night when security forces surrounded the militants. The interior minister said the alleged militants opened fire but no one was hurt.

"We are certain that this cell has links with the al-Qaida network and with those who carried out the attacks in Mareb and Hadarmut," al-Eleimi told reporters, referring to the areas targeted Friday.

The violence coincided with an election campaign in which President Ali Abdullah Saleh, facing his first real challenge since he became head of state in 1978, has been reaching out to the country's fundamentalist Islamic movement.

Saleh offered a $26,000 reward Saturday for information leading to the arrest of terrorists in Yemen. He said the money would go to anyone "who gives information about or arrests a wanted terrorist," according to the official SABA news agency.

On Friday, four suicide bombers tried to attack a refinery in Mareb and an oil storage facility in Hadarmut but failed. They were killed when their cars blew up in an exchange of fire with security forces.

Al-Eleimi said the vehicles that blew up were loaded with up to 10 gas canisters each as well as explosives.

He said the attacks Friday and the alleged militants arrested Saturday were linked to a videotape aired Monday of al-Qaida's No. 2 leader, Ayman al-Zawahri, threatening attacks in the Persian Gulf region and on facilities he accused of stealing Muslim oil.

"There is no doubt that there are sleepers cells" in Yemen, al-Eleimi said.

Al-Qaida has an active presence in Yemen, the ancestral home of Osama bin Laden, despite government efforts to fight the network. The group was blamed for the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole in Aden that killed 17 American sailors and the attack on a French oil tanker that killed one person two years later.

There have been fears of an al-Qaida attack in Yemen since 23 members of the terror network tunneled out of a Yemeni jail in February with help from prison guards. Fourteen prisoners remain at large.

DOJ_NMG_0064891

After the Cole bombing and the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States, the West began pressuring Yemen to join the war against terror groups. Saleh has launched several crackdowns against extremists, winning praise from the United States.

Tribesmen Use Captives To Pressure Yemen (AP)

By Donna Abu-nasr

AP, September 17, 2006

When a French hostage mentioned to Yemeni kidnappers this week that he needed his blood pressure medication, they retrieved it for him.

The word "hostage" these days conjures images of gaunt men and women pleading for their lives, but captives in Yemen get hospitality.

While militants in places like Iraq hold and sometimes murder prisoners, Yemini tribes take hostages to pressure the government for relatively simple demands, such as freeing clan members from jail or improving roads, hospitals and schools.

The tribes have been doing it for years, and they believe the traditions of Arab hospitality dictate that their hostages be treated well.

"The four French hostages are honored guests, and we try to make sure they lack for nothing," said Almulla Zabara, a leader in the Al-Abdullah tribe that seized the four men and their Yemeni translator a week ago.

The abductors are demanding the release of some fellow tribesmen imprisoned by the government of this nation on the southwestern corner of the Saudi Arabian peninsula.

Although there aren't any recent figures, according to government officials and media reports, as many as 325 people were kidnapped in Yemen between 1991 and 2001. They included 91 French, 80 Germans, 37 Britons, 23 Americans and 22 Dutch.

Until 1998, all the captives were released unharmed. But late that year, four tourists grabbed in the first kidnapping by a Muslim extremist group rather than a tribe died during a botched rescue attempt by Yemeni security forces.

Zabara's assertion that tribal hostages are treated well is supported by the accounts of former detainees, who tell of sightseeing trips, parting gifts of pendants, incense or traditional curved daggers, wine served with dinner despite a ban on liquor and afternoons spent shooting — a popular sport among tribesmen.

In one case, the captors of American diplomat Haynes Mahoney were so concerned his captivity be comfortable that they tailed him to a supermarket to find out his food preferences and bought the items he had shopped for before kidnapping him in 1993.

Jean-Jack Abassin, a retired French nuclear engineer who was snatched in 1996, described the conditions of the four days he spent as a hostage as "very nice" and said he sent copies of pictures he took during captivity to his kidnappers.

Abassin and his wife, Monique, were on the final day of a two-week group tour when their group of 17 French citizens was taken hostage by 15 tribesmen armed with Kalashnikov assault rifles.

"It was the month of Ramadan, so they weren't eating themselves, but they prepared typical meals from the region — rice and chicken — for us," Abassin told The Associated Press from his home in Beviers, France. "At first we had to eat with our fingers, like they do, but later they gave us spoons."

He said the tribesmen also took the group sightseeing, showing them archaeological sites and ruins that the Frenchman believes had "never before been seen by Westerners."

Patrizia Rossi, one of four Italians kidnapped last January, told AP that when the group was snatched, "We got into a panic with those machine guns pointed at us."

"The kidnappers did not speak any language we knew so we couldn't communicate," she said, speaking from her home in Basiglio, Italy.

But they felt more at ease over the days as the tribesmen repeatedly reassured them that they would be released, she added. The kidnappers were trying to secure the freedom of jailed members of the al-Zaydi tribe, they told the Italians.

The hostages were given bread, rice, lamb and tea, and were even offered khat, a leaf that is a mild stimulant chewed by many Yemenis every afternoon, Rossi recalled. She said one kidnapper gave her a pendant as a gift.

Although hostages have been treated well, some were terrified to be held in remote hideouts filled with weapons.

Fabian Chrobog, who works at an investment firm in London, was kidnapped along with his family in December and held for four days.

In an account he wrote for AP, Chrobog, the son of former German Deputy Foreign Minister Juergen Chrobog, said the tribesmen demanded the release of five jailed members of their clan.

"These men weren't terrorists — they were goat herders and honey producers," he wrote. "But even when they treat you nicely, when you're in an environment with that many guns and 12-year-olds who carry Kalashnikovs, you're not safe."

DOJ_NMG_0064892

When the Chrobogs were released, the captors expected their five fellow tribesmen to be freed. But they weren't, and the tribesmen who kidnapped the four French tourists Sept. 10 are seeking the release of the same prisoners.

Zabara insisted the Frenchmen were safe and said his tribesmen would protect them if the government tried to use force to free them.

Interior Minister Rashad al-Eleimi said at a news conference Saturday that the hostages were "in excellent health" and that the government would use peaceful means to secure their release.

Defining Today's Moderate Muslim (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Who is a moderate Muslim?

Is it Maher Hathout, the Los Angeles Muslim leader who has promoted interfaith relations and women's equality but denounced Israel as a brutal apartheid regime?

Is it Tashbih Sayyed, a journalist based in Alta Loma, Calif., who praises Israel's behavior toward Palestinians as tolerant and criticizes Muslims for corrupting Islam?

The question has come under intense debate since 9/11 as the public struggles to distinguish peaceful Muslims from Al Qaeda terrorists, and is at the heart of two Southern California skirmishes over who represents moderate Islam.

In a dinner scheduled for tonight, the American Jewish Congress plans to honor Sayyed and four others for what it sees as their friendly attitudes toward Israel and courageous efforts to reform Islam.

Gary Ratner, executive director of the Congress' Western region office in Los Angeles, said the tribute is part of the organization's global efforts to reach out to moderate Muslims in Pakistan, Indonesia, Albania and elsewhere, including sponsoring a dinner in New York last year for Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf.

"Israel is going to be a fixture in the Mideast," Ratner said. "If there is ever going to be peace, there has to be accommodation with Muslims."

The organization's choice of honorees, however, has offended some Muslims, in part because three of them no longer practice the faith.

In contrast, a different award has offended some Jewish sensibilities: the decision by the Los Angeles County Human Relations Commission to honor Hathout as a model of harmonious interfaith relations.

Hathout's critics argue that his controversial statements supporting Hezbollah and denouncing Israel have exposed him as an extremist. The Egyptian native and retired cardiologist, saying his opponents have twisted his record, asserts that he has long condemned terrorism, launched interfaith dialogues and promoted an American Islamic identity that celebrates pluralism, democracy and women's rights.

The commission is to vote Monday on whether to reaffirm or rescind the award.

Despite the dissent, Muslims, Christians and Jews named similar attributes when asked to define religious moderation. They included problem-solving without violence, affirmation of human rights, religious freedom and other Western values, and respectful attitudes toward women.

But on one key issue, there was sharp disagreement: attitudes toward Israel.

Ratner said his group believes support for Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state is central to the definition of a moderate because it speaks to the larger qualities of tolerance and acceptance.

Others, however, reject that as a litmus test.

"It's un-American," said John Esposito, Georgetown University professor of religion and international affairs. "Your principal and only obligation in terms of loyalty as an American is to America. You can have a variety of positions regarding foreign policy."

Still others say labels and litmus tests aren't terribly useful for either side.

"The question is … can we find points of agreement, a place from which to build trust and move forward?" asked Rob Eshman, editor of the Jewish Journal of Greater Los Angeles. "I deal with Jews every day whom I don't consider moderate, but I don't write them off. And we can't afford to write off Muslims."

Since 9/11, Esposito and others said, the quest for moderate Muslims has become widespread as policymakers, journalists, terrorism experts and religious leaders seek to understand Islam and assess who is "safe" and who is extremist.

Often, those seeking moderate Muslims are looking for people to affirm their own values, said Reuven Firestone, a professor of medieval Jewish and Islamic studies at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0064893

"When we say we want moderate Muslims, what we are really saying is that we want Westernized Muslims who have the same kinds of sensibilities we have," Firestone said. "But that's not realistic. It's a false but human assumption that moderates must agree with us on most issues."

To Firestone, moderates are those committed to settling disputes without violence and willing to hear and consider other points of view, especially those contrary to their own.

Others said that whatever yardstick is chosen must be consistently applied. If Muslims who condemn Israeli treatment of Palestinians are extremists, all Christians, Jews and atheists who feel likewise must be similarly described, said Khaled Abou El Fadl, a UCLA Islamic law professor and author of "The Great Theft: Wrestling Islam from the Extremists."

Many said a key criterion for Muslim moderates is that they in fact be Muslim.

Among the Jewish Congress honorees are Indian-born British author Salman Rushdie, a self-described atheist, and two women who say they left the faith years ago, Wafa Sultan and Nonie Darwish.

Darwish is a Southern California writer and founder of Arabs for Israel. Sultan is a Corona psychiatrist, writer and activist who has said she is particularly concerned about women's status in Islam.

"By honoring Muslims who are not practicing Muslims, the given message, even if unintentional, is that these people are good because they left the faith," said Firestone, who recently returned from a six-month sabbatical in Cairo. "But there are hundreds of millions of moral, deeply believing Muslims."

Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, said Jewish groups have long tried to promote alternative Islamic leaders who may be friendly to Israel but in fact have little following among Muslims. "It's a slap in the face," he said.

But Ratner defended the selections.

"To me it's a phonetic debate," he said, referring to whether the awardees were practicing Muslims or not. "It's about the reform of Islam so that the Muslim world and the West can live in peace and tolerance with each other's values and beliefs."

Two of the honorees say they are practicing Muslims deeply concerned about their tradition's future and are unafraid to speak about it. Both Salim Mansur, a Calcutta native and Canadian political science professor, and Sayyed, the newspaper editor, said the Muslim world must stop blaming the West for its own ailments, including poverty, illiteracy, injustice or extremism.

Sayyed, 64, immigrated to the United States in 1981 to escape what he described as an increasingly radical practice of Islam in Pakistan. He said Muslims must reinvigorate their tradition with open debate even on sensitive questions. That includes, he said, whether Islam was spread by the sword or ideas, whether shariah is an outdated legal system for Muslims and whether the Prophet Muhammad's actions were all divinely inspired.

But when he wrote an article last year calling for Islam's reinterpretation, Sayyed said, he was widely condemned and threatened by fellow Muslims.

Mansur, too, said he was ostracized after writing columns for the Toronto Sun five years ago condemning the Taliban's destruction of ancient Buddhist statues in Afghanistan and comparing it to the murderous Khmer Rouge of Cambodia. The backlash prompted him to stop going to his local mosque.

Both men, however, said they have no intention of falling silent.

"Because I love my faith, I have to raise my voice and challenge it from within," Sayyed said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Spy Agencies Outsourcing To Fill Key Jobs (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Contractors, many of them former employees, are doing sensitive work, such as handling agents. A review of the practice has been ordered.

WASHINGTON — At the National Counterterrorism Center — the agency created two years ago to prevent another attack like Sept. 11 — more than half of the employees are not U.S. government analysts or terrorism experts. Instead, they are outside contractors.

At CIA headquarters in Langley, Va., senior officials say it is routine for career officers to look around the table during meetings on secret operations and be surrounded by so-called green-badgers — nonagency employees who carry special-colored IDs.

DOJ_NMG_0064894

Some of the work being outsourced is extremely sensitive. Abraxas Corp., a private company in McLean, Va., founded by a group of CIA veterans, devises "covers," or false identities, for an elite group of overseas case officers, according to current and former U.S. intelligence officials familiar with the arrangement.

Contractors also are turning up in increasing numbers in clandestine facilities around the world. At the CIA station in Islamabad, Pakistan, as many as three-quarters of those on hand since the Sept. 11 attacks have been contractors. In Baghdad, site of the agency's largest overseas presence, contractors have at times outnumbered full-time CIA employees, according to officials who have held senior positions in the station.

The post-9/11 period has brought sweeping changes to the U.S. intelligence community. Spy budgets have swelled by more than $10 billion a year, and agencies have seen their roles and authorities altered by legislation.

Largely because of the demands of the war on terrorism and the drawn-out conflict in Iraq, U.S. spy agencies have turned to unprecedented numbers of outside contractors to perform jobs once the domain of government-employed analysts and secret agents.

The proliferation of contractors has outstripped the intelligence community's ability to keep track of them.

Former intelligence officials said most U.S. spy agencies did not have even approximate counts of the numbers of contractors they were employing — although several officials said the number at the CIA had nearly doubled in the last five years and now surpassed the full-time workforce of about 17,500. Often, the contract employees had previous ties to the agencies.

Concerned by the lack of data and direction, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte this year ordered a comprehensive study of the use of contractors.

Ronald Sanders, a senior intelligence official in charge of the examination, said that all 16 U.S. intelligence agencies had been instructed to turn over records on contractors, and that one focus of the study would be whether outsourcing highly sensitive jobs was appropriate.

"We have to come to some conclusion about what our core intelligence mission is and how many [full-time employees] it's going to take to accomplish that mission," Sanders said, adding that the growth in contracting over the last five years had been driven by necessity and was extremely haphazard.

"I wish I could tell you it's by design," he said. "But I think it's been by default."

Senior U.S. intelligence officials said that the reliance on contractors was so deep that agencies couldn't function without them.

"If you took away the contractor support, they'd have to put yellow tape around the building and close it down," said a former senior CIA official who was responsible for overseeing contracts before leaving the agency earlier this year.

This former official and more than a dozen other current and former U.S. intelligence officials interviewed for this story spoke on condition of anonymity because of the classified nature of intelligence contracting work.

The use of outside firms has enabled spy agencies to tap a deep reservoir of talent during a period of unprecedented demand. Many of those hired have been retired case officers and analysts who were eager to contribute to the response to the Sept. 11 attacks and who have more expertise and operational experience than agency insiders. In fact, the CIA has created its own roster of retired case officers — known as the "cadre" — who are eligible to be hired as independent contractors for temporary assignments.

Even so, the trend has alarmed some intelligence professionals, who are concerned that using contractors to do spying work carries security risks and higher costs. They point to soaring profits being made by contracting firms, and a parade of veteran officers who have left intelligence agencies only to return with green badges and higher salaries.

Even those quick to praise the contributions of contractors express discomfort with the mercenary aspect of modern intelligence work.

"There's a commercial side to it that I frankly don't like," said James L. Pavitt, who retired in 2004 as head of the CIA's clandestine service. "I would much prefer to see staff case officers who are in the chain of command and making a day-in and day-out conscious decision as civil servants in the intelligence business."

The CIA declined to comment on specific contracts but defended the use of contractors for intelligence work.

"Contractors give the agency enormous flexibility and are an important part of our workforce," said Paul Gimigliano, a spokesman for the CIA. "As partners, they help us build or enhance specific capabilities we need for a finite period."

U.S. intelligence agencies have used contractors for decades. Corporate giants such as Lockheed Martin Corp. have long competed for classified contracts to build spy planes and satellites. Spy services routinely use private companies to handle support functions, such as providing security or building classified computer networks.

In fact, two-thirds of the contractors at the counter-terrorism center are information technology workers who manage computer systems. And independent contractors have at times played significant roles in overseas operations, including pilots who flew clandestine supply runs for the CIA in Vietnam.

But current and former officials said spy agencies now depended on contractors to a greater extent than ever envisioned to carry out their basic spying missions.

The trend is particularly pronounced at the CIA. Whereas other intelligence agencies can take advantage of employees detailed to them from branches of the military, the CIA is more dependent on a civilian workforce.

The CIA has been hiring at a record pace in recent years. But it takes years to train new case officers, let alone to develop seasoned operatives capable of delicate missions in global hot spots. The agency has also turned to contractors to plug deep holes left by staff cuts and hiring freezes in the 1990s.

Meanwhile, new intelligence entities created to fix Sept. 11-related failures — including the intelligence director's office and centers tracking terrorism and weapons proliferation — have created thousands of new positions and cannibalized the ranks of the CIA and other agencies.

One former senior CIA official said the agency had outsourced an array of core jobs in its own counter-terrorism center, including the task of posting names of new terrorism suspects to immigration and law enforcement watch lists.

And despite restrictions that bar contractors from holding positions of authority over agency personnel, current and former U.S. intelligence officials said that contractors functioned as de facto team leaders in numerous stations around the world, and routinely handled clandestine meetings with CIA sources.

In Baghdad, contractors "do everything, especially 'ops' work," a former CIA officer who has served extensively in Iraq said of the operations functions. "They're recruiting [informants], managing the major relationships we have with the military, handling agents in support of frontline combat units. The guys doing that work are contractors. They're not staff officers."

Contractors have played similarly significant roles in Afghanistan. Gary C. Schroen, who was among the first CIA employees to enter the country after the Sept. 11 attacks, continued to travel to Pakistan and Afghanistan after retiring and going to work as a CIA contractor. Among his assignments was to monitor relationships with regional warlords as well as the head of the Afghan government's intelligence service.

There are other restrictions on contract employees. At the CIA, contractors cannot disburse money or handle personnel matters such as filling out employee evaluation forms. For high-ranking officials who leave, there are other restrictions, including a required "cool down" period of one year during which they are barred from returning to the agency to solicit business.

But former CIA leaders are in high demand and frequently serve as officers in companies that have contracts with their former agencies.

John Brennan, for example, retired last year as head of the National Counterterrorism Center and is now chief executive of the Analysis Corp., which supplies contract analysts to the center. In an interview, Brennan said that any contracts with the counter-terrorism center predated his arrival at the Analysis Corp.

Contractors are subject to the same background checks and security clearance requirements as full-time employees, officials said. But some of that clearance work itself has been outsourced, officials said, and even the screening done by the CIA hasn't been infallible.

In one well-known case, David A. Passaro was hired as a contractor with the CIA's paramilitary service even though he had a record of abusive behavior and had been fired by a Connecticut police department. Passaro was convicted of felony assault earlier this year in federal court in North Carolina for his role in the beating of a detainee who died in Afghanistan in 2003.

U.S. intelligence officials said that Passaro's case was an aberration and that security problems had not been more frequent among contractors than among career officers.

In another high-profile case, the CIA inspector general is investigating whether the agency's former No. 3 official, Kyle Dustin "Dusty" Foggo, improperly accepted expensive vacations and other rewards for awarding CIA contracts to a lifelong friend who is linked to the bribery scandal surrounding ex-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

Some officials fear that the growth in contracting is fueling a so-called spy drain, in which talented officers are being lured to the private sector by firms offering pay increases of 50% or more.

At the CIA, poaching became such a problem that former Director Porter J. Goss had to warn several firms to stop recruiting employees in the agency cafeteria, according to former officials familiar with the matter. One recently retired case officer said he had been approached twice while in line for coffee.

"It's like sharks in the water," said the officer, an overseas veteran who has handled assignments in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East. "As soon as the word went around that I was leaving, my e-mail in-box was pinging. People were calling me at home."

Sanders, the official in Negroponte's office, said it was unclear whether the spy drain problem was real. Anecdotal evidence suggests that some officers are leaving early, he said, but attrition rates have not risen in recent years.

Another worry is that the reliance on contractors is eroding agency budgets. Sanders said a recent personnel study by the Senate Intelligence Committee found that contractors were typically paid 50% to 100% more than staff officers to perform comparable work — a disparity that can create internal tensions.

"It's a serious morale problem when you've got a guy in the field making $80,000 and a contractor making $150,000," said the former case officer who served in Iraq. "And the [staff employee] is supposed to supervise the guy making twice the money."

The spike in the use of contractors is likely to diminish as the bumper crop of recruits at the CIA and other agencies rises through the ranks. However, officials said that was a process that would take years.

A Bold Upstart With CIA Roots (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Fast-growing Abraxas Corp. was founded after 9/11 by agency veterans. But some fear security risks in such work.

WASHINGTON — In the burgeoning field of intelligence contractors, an especially aggressive upstart is Abraxas Corp., a privately held company that has assembled a deep roster of CIA veterans to handle a wide range of clandestine assignments — including secret work for an elite team of overseas case officers.

The company was founded by a group of former high-ranking agency employees, led by Richard "Hollis" Helms, a longtime overseas officer in the Middle East and onetime head of the CIA's European division, and Richard Calder, who was the agency's deputy director for administration.

In a radio interview last year, Calder said the firm was launched shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks by a group of retirees who felt spurned that the agency had not called to enlist their help. "We were all eager to do whatever we could do," Calder said. But, he said, "the phone never rang." Company officials did not respond to repeated requests for comment.

The company occupies an unmarked, third-floor office suite in McLean, Va., two miles from CIA headquarters. It has mainly specialized in providing veteran operatives and reports officers for positions in overseas stations and at CIA headquarters.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, "they went and signed up all these retired, Arabic-speaking officers and sold them back to the agency on contract," said a former CIA official familiar with the company, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "That's how Abraxas was born."

But Abraxas has also been tapped for unusual assignments. Several former CIA officials said Abraxas had been given a highly classified contract to craft "covers" — false identities and front companies — for the agency's nonofficial cover program.

The NOC program is one of the most sensitive and carefully guarded operations in the CIA. Most overseas case officers work under diplomatic cover, meaning they pose as State Department officials working at U.S. embassies and missions. If they are caught spying, they are typically protected from prosecution by diplomatic immunity.

Officers in the NOC program have no such protections, and therefore operate under substantially greater risk. Major corporations traditionally have cooperated with the CIA to allow case officers to hold positions in overseas branches. But since the Sept. 11 attacks, the CIA has been under increased pressure to devise more imaginative cover arrangements that might give operatives closer access to terrorist networks.

Former CIA officials said that Abraxas had played a leading role in this effort to craft new covers and that the firm had assembled a group of employees with experience in such work. Among them is Fred Turco, former head of the external operations and cover unit, which oversees the NOC program inside the agency.

Several former officials questioned the arrangement, saying that whatever talent Abraxas had assembled, outsourcing any work in such a sensitive program posed an inherent security risk. But others were more sanguine, saying that the CIA's failures to penetrate Al Qaeda and other terrorist groups underscored the need for fresh ideas and a more experimental approach.

"They're going where the expertise lies," said a former senior CIA official, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "It's a good example of them doing what they should be doing."

Abraxas declined to comment. Approached by a reporter outside the company's office, Helms said that speaking publicly about such matters "doesn't serve the public at all and damages the country."

Abraxas is part of a new breed of companies known in intelligence circles as "body shops" because — unlike firms that provide manufacturing, engineering or technical services — they are mainly in the business of supplying bodies for analysis centers, headquarters positions and overseas assignments.

A recent posting on Abraxas' website lists openings for computer programmers and intelligence analysts "for a broad spectrum of clients in and outside the national security arena."

In his radio interview, Calder said Abraxas got as much as 90% of its revenue from government contracts, though it has sought more business from the private sector through new products including computer software.

DOJ_NMG_0064897

Office parks in suburban Virginia are increasingly cluttered with companies like Abraxas, as upstarts such as SpecTal move into territory long dominated by behemoths including Booz Allen Hamilton Inc. and Science Applications International Corp.

But few companies have taken advantage of the surge in contractor spending as adroitly as Abraxas. The company does not publicly report its financial results. But it was recognized last year by the Deloitte & Touche accounting firm as one of the nation's fastest growing young companies, posting revenue growth of 714% over three years.

This year, accounting firm Ernst & Young named Helms its Washington-area entrepreneur of the year.

American Intelligence -- Still Stupid (LAT)

By Amy Zegart, Amy Zegart Is Associate Professor Of Public Policy At Ucla And The Author Of A Forthcoming Book Abou

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

We haven't been attacked since 2001, but don't thank the country's cumbersome, redundant intelligence bureaucracy.

FIVE YEARS AFTER the most devastating terrorist attack in U.S. history, all our worst intelligence deficiencies remain. Intelligence is spread across 16 agencies that operate as warring tribes more than a team. The CIA is in disarray. And the FBI's information technology is stuck in the dark ages.

There are more intelligence agencies to coordinate than ever but still no one in firm charge of them all. In 2004, Congress established the post of director of national intelligence. Rather than integrating intelligence, however, the job's creation has triggered huge turf wars. For the last two years, while the office of the intelligence director has been fighting over who briefs the president and who staffs assignments, the Pentagon has quietly expanded its intelligence activities at home and abroad.

This is bad. Pentagon units now duplicate such intelligence activities as conducting secret counter-terrorism operations, collecting information abroad and monitoring Americans inside the U.S. without warrants, presidential authorizations or meaningful supervision by the director of national intelligence and Congress.

One little-known Pentagon unit, the Counterintelligence Field Activity, began in 2002 to protect U.S. forces from terrorist attacks, but has since grown into a sprawling counter-terrorism agency with wide-ranging duties and authority over 4,000 active and reserve military investigators.

Information sharing among intelligence agencies has improved — but that's not saying much. The poster child of intelligence reform is a new agency called the National Counterterrorism Center, where officials from different agencies sit in the same room and draft collective reports. The center has even developed a classified website that provides synthesized terrorism intelligence for government officials.

Sounds good. But because analysts at the National Counterterrorism Center have varying levels of security clearances and come from different intelligence agencies, they see different pieces of information. Intelligence still isn't shared even when the rules allow it. Information is stored on nearly 30 incompatible networks. To access them all, analysts must use six computers.

"It's a little scary," Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), who sits on the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, said during the confirmation hearing for Gen. Michael Hayden as CIA director. "It's like we have duct-taped our systems together. Surely we can do better than this."

Apparently, Senator, we can't. Information sharing outside the National Counterterrorism Center is worse. In its 2005 report card, the 9/11 commission gave such efforts a "D." A recent study by the Markle Foundation Task Force on national security found that information sharing continued to be hampered by "turf wars and unclear lines of authority," officials who "still cling" to old ways of doing business and a diminishing sense of commitment. The task force concluded that despite dozens of initiatives, guidelines and statutory requirements, "systematic, trusted information sharing remains more of an aspiration than a reality."

That's the good news. The bad news is called the CIA and the FBI.

The CIA's current strategy for penetrating Al Qaeda? More of the same. The agency has been on a hiring binge, tripling the number of clandestine operatives since 2001 rather than improving the quality of its personnel or developing new ways to recruit jihadists who skip the embassy cocktail party circuit. As one former spy put it, hiring 50% more agents without fundamentally changing how they do business just makes you stupid.

Meanwhile, the agency formerly known as Central still struggles to produce big-picture analyses about America's enemies. Last year, a presidential commission chaired by federal Judge Laurence Silberman and former Sen. Charles Robb (D-Va.) concluded that strategic intelligence was bad and worsening. "Across the board," the commission concluded, "the intelligence community knows disturbingly little about the nuclear programs of many of the world's most dangerous actors. In some cases, it knows less now than it did five or 10 years ago."

Ironically, 9/11 has made matters worse, focusing analysts on today's threat list rather than anticipating tomorrow's enemies. Many insiders worry that the CIA has become "CNN with secrets," responding to headlines rather than undertaking more over-the-horizon analysis. Even Hayden warned Congress that unless we get serious about thinking long term, the United States would be "endlessly surprised."

These surprises are not good.

Meanwhile, over at the FBI, Director Robert Mueller told Congress in May that his bureau has "expanded [its] mission, radically overhauled our intelligence programs and capabilities, and … undergone tremendous personnel growth."

I'm not sure what FBI he's talking about. Last year, the Justice Department's inspector general found that FBI analysts — the people who are supposed to connect the dots — spent only half their time actually doing analysis. What were they busy doing instead? Taking out the trash and answering telephones, the same menial tasks they were assigned before 9/11.

It is often said that change takes time. But history is filled with examples in which more was accomplished in less. In 1865, less than five years after the Civil War began, the nation had reunited and abolished slavery. Four years after Japan attacked Pearl Harbor, U.S. forces had crossed two oceans and won the war. The founders managed to draft the Constitution in 100 working days.

Speaking from the Oval Office on Monday night, President Bush delivered his annual 9/11 refrain: We are safer than before.

The president is right about one thing: Five years after 9/11, we have not been attacked. But we should not confuse luck with effectiveness.

5 Years After Terror Of Anthrax, Case Grows Colder (HC)

By Eric Rosenberg

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

Deadly germs in the mail rattled the nation in 2001, but time hasn't yielded many clues

WASHINGTON — Five years after anthrax killed five people and introduced America to high-tech bioterrorism, one of the biggest crime mysteries of our times remains unsolved.

FBI agents and U.S. postal inspectors have pursued hundreds of leads and interviewed scores of scientists who work with the deadly anthrax bacteria, but the investigation now appears to be languishing.

"No matter what anybody says, if it is five years out, and we are not even seeing any smoke from the investigation, then I would say definitely that this case is cold right now," said Christopher Hamilton, a former FBI counter-terrorism official who worked on the anthrax investigation and is now a counter-terrorism expert at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, a non-partisan think tank. "This thing is just sitting out there with nothing happening."

The murders-by-germ in the weeks immediately after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks added to the nation's anxieties and triggered a massive hunt for the perpetrator who used the mail to spread the bacteria.

Hundreds of FBI personnel worked the case at the outset, struggling to discern whether the Sept. 11 al-Qaida attacks and the anthrax murders were connected before eventually concluding that they were not.

A senior law enforcement official familiar with the investigation insisted that "the investigation is still ongoing and intensely active." The official, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly, said there "are a number of pending and very important leads that are being pursued."

There are 23 FBI agents and 12 postal inspectors on the case, dubbed the Amerithrax investigation inside the FBI, he said.

The anthrax investigation began after a Florida photojournalist died on Oct. 5, 2001, from an infection produced by the bacteria. Within days, anthrax-laced letters were uncovered at news outlets in New York City and at the Washington office of Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D., then the top Democrat in the Senate. In November, anthrax turned up in a letter sent to Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

The letters contained similar handwritten notes. The letter to Leahy read: "You cannot stop us. We have the anthrax. You die now. Are you afraid? Death to America. Death to Israel. Allah is great."

In addition to the Florida victim, two U.S. postal workers in Washington, a New York hospital worker and an elderly Connecticut woman died from anthrax-borne infections.

The federal government reacted by shutting some congressional offices and the Supreme Court building, while postal facilities throughout the U.S. were put on high alert.

The anthrax attacks led governments and businesses around the nation to devise new safety procedures for handling mail. Some mail handlers wore surgical masks and plastic gloves for protection.

Mail sent to government offices in Washington is irradiated to destroy any dangerous bacteria.

Anthrax is a naturally occurring bacteria and only rarely infects humans. However, the anthrax used in the attacks had been finely milled to make it more easily inhaled, thus increasing its lethality and suggesting a high degree of scientific competence.

DOJ_NMG_0064899

Inhaled anthrax can trigger a deadly infection by swelling body parts, flooding the lungs with fluid and igniting internal hemorrhaging.

The FBI has spent much of the ensuing five years in efforts to identify the laboratory where the anthrax — dubbed the Ames strain — originated. This is a challenging task because the Ames strain has been widely studied in research centers.

The FBI has enlisted the help of 29 government, commercial and university laboratories to develop a profile of the anthrax used in the attacks. They are looking for a microbial fingerprint based on the theory that different scientists use different production techniques to make anthrax spores, and these varied production techniques impart different chemical and physical signatures.

Transit-Worker ID Program Stalled (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Years of Trouble in National Effort Bodes Ill for High-Tech Licenses, Passports

A Bush administration initiative to secure the nation's ports is bogged down in industry opposition, technology flaws and evidence that it fails to safeguard workers' privacy, according to industry and government analysts.

The rocky launch of the Transportation Worker Identification Credential threatens to delay what Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff declared his highest priority after the Dubai port controversy in February: starting by year's end to screen the backgrounds of 750,000 U.S. workers at critical sea, air and land transportation facilities, and issuing them microchip-equipped ID cards.

More broadly, the long-overdue ID program foreshadows concerns that hundreds of millions of Americans soon may encounter as the government starts issuing similarly equipped driver's licenses, passports, federal-worker badges and immigrant-guest-worker cards in coming years.

"It's discouraging to see how really difficult it is to implement this sort of thing," said Doris Meissner, a former commissioner of the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service who tracks identification measures as a senior fellow at the Migration Policy Institute.

"And it's probably going to get more complicated before it gets simpler," she added.

The transportation credential, one of the first security measures initiated after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, was envisioned as a model for new, "smart" ID cards. But a familiar list of hurdles has tripped up the program, including poor administration, indifferent oversight by Congress, insufficient funding, technological glitches and resistance from the private sector, said industry and government officials.

President Bush signed the worker-ID program into law in November 2002 as part of broader maritime security legislation. It called for vetting workers at more than 300 ports and 3,700 cargo and passenger terminals using technology that incorporates fingerprints, iris scans or digital photographs.

The program would streamline checks of criminal-background files, terrorist watch lists and immigration status for truckers, stevedores, rail and airport terminal employees, and other transit workers, among others. The new "biometric" data would make it virtually impossible for anyone other than the cardholder to use the ID.

Department of Homeland Security officials initially told port operators that they expected to start issuing credit-card-size ID cards to transportation workers by the end of 2003.

Then the troubles began.

Management turnover and indecision delayed prototype testing until late 2004. Instead of the 200,000 cards planned for the pilot program, only 4,000 were issued, even as the cost rose from $12 million to $23 million.

Rep. Harold Rogers (R-Ky.), chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee that oversees the department, insisted that the TSA adopt technology currently used for U.S. "green cards," which are produced in his district. The TSA paused to complete a study concluding that its alternative to the green-card technology was superior. Prototype card production was delayed again in 2005 so it could be moved to the Kentucky plant.

It took an election-year political furor over the attempt by a Dubai company to take over operations at six U.S. seaports to jump-start the project. Faced with a reminder of how little has been done to secure facilities from infiltration by potential terrorists, lawmakers called the administration's bungling of the transportation-worker IDs the Achilles' heel of the nation's port security.

But when Homeland Security officials rushed out long-delayed rules in May, labor and the nation's port operators, truckers, barge companies and tugboat companies revolted.

Industry groups and technology providers warned that complex systems for personal identification numbers and card reading could be prone to time-consuming breakdowns in saltwater environments on boats and docks. Marine executives said requiring new workers to wait as long as 60 days to clear security checks would cripple small and seasonal operators that already face worker shortages. Unions warned that without strict limits and an appeals process, workers could be denied jobs because of mistaken identity or past offenses unrelated to terrorism.

"It just doesn't make any sense given the real-world operations of the tugboat industry," said Thomas A. Allegretti, president of American Waterways Operators, which represents 500 tug and barge firms.

In July, the Homeland Security inspector general reported that hundreds of critical security vulnerabilities in proposed cards, card readers and other parts of the system posed unacceptable risks of the theft of sensitive data. Other problems include evolving federal technology standards and a projected cost to industry and workers of $2 billion to $3 billion.

Officials said these concerns are a preview of what could happen on a much larger scale with the broader government use of "smart" cards.

"You have to have a single way of identifying people as who they are that is authentic, that maintains their confidentiality and that is secure," said David Heyman, director of the homeland security program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Experts caution that Americans may not want to submit their fingerprints and eye and facial scans to the government. Privacy advocates want to know who will be in charge of keeping and discarding sensitive personal information, and how that data will be kept secure.

They are concerned about the types of government databases that would be linked to such ID records and who would see them. And even if there is consensus on the security needs, others are skeptical that the technology can be implemented without creating bottlenecks and backlogs.

"There's this idea that an ID card or ID credential is this kind of panacea," said Lee Tien, senior staff attorney for the Electronic Frontier Foundation. "But they are difficult to design and implement . . . and what we're seeing is every attempt to do so is fraught with serious, serious problems."

The questions are not hypothetical. By year's end, Homeland Security is expected to roll out national standards for driver's licenses, which would affect 200 million Americans when the rules take effect by May 2008. The change was mandated by the Real ID Act, which was enacted to make it more difficult for criminals and potential terrorists to obtain driver's licenses.

Last month, the State Department began small-scale production of the first microchip-equipped "e-passports" that over the next 11 years will replace all 60 million U.S.-issued passports and could be upgraded to include fingerprints or other biometric data.

Up to 4 million federal workers and contractors are to be next, receiving new IDs over two years starting in October. Then will come cards allowing tens of millions of residents of the United States, Canada, Mexico and many Caribbean nations to cross each other's borders without a passport. And the White House has proposed issuing similar tamper-proof biometric cards to 2 million guest workers under its contested immigration overhaul.

Analysts cite clear lessons from the transportation-worker ID program's struggles as warnings for programs such as Real ID, which they say will have to be delayed given its far greater size, cost and complexity.

As for the Transportation Worker Identification Credential program, Homeland Security announced last month that after missing a July deadline, it will postpone the installation of card readers. Critics say that for now the department has simply created a $150-per-worker photo ID. The Senate on Thursday passed port-security legislation that would force the department to ease requirements for certain short-term workers and issue rules for card readers by Dec. 31, start more test programs and report back in 2008.

"It's clear the department seems unable to complete the task and control access to our ports, which is a fundamental aspect of security," said Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate homeland security committee and co-sponsor of the bill.

Chertoff maintained that conducting background checks and issuing conventional ID cards are progress. "The fact that we may not have the full-blown perfect system doesn't mean we can't take a big step forward," he said earlier this month.

In a Sept. 8 speech, he went further, blaming the lack of progress on unnamed critics who object to tamper-resistant IDs as too burdensome or expensive, or say they amount to a national ID card.

"That kind of backsliding runs directly contrary to the lessons of 9/11," Chertoff said, noting that nearly all the Sept. 11 hijackers had obtained IDs, in some cases through fraud. He contended that a secure ID system would have prevented the attacks. "If we'd had it five years ago, there would not have been a 9/11," Chertoff said.

U.S. And State Plan To Occupy Freedom Tower (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064901

The federal and New York State governments have tentatively agreed to become anchor tenants in the Freedom Tower, the tallest, most symbolic and most scrutinized skyscraper project at ground zero, under a plan expected to be announced today by Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and the governors of New York and New Jersey.

The agreements, which would cover about 1 million of the 2.6 million square feet in the building, are a significant step forward in the development of the tower, which is seen by Gov. George E. Pataki and others as a symbol of the city's resilience, but regarded by some critics as folly.

The building has been bedeviled by squabbling and delays, as well as questions about design and security and whether there would be enough demand for office space downtown to keep it financially sound.

The Freedom Tower, which would rise to the emblematic height of 1,776 feet, including the antenna, is one of four office towers planned for the 16-acre site.

With the governor and the mayor eager to show progress five years after the terrorist attack on the trade center, the lease agreements would be the latest in a flurry of announcements, which included a tentative agreement in April to speed the reconstruction of the site and the creation in May of a $500 million plan for a memorial to the victims of the attack.

But significant questions remain about the lease agreements, including whether they would actually become signed contracts. The federal leases need Congressional approval, and the state leases would require approval by the governor, comptroller and attorney general.

The leading candidate to succeed Mr. Pataki, Eliot Spitzer, the Democratic attorney general, has questioned the economic viability of the tower, calling it a "white elephant." His campaign declined to comment on the agreements.

Officials sought to lure public agencies to the Freedom Tower when they failed to interest any private companies. Critics say one major concern is that the building will be a target for terrorists, but state officials have said that the tower, after a recent redesign at the behest of the police department, is safe.

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, and the Pataki administration have signed an outline of lease terms with the State Office of General Services on a 15-year lease for 415,000 square feet of space in the Freedom Tower. General Services is likely to move the State Labor Department, as well as the Insurance and Finance Departments, into the tower.

State officials said they expected to sign a formal lease in the coming months and have the option of taking as much as 1 million square feet in the future.

The federal General Services Administration has signed a memorandum of agreement to move the Customs and Border Protection agency, as well as other federal agencies, into more than 600,000 square feet.

The agencies have tentatively agreed to pay an initial annual rent of $59 per square foot, or about $59 million a year, at the building, which is scheduled to open in 2012.

"I was very confident from the beginning that it could work," Mr. Pataki said in an interview. "Now with this commitment of 1 million square feet of leases, it is clearly not just economically viable, but now it will be built and it will be occupied. We will have a new tower that sends a powerful message of restoration and resurgence."

Both Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey and Mayor Bloomberg issued statements hailing the agreements as a significant step toward restoring the World Trade Center site as a commercial hub in Lower Manhattan.

The tentative agreements reflect progress in Governor Pataki's nearly four-year effort to build the Freedom Tower. But final approval of the project by the Port Authority may be months away, which could put it in the hands of the next New York governor, who takes office in January.

When the Port Authority agreed in April to take over responsibility for building the $2.3 billion tower from the developer Larry A. Silverstein, it set several conditions. The authority, which leased the property to Mr. Silverstein, was seeking a viable financial plan, including signed leases for 1 million square feet in the Freedom Tower by the time its board meets on Thursday.

The authority expects to get $973 million in insurance proceeds from the destruction of the twin towers, as well as $250 million from the Pataki administration, but it wanted a cash flow from leases to pay its mortgage.

"We're pleased with the progress that's been made regarding the commitments by state and federal agencies at the Freedom Tower," said Anthony R. Coscia, chairman of the authority. "We're hopeful that we will be able to develop an acceptable plan of finance that will allow its construction to proceed uninterrupted and in a manner that's financially responsible to the Port Authority, the city and the region."

Mr. Coscia said it was unlikely that the Port Authority would grant final approval of the Freedom Tower project on Thursday, but he said it would probably go forward with the development of three office towers on the eastern side of the site, along Church Street. The Freedom Tower would sit at the northwest corner of the trade center site on West Street, south of Vesey Street. It has had a somewhat tortured history. The architect Daniel Libeskind's initial master plan for rebuilding the trade center site recommended building the memorial to the victims of Sept. 11 first, the Church Street towers second, and the tallest tower in the third phase. Mr. Silverstein, who had an obligation to rebuild the trade center complex, also argued that it made sense to start with the towers closest to the PATH station on Church Street.

But at a downtown breakfast meeting more than three years ago, Mr. Pataki named the tallest of the proposed buildings at ground zero the Freedom Tower. He said it would be built first and by 2008. That time goal has been abandoned, but the desire to build the skyscraper remains.

The design for the building was selected by Governor Pataki after he overruled a committee that had chosen a different architectural scheme. But then it had to be redrawn to accommodate the Police Department's security concerns, because the building would sit on West Street. The design now calls for a 186-foot-tall fortified concrete base sheathed in prismatic glass. Work on the foundation and footings has begun.

Urban planners, civic groups and some real estate executives have questioned the wisdom of building the Freedom Tower, which, they say, is too expensive, farther away from the transportation hub than the other towers, and is unlikely to attract corporate tenants, most of which regard the skyscraper as a potential target for terrorists. Indeed, the Port Authority declined to move into the building, saying it would be traumatic for its employees, who lost 84 coworkers in the Sept. 11 attacks.

Under the standard of 250 square feet per worker, the space under consideration could accommodate 4,000 government employees. Officials of the unions representing federal and state workers could not be reached for comment yesterday.

"It's going to be one of the most expensive buildings ever built in Manhattan," said the developer Douglas Durst, who owns a number of Midtown office buildings and is building a skyscraper on 42nd Street. "To saddle already overburdened taxpayers of New York with the rent necessary to pay for it makes no sense at all."

Critics say that current plans to build more than eight million square feet of office space at the trade center site recall the plans for the original complex, which depressed the downtown real estate market for years when the Port Authority built 10 million square feet of publicly-subsidized office space at one time.

With few tenant prospects, the Port Authority and the state were forced to fill much of the space with public agencies. It was not until the mid-1980's that the state began relocating to other buildings.

Some real estate executives said the government agencies will be paying a premium over the lower rents in older buildings downtown. But John Cahill, who oversees ground zero development for Governor Pataki, said that the Freedom Tower would have more-efficient floors that would allow for technological innovation and consolidation.

Although it is not a formal lease, Mr. Cahill said that Governor Pataki had gotten a "firm commitment from the White House" that the Customs Service would return to the trade center site. He added that the agreement with the federal General Services Administration and the state agencies should "enhance the attractiveness" of the Freedom Tower to corporate tenants.

There may also be a financial incentive, since about $345 million in insurance proceeds from the destruction of the old Customs building can be used to build its space in the Freedom Tower. State officials said they did not think that the money could be transferred elsewhere.

Lurita Doan, administrator of the General Services Administration, said in a statement that "the return of the federal government to Lower Manhattan and their presence in the Freedom Tower is more than symbolic; it is a commitment to the building of a memorial that captures the American spirit."

Governor Pataki said that all the signature elements of the trade center master plan are now in place, from the $2.2 billion PATH train station to the memorial, the office buildings and the Freedom Tower.

Some officials involved in rebuilding say that the final decision may go to the next governor. "We're six to months away from the point that we're full steam ahead," said a senior executive, who requested anonymity because he did not want a public spat with Governor Pataki.

The governor said he was confident that nothing could stop construction of the Freedom Tower.

"The commitments we're making now will apply into the future," he said. "I'm very confident that the brilliance of the plan and the momentum with actual construction will continue regardless of who the next governor is."

Under the April agreement, between New York State, New York City, New Jersey and Mr. Silverstein, the Port Authority took responsibility for the Freedom Tower, which, officials said, Mr. Silverstein was reluctant to build without any anchor tenants. The developer, in turn, retained the right to build three towers along Church Street.

But he was put on a strict schedule requiring him to complete the buildings by 2012.

State and Port Authority executives have been working round the clock in recent weeks with Mr. Silverstein to complete the agreement struck in April. Both sides say they have made considerable progress in narrowing their differences.

Renewal Money For New Orleans Bypasses Renters (NYT)

By Susan Saulny And Gary Rivlin

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — As billions in housing aid begins to flow here in the next few weeks, most of it will go to homeowners, who have been appointed by city officials as the true architects of this city's recovery, despite the fact that roughly half the city's residents rented housing before Hurricane Katrina.

The renters of New Orleans, it seems, are on their own.

Rents are skyrocketing across the city, up an average of 39 percent since Hurricane Katrina. The city has announced that it plans to refurbish only a small fraction of its traditional public housing units. Some neighborhoods are campaigning to tear down sturdy apartment buildings and build parks in their place. Though some aid has been set aside for landlords, many lower-income residents who say they are unable to return have been priced out.

"I want to come back, but who's going to help me build my life?" asked Lionel Smith, 46, a longtime resident of the Lower Ninth Ward and a driving school instructor whose apartment building was destroyed by the floodwaters. "There's this plan in place to take care of homeowners, but I've heard nothing about helping renters. Where are we supposed to live? Will they help rebuild apartment buildings?"

From a renter's point of view, New Orleans has become off-limits to all but prosperous tenants, as rents have increased significantly in the pockets of the city that did not flood. Before the storm, the fair market rent for a two-bedroom unit in the city was $676; it is now $940, according to the Brookings Institution.

Before the hurricane, it would not have been unusual to find a two-story, three-bedroom house in Gentilly, a solidly middle-class neighborhood, renting for less than $1,000 a month. Today, that area, north of downtown toward Lake Pontchartrain, does not exist as a functioning neighborhood.

By contrast these days, $1,000 might get a tenant half a refurbished duplex on a trash-strewn street in Mid-City — an area that also flooded, but not to the same extent — and it would most likely be offered without major appliances or air-conditioning.

Henry Jones, a New Orleans East homeowner, said that roughly half the owners in his subdivision, Wimbledon, were coming back, which he contrasted with the lack of activity he has observed in neighborhoods like Central City and Mid-City, where there are far more rental units than single-family homes.

"You drive around those neighborhoods and you pretty much see nothing going on," Mr. Jones said. "It's depressing."

Those communities that were home to the greatest concentration of rental properties are also those areas that still lie in ruins 12 months after the storm. The longer properties languish, rotting in the humid heat, the harder they are to restore to habitable conditions. With no concrete plan in place to help landlords, a large part of the rental stock has been festering for a year now, preventing residents from returning and depleting the work force.

"I'll confess to being frustrated," said Norman C. Francis, the chairman of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, the agency distributing federal aid, and the president of Xavier University here. "Most of the people who need to come back aren't homeowners at this point but renters."

State officials acknowledged that renters were not their first priority.

"We wanted to get the homeowner assistance plan off and running, because it affects more people," said Walter Leger, the chairman of the authority's housing committee.

The lack of affordable rental housing is yet another factor making it more difficult for low-income residents to return. The city has also lost its extensive health care system for the poor; its school system is only partially functioning; and there is little public transportation.

In some areas, in fact, homeowners are trying to use the recovery process to rid their neighborhoods of long-standing apartment buildings that were damaged during the storm. Building parks in the place of apartments that neighbors said lowered property values is "killing two birds with one stone," said Joseph St. Martin, an architect hired by homeowner groups in New Orleans East to work on the community development plan the city has asked every neighborhood to devise.

Unlike some other urban areas, New Orleans's rental market was dominated by small-scale local landlords before the storm. Many say they lack the resources needed to resuscitate their properties, especially when so many of them are struggling to repair their own homes.

The Louisiana Recovery Authority has set aside $859 million to help landlords (compared with $7.5 billion that has been set aside for homeowners). The goal, officials said, is to start distributing that money in the next month or so, but they acknowledge they are still working out the details of the plan.

Officials estimate that at least 30,000 units will be improved through this program, which is expected to offer no-interest 10-year mortgages of up to $75,000 a unit to landlords who agree to rent at or below the market rate. No direct subsidies to tenants are being planned.

State officials said they would offer a combination of low-income housing tax credits and financial grants to entice larger developers to build mixed-income rental properties. In New Orleans, most large-scale developments — those with more than 200 apartments — were in the eastern part of the city. Nearly all those developments are still damaged and vacant; some are for sale, while others have been torn down.

"The impact on the renters is that the cost of renting has increased," Mr. Leger said. "So our theory is if we can bring the cost of renting back down, we can put people back in the position they were in prestorm."

Critics of the proposed plan say 30,000 units is not nearly enough to make a big difference in New Orleans. The Brookings Institution estimates that more than 48,000 rental units were destroyed or heavily damaged in the flood, or about 40 percent of the original stock of apartments and rental houses.

William Quigley, director of the Gillis Long Poverty Law Center at Loyola University here, said the number could even be higher, and that many of the units were occupied by low- and middle-income families.

"The state has misleadingly named its programs as 'The Road Home Housing Programs' despite the fact that the planned expenditures will not provide a realistic road home for most of the people with low and moderate incomes," Dr. Quigley wrote recently in a complaint to federal housing officials.

A lack of information even 12 months after the hurricane has caused confusion and frustration.

"There is no real identifiable plan that anyone can point to that would enable people to say, 'I can rely on this,' " said Jerome Anderson, an assistant dean at Tulane Law School who owns five units around the city. The storm destroyed Mr. Anderson's home and all his rental properties, putting tremendous financial pressure on his resources to rebuild. His situation is typical among local landlords.

Mr. Anderson said he was constantly hearing from prospective tenants wanting to know when he might have apartments available for rent. "Anyone who owns property is probably being bombarded with questions as to when will their properties be available for rental," he said. "There's a lot of vacant property that's not available, and that is affecting the recovery, in that people don't have places to live."

Ted Quant, director of the Twomey Center for Peace Through Justice at Loyola University, owned a home in Gentilly and two rental units in New Orleans East. He is part of a new group, the African American Landlords Association, made up primarily of property owners who lost both a home and rental units. This loosely knit group is pushing for both information and assistance.

"It seems that the people who were here and didn't flood are saying to the people who flooded, 'We don't need you, stay out of town,' " Mr. Quant said. "My tenants came back and recovered what wasn't looted. They were asking when they could come back for good. I had to tell them I didn't know."

Gov.: New Orleans Crime Calls For Military Presence (AP)

AP, September 17, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Louisiana (AP) -- National Guard troops and state police will patrol the city through December, Gov. Kathleen Blanco said Saturday at a summit of law enforcement officials and crime experts called to address a spate of killings marring the recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

"Crime has no role in recovery," Blanco said. "It limits our ability to recover."

Police are on pace to recover as many illegal firearms this year as they did in the two previous years -- even though half as many people live in the city now, said Robert Browning, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

But in a positive sign, court and prison repairs should be done next month, an official said, which means the city's crippled criminal justice system will be able to process its influx of suspects more efficiently.

The summit opened hours after an early morning killing brought the city's homicide count for the year to 100.

New Orleans, with a pre-Katrina population of 455,000, had virtually no crime in the months after the storm hit on August 29, 2005, when the city was largely empty.

That changed as the evacuees started returning. In April murders began occurring regularly, sometimes in groups. The current population is uncertain, though various estimates put it at 200,000 to 250,000.

Guard members and state police were sent to New Orleans shortly after what police called one of the city's worst acts of violence in 10 years: the fatal shooting of five teenagers in mid-June.

Over Labor Day weekend, four people died in 13 shootings in the New Orleans area.

The Guard members and state troopers have helped bolster a police department whose membership fell after the storm by more than 200 to about 1,420. Blanco said the cost to the state will be about $14 million.

On Saturday, the governor called the use of troops and state police a stopgap measure to help safeguard the city while other means to deal with crime are developed.

The summit shows the city will no longer tolerate crime, Mayor Ray Nagin said.

DOJ_NMG_0064905

"Any crime committed with a gun should be charged at the highest possible count, attempted murder at a minimum," Nagin said. "And all those crimes must be expedited, put to the front of the line and prosecuted."

The city also needs to crack down on illegal firearms, Browning said. In 2004 and 2005, police recovered about 1,800 illegal firearms per year, he said.

"So far they this year they have recovered 1,300," Browning said. "Which is on track to remove the same number with half the population."

Also Saturday, former state Attorney General Richard Ieyoub, head of a commission Nagin set up to examine criminal justice, said renovations of the criminal court and parish prison should be completed next month.

Twelve criminal court judges are sharing seven courtrooms, and so only seven can hear cases at any time. Each can handle no more than six cases a day because the sheriff's department can't transport and provide security for more.

"Once we have the building back, all of us can hold court every day," Judge Calvin Johnson said.

WAR NEWS:

Called From Diplomatic Reserve (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Former Secretary of State Leads Attempt to Salvage Iraq Mission

Is Jim Baker bailing out the Bushes once again?

The former secretary of state, James A. Baker III, a confidant of President George H.W. Bush, visited Baghdad two weeks ago to take a look at the vexing political and military situation. He was there as co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, put together by top think tanks at the behest of Congress to come up with ideas about the way forward in Iraq.

The group has attracted little attention beyond foreign policy elites since its formation this year. But it is widely viewed within that small world as perhaps the last hope for a midcourse correction in a venture they generally agree has been a disaster.

The reason, by and large, is the involvement of Baker, 76, the legendary troubleshooter who remains close to the first President Bush and cordial with the second. Many policy experts think that if anyone can forge bipartisan consensus on a plan for extricating the United States from Iraq -- and then successfully pitch that plan to a president who has so far seemed impervious to outside pressure -- it is the man who put together the first Gulf War coalition, which evicted Saddam Hussein from Kuwait in 1991.

Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), who came up with the idea for the study group and pushed for its formation, said he thinks the administration is "waiting anxiously" for the group's recommendations. He cited the "impeccable credentials" of the 10-member group, which also includes former Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, investment banker and Bill Clinton adviser Vernon E. Jordan Jr., and former White House chief of staff Leon E. Panetta. The other co-chairman is the Democratic former Indiana congressman Lee H. Hamilton, who also co-chaired the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"Their recommendations will carry a lot of weight," said Wolf. "If they come up with a unanimous opinion, the administration, Congress and the American people will have to listen."

Baker is not revealing much of his hand. He has indicated that recommendations will not be forthcoming until after the November elections, in an effort to keep the group above the political fray. He has also asked those involved in the study group -- members and staffers alike -- not to talk to the media, so most of those interviewed for this article spoke only on the condition of anonymity. Baker's assistant said the co-chairman would not be available to be interviewed.

Baker has offered some hints of his thinking -- and his dismay with the way the Iraq occupation has been handled by the administration.

"The difficulty of winning the peace was severely underestimated," Baker wrote in a recent memoir, citing "costly mistakes" by the Pentagon. These included, he wrote, disbanding the Iraqi army, not securing weapons depots and "perhaps never having committed enough troops to successfully pacify the country."

But in an interview in the current issue of Texas Monthly, Baker dashed the idea of "just picking up and pulling out" of Iraq. "Even though it's something we need to find a way out of, the worst thing in the world we could do would be to pick up our marbles and go home," he said, "because then we will trigger, without a doubt, a huge civil war. And every one of the regional actors -- the Iranians and everybody else -- will come in and do their thing."

The study group appears to be struggling to find some middle ground between such a pullout and the administration's strategy of keeping a heavy American troop presence until the Iraqi government can maintain security on its own.

"If this war is consumed by partisan attacks, if the choice is presented as simply one between 'stay the course' or 'cut and run,' we will never be able to do what is right," panel member Panetta wrote following the group's trip to Iraq in an article for his hometown paper, the Monterey County Herald in California.

Baker and panel members have been exploring different ideas, such as a greater degree of regional autonomy for Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite regions. But those familiar with the group's work said there is far from a consensus yet on what to do. One well-placed source said panel members came away from their trip sobered, with "a sense that we can't continue to do what we have been doing," adding that Baker was not simply looking to protect the administration.

"I think he basically wants to call it the way he sees it," said this source, a critic of the administration's approach to Iraq. "He's also been frustrated by the mistakes that have been made. In many ways, it has damaged the legacy he established as secretary of state."

Some are skeptical that the president will be open to advice seeming to come from one of his father's top advisers. In some ways, Bush has distanced himself from the people and policies of the first Bush administration -- though Baker has been called on occasion to perform sensitive missions, such as heading the Bush campaign's efforts in the 2000 Florida recount and leading negotiations to provide debt relief to Iraq.

The administration's more hawkish supporters, meanwhile, are nervous about Baker's involvement, counting him as one of the "realist" foreign policy proponents they see as having allowed threats against the United States to grow in the '80s and '90s. Gary J. Schmitt of the American Enterprise Institute voiced concern that the Iraq group was not listening to those advocating a more muscular military strategy to defeat the insurgency.

But Schmitt added: "People can worry about what Baker is going to say, but the president has a way of doing what he is going to do. There could be a lot of wishful thinking on the part of the older Bush crowd that the son got into trouble and now he's going to listen to Baker the strategist."

Publicly, the administration is supportive, though inside the foreign policy apparatus there appears to be skepticism that the Iraq Study Group will come up with any breakthroughs. At first, the administration was divided about whether to cooperate with the panel. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gave her support only after being assured by officials with the federally funded U.S. Institute of Peace, under whose aegis the group was formed, and other think tanks involved in the project that the venture would be a forward-looking exercise and not an examination of past mistakes, according to people familiar with the project.

Baker himself secured the personal approval of President Bush before signing on. "As I always do," Baker told Texas Monthly, "I said . . . I want him to look me in the eye and tell me he wants me to do this."

The 'Sunk-cost Fallacy' (LAT)

By Barry Schwartz, Barry Schwartz Is A Professor Of Psychology At Swarthmore College And The Author Of "The Paradox Of

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

There are reasons to stay in Iraq. But doing so because we 'owe' it to the dead isn't one of them.

YOU'VE PAID $10 to get into the movie and it just plain stinks. The plot is ridiculous, the acting is terrible, the violence is excessive. But you've already watched half of it. Do you sit through the movie to the end or do you leave?

Just a month ago, you spent $2,000 getting your 10-year-old car's transmission rebuilt. Now you find out the car is leaking oil and needs a ring job. Do you spend the next thousand or buy a new car?

You've been living with your romantic partner for 10 years. The relationship has had its ups and downs, and both of you have invested a lot in keeping it going. But every day it seems to involve more work and less joy. Is it time to move on?

You work for a private equity firm and personally persuaded your skeptical partners to invest $2 million in a high-tech start-up. Now the chief executive comes to see you with the news that they've hit some snags in developing their product, and they'll need at least another million to bring it to market. Do you write the check?

We've all encountered situations like these. We make a significant investment — of money, time or emotion — in some project, relationship or business deal, and it doesn't seem to be working out. Do we continue to "throw good money after bad" or do we "cut and run" and "stop wasting time"? What's the right way to think about such decisions?

Psychologists, decision scientists and economists have an answer. They tell us that it's a mistake to continue with a project or an activity because of what you have already invested in it. The time or money you've already spent is gone. You can't reclaim it. Using a past investment to justify a future investment is what they call the "sunk-cost fallacy."

Instead of thinking about the past, what we should be doing is thinking about the future. "Will my life be better if I leave this terrible movie or if I stay to the bitter end?" "Will my car give me 20,000 more trouble-free miles if I just do this one last repair?" None of these questions have sure answers. Life is full of uncertainty. But what we can say is that if the reason for "staying the course" is past commitment — sunk costs — we need to find a better one.

"Cut and run." "Stay the course." Where have we heard these phrases lately? Oh, yes, we've heard them trotted out in defense of continued U.S. involvement in Iraq as death, injury and insurgency mount. President Bush has offered several reasons for staying the course. And one of them is the more than 2,600 Americans who have already died in Iraq.

"I'm going to make you this promise," the president said at Ft. Bragg, N.C., on July 4. "I'm not going to allow the sacrifice of 2,527 troops who have died in Iraq to be in vain by pulling out before the job is done." And Bush has not cornered the market on this kind of reasoning. Bill Clinton said it too, more than a year ago. Asked about Iraq, he said that "we've all got a stake in its succeeding." Why? "We've got over 600 dead Americans since the conflict was ended."

We heard this argument often enough in the 1960s. As casualties mounted in Vietnam, it became more difficult to withdraw because withdrawal would have "cheapened" the lives of those already sacrificed. We "owed" it to the dead and wounded to "stay the course." What staying the course produced was thousands more dead and wounded. "Knee deep in the big muddy" is how folk singer Pete Seeger described it. The question should never have been, "What have we invested so far?" but "What are our objectives for the future and can we attain them at a reasonable cost?"

The sunk-cost fallacy took many lives in Vietnam. Whether Iraq is or is not another quagmire I leave to others, and to history, to determine. But there is one respect in which we must not allow Iraq to become another Vietnam: Continued involvement must not be justified by appealing to the imperative not to allow the dead to have "died in vain."

HOW SHOULD WE honor the sacrifices of those who have died or suffered serious injury in a U.S. military conflict? The best way to show how much we respect and value their lives is by not risking other lives unless future prospects for success fully justify putting more people in harm's way. Therefore, our standards for putting more people at risk should, if anything, become more rigorous, not less, as casualties mount.

To change course under such circumstances need not be an admission of foolishness — even if enemies do accuse the decision-maker of "flip-flopping." One can think through a problem in a logical and rigorous way, and formulate a sensible course of action, only to discover that it doesn't work out. Good decisions do not guarantee good results (just as bad decisions don't guarantee bad ones).

Yet people seem willing to waste even more (time, money or lives) to justify what they have already spent and avoid that sick feeling of failure. Think about it. You haven't really lost money on a stock whose share price keeps plummeting until after you sell it. So you keep holding on, in the hope that your judgment as an investor will eventually be vindicated. And troops haven't really "died in vain" as long as you continue to press on in the fight, no matter how disastrous the results.

I am not arguing that we should "declare victory and leave" Iraq. Nor am I suggesting that the only justification being offered for continued U.S. involvement in Iraq is the "sunk cost" in American lives. I am not saying that obligations from the past should never enter into one's consideration about the future. And I certainly don't propose that we should think about death and injury, war and peace in exactly the same way we think about car transmissions and investments in start-ups.

My suggestion here is more modest. You may attempt to justify the continued Iraq occupation in many ways, as the Bush administration has. Perhaps you think it will prevent further terror, democratize the Middle East or restrain Iran. Perhaps you think that leaving Iraq before "the job is done" will undermine the world's confidence in U.S. promises to other nations.

But it is unacceptable to justify continued involvement in Iraq or any other conflict on the grounds that we "owe" it to those who have already fallen. That is a justification that has strong emotional appeal, but it is fallacious, and no one should be allowed to get away with it.

Whatever the differences between Iraq in 2006 and Vietnam in 1968, if we allow policymakers to use our "sunk costs" — our dead military — to justify further conflict, we will have turned Iraq into another Vietnam. And if we do, we will be shamed by Iraq just as we were shamed by Vietnam.

Get Real, George (NYDN)

New York Daily News, September 17, 2006

On the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, President Bush warned the nation that the Iraq war is being fought for the highest of stakes. He characterized the conflict as "a struggle for civilization," and warned that "the safety of America depends upon the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

Given the President's stark words, you would think we're pulling out every stop and marshaling every available resource to win. And you'd be wrong. The sad but simple truth: In many ways this war is still being fought with a "business as usual" approach, and that's hurting our chances of victory.

For example, it is stunning that three-plus years into this war — a war that requires a high level of coordination between security, intelligence and reconstruction operations, and their integration with political negotiations between Iraq's competing factions — we still do not have any single individual in overall control of the war effort. Neither Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad nor Gen. George Casey, our senior political and military leaders in Baghdad, is in charge.

This is a striking violation of one of the most basic principles of war: unity of command. Apparently neither the State nor Defense departments wants to yield bureaucratic turf, and President Bush doesn't feel inclined to force them.

The same holds back in Washington, where the President has yet to establish a "war cabinet" that meets to oversee the war's conduct on a daily basis. The lessons of history are clear on this. If you want to win a war, you must be prepared to adapt more quickly than the enemy to changes in the conflict's dynamics — from the top on down.

Take another example. In a championship football game, would you constantly rotate your star players in and out of the game? Of course not. But that's exactly what the administration has done with its best generals. Three years into the war, where are generals like David Petraeus, David Barno and Peter Chiarelli — all of whom earned reputations for their skill in Afghanistan or Iraq? Petraeus was ordered back to Fort Leavenworth in Kansas. Barno has inexplicably been retired, while Chiarelli — who is leading the do-or-die fight in Baghdad — is scheduled to be replaced in December.

Can anyone imagine pulling Gen. George Patton from command halfway through his campaign in France during World War II? Bush has repeatedly said that as Iraqi Security Forces stand up, our forces can begin to withdraw. But doing that hinges on successfully embedding American officers and sergeants into the new Iraqi battalions. These advisers provide the stiff backbone the Iraqi forces need to accelerate their development. The quicker they become proficient, the sooner we can reduce our troop levels.v But we have only about a dozen advisers in Iraqi battalions, when three times as many are required. As one senior Army officer recently told me, "I think the Army would rather lose this war than change its personnel system."

Finally, we have the homefront effort — or, I should say, the lack of one. Not long ago, an Army officer remarked that "The United States is not at war. The Army is at war. The United States is at the mall."

Indeed, given the stakes involved, it remains shocking that the administration has asked nothing of the American people. No tax surcharge to pay for the war. Not even a war bond drive — or a call to conserve energy.

Fixing the problems of unity of command, of playing merry-go-round with generals, of taking a pickup team approach to the adviser effort and of refusing to demand some sacrifices here at home may not guarantee success, but the administration's failures on all fronts are a down payment on failure.

I believe Bush when he says the United States "is being tested in a way that we have not been since the start of the Cold War." But the President seems to be having a hard time convincing himself.

Training Iraqi Troops A Logistical Feat (AP-Y)

By Rebecca Santana, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Iraq has one of the world's largest oil reserves, but the Iraqi army can't get enough fuel for its tanks. It also can't get spare parts for its trucks or supply ammunition on its own.

While the U.S. training program has made great progress teaching Iraqi soldiers how to fight, the force still relies on American help for distributing supplies — a dependency that is another obstacle to sending U.S. troops home.

"Just because you stand up all the fighters, all the combat arms organizations, they're not self-sustaining until they have some form of a logistics system," said Brig. Gen. Rebecca Halstead, commander of the 3rd Corps Support Command. "It's not there yet."

As U.S. commanders worked the past three years to build Iraqi security forces, priority went to forming combat units capable of fighting Sunni Arab insurgents.

The task of maintaining those troops was left to U.S.-led coalition forces — who got Iraqis to their missions, gave them ammunition, fed them and, in many cases, even gave them their pay.

Even in areas where Iraqis have taken over security duties, they need help getting supplies from central and regional storage facilities. In volatile Anbar province, a hot bed of insurgents, it has been especially challenging for the Iraqis to keep troops supplied with food and water.

So there is now an emphasis on building an effective Iraqi logistics operation.

Of the roughly 120,000 Iraqi soldiers, about 10 percent to 15 percent are involved in supply-related activities, said Maj. Gerald Ostlund, a coalition spokesman.

By contrast, for every combat soldier in American and other foreign contingents, there are three performing support or logistics roles, U.S. officials say.

DOJ_NMG_0064909

The Iraqi military won't need quite the same ratio since they have a local economy to rely on for food, housing, equipment and repairs, unlike the Americans who need to import just about everything, said Michael O'Hanlon of the Brookings Institution, a Washington D.C. think tank.

Brig. Gen. Terry Wolff, commander of the Coalition Military Assistance and Training Team that is helping Iraqis build their army, said Iraq also won't need the resources for moving troops around the world.

But many Iraqi logistical units are still understaffed, Wolff said.

For example, here at the Taji National Depot, a clearinghouse for supplies going to units across Iraq, the goal is to have about 1,200 Iraqi soldiers working at the post 12 miles north of Baghdad, but there are only about 300 now.

The American military's logistics system uses high-tech tracking devices such as radio monitors that allow items to be followed from when they leave storage in the U.S. until they arrive in Iraq.

The Iraqis use a low-tech system. Some is computerized. But records are mostly kept on paper, which means supplies can easily be lost or stolen before they get to the units that need them.

It's a system ripe for corruption, said John Pike, director of Globalsecurity.org, a research group in Washington.

"The prevailing community standard is steal everything that isn't nailed down. And when you find something that is nailed down, to go to find a crowbar," Pike said.

In one particularly egregious incident, Iraqi officials last year found that widespread fraud and corruption under former Defense Minister Hazem Shalaan led to the disappearance of $1 billion, almost the entire budget to buy new equipment.

Col. Kenneth Kirkpatrick, who advises Iraqi supply officers at Taji, said making sure everything in the depot is accounted for is a key goal.

"I think it has been a problem," he said. "Early on, things were moving through here so fast that they were just coming in on the trucks and moving out as fast as they could. Sometimes the boxes just weren't sealed properly or containers weren't locked, and that opened it up to pilferage along the route."

The depot's Iraqi deputy commander, who did not want his name used out of fear insurgents would kill him for working with the Americans, said shipping containers sometimes arrive without his staff having any idea what is in them before they are opened.

Kirkpatrick said that is mostly the case with supplies donated by other countries.

Iraqi commanders and troops in the field complain that Iraqi officials in Baghdad fail to get them essentials like fuel and spare parts for vehicles.

Lt. Col. Hassan Falah, with the highway police, likened the situation to carrying a block of ice from Baghdad to distant provinces — by the time it arrives, most of it has melted away. Falah said only four of his 20 vehicles were working due to lack of parts.

Adding to the supply problem, many Iraqi soldiers and police operate with an eclectic assortment of purchased and donated vehicles that run on various types of fuel and need different spare parts.

Then there are the fuel shortages.

An American soldier helping train the Iraqi border patrol said that when his unit pulls into a town or Iraqi base, Iraqi troops try to siphon off fuel from the U.S. Humvees because they are so low on supplies.

Wolff said the defense forces aren't allocated enough fuel from the Iraqi government. "Where do they sit on the pecking order? We believe that they're on the bottom third," he said.

In the past, when Iraqi units needed fuel, they turned to the Americans. But U.S. commanders say they have begun withholding supplies in an effort to force Iraqis to look to their own supply chains.

"For a while we really spiked where we were giving them, I would say, a majority of their fuel," said Halstead, the 3rd Corps Support Command chief. "If I keep giving you something, you'll just keep taking it."

As for maintenance of Iraqi military vehicles, the work is now being done by private contractors hired by the Ministry of Defense. But that contract expires in March, and the Iraqi army needs to decide whether to renew it or do the work itself, Wolff said.

Despite the problems, U.S. officers say they are making progress in getting Iraqis to take over more of their supply operations.

Lt. Col. William Schiek, who supervised training of the Iraqi army's 6th Motorized Transportation Regiment, said the unit has been planning, coordinating and executing its own missions for months with little direct U.S. involvement.

"They're doing 100 percent of the heavy lifting," Schiek said. "This is not a U.S. show by any means."

Yes, More Troops Would Help, A Bit (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

DOJ_NMG_0064910

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON

IN the lawless villages and empty deserts of Anbar Province, the Sunni heartland that provides safe haven for indigenous insurgents and foreign terrorists, what could an American commander do if more troops showed up?

This tantalizing "what if?" is being debated with renewed intensity after it was revealed last week that a Marine Corps intelligence assessment said Anbar's dire security situation could be improved only by injecting more economic aid and a division's worth of troops to reinforce the current 30,000-strong coalition contingent.

In a way, the argument over more troops in Anbar plays out along lines familiar from the early stages of the Iraq war, when Congress and the Pentagon's civilian leaders traded words over whether enough troops were committed to the invasion and its aftermath.

But given the current debate, the question becomes how would more troops help in Anbar? And for how long?

The answer is, they would help, in the short term. But many military analysts also warn that sending in another division — anywhere from 12,00 to 15,000 troops — could create more problems. An extra division could flood the zone in Anbar, a province the size of Louisiana stretching from the west of Baghdad to the Syrian border.

Currently, the American military is continuing its "clear, hold and build" policy: pushing insurgents from key towns, sending in Iraqi and coalition forces to maintain security and trying to rebuild local governments and businesses. Despite the return of some insurgents, the military points to successes in cities like Falluja. But troops can't begin to secure other important towns like Ramadi, Haditha and Hit.

Adding soldiers could both accelerate efforts to eradicate insurgents and terrorists, as well as help stanch the flow of foreign fighters and cash that support the homegrown insurgency across Iraq.

The addition of troops, military experts said, could increase the number of border posts along the lengthy frontier with Syria. Extra cavalry in Humvees or light-armored vehicles could mount more raids along the historical smuggling routes — the military calls them "ratlines" — that are not being choked off today.

Anthony H. Cordesman, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, whose assessments of security in Iraq have become required reading in Washington, said he thought the military was at least a full division short of troop levels required across Iraq. Yet even with more troops, he said, the empty swaths of desert would not be worth securing, even though insurgents are free to maneuver there.

"But more troops could help in specific cities," Mr. Cordesman said. He suggested focusing on the towns and cities along the river west of Baghdad, as well as the roads from Falluja toward Syria. "You want the main cities along the road system between Syria and Baghdad," he said.

Military experts said that extra troops could also assist in the nation-building part of the mission. An influx of combat engineers could more rapidly repair and rebuild power grids, sanitation and water systems. Military engineers could train and guide Iraqis in those jobs, which would add the benefit of employing young, disaffected Sunnis.

And a larger deployment of civil affairs officers — many drawn from the reserves who work as lawyers, city managers or teachers back in the civilian world — could add spine and muscle to efforts to establish democratic city councils, to open schools and to restart businesses. Extra officers and sergeants could also accelerate the training of Iraqi security forces.

But all those arguments for more troops founder on a tyrannical fact. Many more troops are not available. Iraqi forces are generating slowly. Foreign partners don't seem eager to add troops. And because of the new military operation to secure Baghdad, American forces have actually been pulled from Anbar, although not from the critical cities.

There's also the matter of whether more troops help in the long term. Many senior officers and military analysts argue that more soldiers conducting more combat missions would only add to a sense among many Iraqis that the United States is a clumsy and violent occupying power.

"I'll state emphatically that our job is to win in Al Anbar," said Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the second-ranking commander in Iraq. "But it is not the kind of fight that is going to be won by military kinetic action alone. It's a combination across all the lines of operations."

General Chiarelli, the commander of day-to-day military operations in Iraq, is one of the Army's leading advocates of using a broad spectrum of military and government-wide capabilities to solve Iraq's security problems.

In a 2005 article in Military Review, an official Army journal, he described how "kinetic action" — combat operations — must be combined with other "lines of operation," which include training Iraqi security forces, establishing democratic government, improving municipal services and building the economy.

The senior Marine commander in Anbar, Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, said that more troops may help, but only so much.

DOJ_NMG_0064911

"I think the introduction of further U.S. forces out here will certainly give short-term affect," General Zilmer said. "But at the end of the day, I don't believe it's going to be the significant change that is necessary to achieve long-term security and stability out here in Anbar. That, we still believe, has got to be an Iraqi solution to that piece."

The Longer The War, The Larger The Lies (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

RARELY has a television network presented a more perfectly matched double feature. President Bush's 9/11 address on Monday night interrupted ABC's "Path to 9/11" so seamlessly that a single network disclaimer served them both: "For dramatic and narrative purposes, the movie contains fictionalized scenes, composite and representative characters and dialogue, as well as time compression."

No kidding: "The Path to 9/11" was false from the opening scene, when it put Mohamed Atta both in the wrong airport (Boston instead of Portland, Me.) and on the wrong airline (American instead of USAirways). It took Mr. Bush but a few paragraphs to warm up to his first fictionalization for dramatic purposes: his renewed pledge that "we would not distinguish between the terrorists and those who harbor or support them." Only days earlier the White House sat idly by while our ally Pakistan surrendered to Islamic militants in its northwest frontier, signing a "truce" and releasing Al Qaeda prisoners. Not only will Pakistan continue to harbor terrorists, Osama bin Laden probably among them, but it will do so without a peep from Mr. Bush.

You'd think that after having been caught concocting the scenario that took the nation to war in Iraq, the White House would mind the facts now. But this administration understands our culture all too well. This is a country where a cable news network (MSNBC) offers in-depth journalism about one of its anchors (Tucker Carlson) losing a prime-time dance contest and where conspiracy nuts have created a cottage industry of books and DVD's by arguing that hijacked jets did not cause 9/11 and that the 9/11 commission was a cover-up. (The fictionalized "Path to 9/11," supposedly based on the commission's report, only advanced the nuts' case.) If you're a White House stuck in a quagmire in an election year, what's the percentage in starting to tell the truth now? It's better to game the system.

The untruths are flying so fast that untangling them can be a full-time job. Maybe that's why I am beginning to find Dick Cheney almost refreshing. As we saw on "Meet the Press" last Sunday, these days he helpfully signals when he's about to lie. One dead giveaway is the word context, as in "the context in which I made that statement last year." The vice president invoked "context" to try to explain away both his bogus predictions: that Americans would be greeted as liberators in Iraq and that the insurgency (some 15 months ago) was in its "last throes."

The other instant tip-off to a Cheney lie is any variation on the phrase "I haven't read the story." He told Tim Russert he hadn't read The Washington Post's front-page report that the bin Laden trail had gone "stone cold" or the new Senate Intelligence Committee report(PDF) contradicting the White House's prewar hype about nonexistent links between Al Qaeda and Saddam. Nor had he read a Times front-page article about his declining clout. Or the finding by Mohamed ElBaradei of the International Atomic Energy Agency just before the war that there was "no evidence of resumed nuclear activities" in Iraq. "I haven't looked at it; I'd have to go back and look at it again," he said, however nonsensically.

These verbal tics are so consistent that they amount to truth in packaging — albeit the packaging of evasions and falsehoods. By contrast, Condi Rice's fictions, also offered in bulk to television viewers to memorialize 9/11, are as knotty as a David Lynch screenplay. Asked by Chris Wallace of Fox News last Sunday if she and the president had ignored prewar "intelligence that contradicted your case," she refused to give up the ghost: "We know that Zarqawi was running a poisons network in Iraq," she insisted, as she continued to state again that "there were ties between Iraq and Al Qaeda" before the war.

Ms. Rice may be a terrific amateur concert pianist, but she's an even better amateur actress. The Senate Intelligence Committee report released only two days before she spoke dismissed all such ties. Saddam, who "issued a general order that Iraq should not deal with Al Qaeda," saw both bin Laden and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi as threats and tried to hunt down Zarqawi when he passed through Baghdad in 2002. As for that Zarqawi "poisons network," the Pentagon knew where it was and wanted to attack it in June 2002. But as Jim Miklaszewski of NBC News reported more than two years ago, the White House said no, fearing a successful strike against Zarqawi might "undercut its case for going to war against Saddam." Zarqawi, meanwhile, escaped.

It was in an interview with Ted Koppel for the Discovery Channel, though, that Ms. Rice rose to a whole new level of fictionalizing by wrapping a fresh layer of untruth around her most notorious previous fiction. Asked about her dire prewar warning that a smoking gun might come in the form of a mushroom cloud, she said that "it wasn't meant as hyperbole." She also rewrote history to imply that she had been talking broadly about the nexus between "terrorism and a nuclear device" back then, not specifically Saddam — a rather deft verbal sleight-of-hand.

Ms. Rice sets a high bar, but Mr. Bush, competitive as always, was not to be outdone in his Oval Office address. Even the billing of his appearance was fiction. "It's not going to be a political speech," Tony Snow announced, knowing full well that the 17-minute text was largely Cuisinarted scraps from other recent political speeches, including those at campaign fund-raisers. Moldy canards of yore (Saddam "was a clear threat") were interspersed with promising newcomers: Iraq will be "a strong ally in the war on terror." As is often the case, the president was technically truthful. Iraq will be a strong ally in the war on terror — just not necessarily our ally. As Mr. Bush spoke, the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, was leaving for Iran to jolly up Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Perhaps the only way to strike back against this fresh deluge of fiction is to call the White House's bluff. On Monday night, for instance, Mr. Bush flatly declared that "the safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad." He once again invoked Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman, asking, "Do we have the confidence to do in the Middle East what our fathers and grandfathers accomplished in Europe and Asia?"

Rather than tune this bluster out, as the country now does, let's try a thought experiment. Let's pretend everything Mr. Bush said is actually true and then hold him to his word. If the safety of America really depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad, then our safety is in grave peril because we are losing that battle. The security crackdown announced with great fanfare by Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki in June is failing. Rosy American claims of dramatically falling murder rates are being challenged by the Baghdad morgue. Perhaps most tellingly, the Pentagon has nowstopped including in its own tally the large numbers of victims killed by car bombings and mortar attacks in sectarian warfare.

And that's the good news. Another large slice of Iraq, Anbar Province (almost a third of the country), is slipping away so fast that a senior military official told NBC News last week that 50,000 to 60,000 additional ground forces were needed to secure it, despite our huge sacrifice in two savage battles for Falluja. The Iraqi troops "standing up" in Anbar are deserting at a rate as high as 40 percent.

"Even the most sanguine optimist cannot yet conclude we are winning," John Lehman, the former Reagan Navy secretary, wrote of the Iraq war last month. So what do we do next? Given that the current course is a fiasco, and that the White House demonizes any plan or timetable for eventual withdrawal as "cut and run," there's only one immediate alternative: add more manpower, and fast. Last week two conservative war supporters, William Kristol and Rich Lowry, called for exactly that — "substantially more troops." These pundits at least have the courage of Mr. Bush's convictions. Shouldn't Republicans in Congress as well?

After all, if what the president says is true about the stakes in Baghdad, it's tantamount to treason if Bill Frist, Rick Santorum and John Boehner fail to rally their party's Congressional majority to stave off defeat there. We can't emulate our fathers and grandfathers and whip today's Nazis and Communists with 145,000 troops. Roosevelt and Truman would have regarded those troop levels as defeatism.

The trouble, of course, is that we don't have any more troops, and supporters of the war, starting with Mr. Bush, don't want to ask American voters to make any sacrifices to provide them. They don't want to ask because they know the voters will tell them no. In the end, that is the hard truth the White House is determined to obscure, at least until Election Day, by carpet-bombing America with still more fictions about Iraq.

Ties To GOP Trumped Know-How Among Staff Sent To Rebuild Iraq (WP)

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Adapted from "Imperial Life in the Emerald City," by Rajiv Chandrasekaran, copyright Knopf 2006

After the fall of Saddam Hussein's government in April 2003, the opportunity to participate in the U.S.-led effort to reconstruct Iraq attracted all manner of Americans -- restless professionals, Arabic-speaking academics, development specialists and war-zone adventurers. But before they could go to Baghdad, they had to get past Jim O'Beirne's office in the Pentagon.

To pass muster with O'Beirne, a political appointee who screens prospective political appointees for Defense Department posts, applicants didn't need to be experts in the Middle East or in post-conflict reconstruction. What seemed most important was loyalty to the Bush administration.

O'Beirne's staff posed blunt questions to some candidates about domestic politics: Did you vote for George W. Bush in 2000? Do you support the way the president is fighting the war on terror? Two people who sought jobs with the U.S. occupation authority said they were even asked their views on Roe v. Wade .

Many of those chosen by O'Beirne's office to work for the Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran Iraq's government from April 2003 to June 2004, lacked vital skills and experience. A 24-year-old who had never worked in finance -- but had applied for a White House job -- was sent to reopen Baghdad's stock exchange. The daughter of a prominent neoconservative commentator and a recent graduate from an evangelical university for home-schooled children were tapped to manage Iraq's $13 billion budget, even though they didn't have a background in accounting.

The decision to send the loyal and the willing instead of the best and the brightest is now regarded by many people involved in the 3 1/2 -year effort to stabilize and rebuild Iraq as one of the Bush administration's gravest errors. Many of those selected because of their political fidelity spent their time trying to impose a conservative agenda on the postwar occupation, which sidetracked more important reconstruction efforts and squandered goodwill among the Iraqi people, according to many people who participated in the reconstruction effort.

The CPA had the power to enact laws, print currency, collect taxes, deploy police and spend Iraq's oil revenue. It had more than 1,500 employees in Baghdad at its height, working under America's viceroy in Iraq, L. Paul Bremer, but never released a public roster of its entire staff.

Interviews with scores of former CPA personnel over the past two years depict an organization that was dominated -- and ultimately hobbled -- by administration ideologues.

"We didn't tap -- and it should have started from the White House on down -- just didn't tap the right people to do this job," said Frederick Smith, who served as the deputy director of the CPA's Washington office. "It was a tough, tough job. Instead we got people who went out there because of their political leanings."

Endowed with $18 billion in U.S. reconstruction funds and a comparatively quiescent environment in the immediate aftermath of the U.S. invasion, the CPA was the U.S. government's first and best hope to resuscitate Iraq -- to establish order, promote rebuilding and assemble a viable government, all of which, experts believe, would have constricted the insurgency and mitigated the chances of civil war. Many of the basic tasks Americans struggle to accomplish today in Iraq -- training the army, vetting the police, increasing electricity generation -- could have been performed far more effectively in 2003 by the CPA.

But many CPA staff members were more interested in other things: in instituting a flat tax, in selling off government assets, in ending food rations and otherwise fashioning a new nation that looked a lot like the United States. Many of them spent their days cloistered in the Green Zone, a walled-off enclave in central Baghdad with towering palms, posh villas, well-stocked bars and resort-size swimming pools.

By the time Bremer departed in June 2004, Iraq was in a precarious state. The Iraqi army, which had been dissolved and refashioned by the CPA, was one-third the size he had pledged it would be. Seventy percent of police officers had not been screened or trained. Electricity generation was far below what Bremer had promised to achieve. And Iraq's interim government had been selected not by elections but by Americans. Divisive issues were to be resolved later on, increasing the chances that tension over those matters would fuel civil strife.

To recruit the people he wanted, O'Beirne sought rÃ©sumÃ©s from the offices of Republican congressmen, conservative think tanks and GOP activists. He discarded applications from those his staff deemed ideologically suspect, even if the applicants possessed Arabic language skills or postwar rebuilding experience.

Smith said O'Beirne once pointed to a young man's rÃ©sumÃ© and pronounced him "an ideal candidate." His chief qualification was that he had worked for the Republican Party in Florida during the presidential election recount in 2000.

O'Beirne, a former Army officer who is married to prominent conservative commentator Kate O'Beirne, did not respond to requests for comment.

He and his staff used an obscure provision in federal law to hire many CPA staffers as temporary political appointees, which exempted the interviewers from employment regulations that prohibit questions about personal political beliefs.

There were a few Democrats who wound up getting jobs with the CPA, but almost all of them were active-duty soldiers or State Department Foreign Service officers. Because they were career government employees, not temporary hires, O'Beirne's office could not query them directly about their political leanings.

One former CPA employee who had an office near O'Beirne's wrote an e-mail to a friend describing the recruitment process: "I watched rÃ©sumÃ©s of immensely talented individuals who had sought out CPA to help the country thrown in the trash because their adherence to 'the President's vision for Iraq' (a frequently heard phrase at CPA) was 'uncertain.' I saw senior civil servants from agencies like Treasury, Energy . . . and Commerce denied advisory positions in Baghdad that were instead handed to prominent RNC [Republican National Committee] contributors."

As more and more of O'Beirne's hires arrived in the Green Zone, the CPA's headquarters in Hussein's marble-walled former Republican Palace felt like a campaign war room. Bumper stickers and mouse pads praising President Bush were standard desk decorations. In addition to military uniforms and "Operation Iraqi Freedom" garb, "Bush-Cheney 2004" T-shirts were among the most common pieces of clothing.

"I'm not here for the Iraqis," one staffer noted to a reporter over lunch. "I'm here for George Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0064914

When Gordon Robison, who worked in the Strategic Communications office, opened a care package from his mother to find a book by Paul Krugman, a liberal New York Times columnist, people around him stared. "It was like I had just unwrapped a radioactive brick," he recalled.Finance Background Not Required

Twenty-four-year-old Jay Hallen was restless. He had graduated from Yale two years earlier, and he didn't much like his job at a commercial real-estate firm. His passion was the Middle East, and although he had never been there, he was intrigued enough to take Arabic classes and read histories of the region in his spare time.

He had mixed feelings about the war in Iraq, but he viewed the American occupation as a ripe opportunity. In the summer of 2003, he sent an e-mail to Reuben Jeffrey III, whom he had met when applying for a White House job a year earlier. Hallen had a simple query for Jeffrey, who was working as an adviser to Bremer: Might there be any job openings in Baghdad?

"Be careful what you wish for," Jeffrey wrote in response. Then he forwarded Hallen's resume to O'Beirne's office.

Three weeks later, Hallen got a call from the Pentagon. The CPA wanted him in Baghdad. Pronto. Could he be ready in three to four weeks?

The day he arrived in Baghdad, he met with Thomas C. Foley, the CPA official in charge of privatizing state-owned enterprises. (Foley, a major Republican Party donor, went to Harvard Business School with President Bush.) Hallen was shocked to learn that Foley wanted him to take charge of reopening the stock exchange.

"Are you sure?" Hallen said to Foley. "I don't have a finance background."

It's fine, Foley replied. He told Hallen that he was to be the project manager. He would rely on other people to get things done. He would be "the main point of contact."

Before the war, Baghdad's stock exchange looked nothing like its counterparts elsewhere in the world. There were no computers, electronic displays or men in colorful coats scurrying around on the trading floor. Trades were scrawled on pieces of paper and noted on large blackboards. If you wanted to buy or sell, you came to the exchange yourself and shouted your order to one of the traders. There was no air-conditioning. It was loud and boisterous. But it worked. Private firms raised hundreds of thousands of dollars by selling stock, and ordinary people learned about free enterprise.

The exchange was gutted by looters after the war. The first wave of American economic reconstruction specialists from the Treasury Department ignored it. They had bigger issues to worry about: paying salaries, reopening the banks, stabilizing the currency. But the brokers wanted to get back to work and investors wanted their money, so the CPA made the reopening a priority.

Quickly absorbing the CPA's ambition during the optimistic days before the insurgency flared, Hallen decided that he didn't just want to reopen the exchange, he wanted to make it the best, most modern stock market in the Arab world. He wanted to promulgate a new securities law that would make the exchange independent of the Finance Ministry, with its own bylaws and board of directors. He wanted to set up a securities and exchange commission to oversee the market. He wanted brokers to be licensed and listed companies to provide financial disclosures. He wanted to install a computerized trading and settlement system.

Iraqis cringed at Hallen's plan. Their top priority was reopening the exchange, not setting up computers or enacting a new securities law. "People are broke and bewildered," broker Talib Tabatabai told Hallen. "Why do you want to create enemies? Let us open the way we were."

Tabatabai, who held a doctorate in political science from Florida State University, believed Hallen's plan was unrealistic. "It was something so fancy, so great, that it couldn't be accomplished," he said.

But Hallen was convinced that major changes had to be enacted. "Their laws and regulations were completely out of step with the modern world," he said. "There was just no transparency in anything. It was more of a place for Saddam and his friends to buy up private companies that they otherwise didn't have a stake in."

Opening the stock exchange without legal and structural changes, Hallen maintained, "would have been irresponsible and short-sighted."

To help rewrite the securities law, train brokers and purchase the necessary computers, Hallen recruited a team of American volunteers. In the spring of 2004, Bremer approved the new law and simultaneously appointed the nine Iraqis selected by Hallen to become the exchange's board of governors.

The exchange's board selected Tabatabai as its chairman. The new securities law that Hallen had nursed into life gave the board control over the exchange's operations, but it didn't say a thing about the role of the CPA adviser. Hallen assumed that he'd have a part in decision-making until the handover of sovereignty. Tabatabai and the board, however, saw themselves in charge.

Tabatabai and the other governors decided to open the market as soon as possible. They didn't want to wait several more months for the computerized trading system to be up and running. They ordered dozens of dry-erase boards to be installed on the trading floor. They used such boards to keep track of buying and selling prices before the war, and that's how they'd do it again.

The exchange opened two days after Hallen's tour in Iraq ended. Brokers barked orders to floor traders, who used their trusty white boards. Transactions were recorded not with computers but with small chits written in ink. CPA staffers stayed away, afraid that their presence would make the stock market a target for insurgents.

When Tabatabai was asked what would have happened if Hallen hadn't been assigned to reopen the exchange, he smiled. "We would have opened months earlier. He had grand ideas, but those ideas did not materialize," Tabatabai said of Hallen. "Those CPA people reminded me of Lawrence of Arabia."'Loyalist' Replaces Public Health Expert

The hiring of Bremer's most senior advisers was settled upon at the highest levels of the White House and the Pentagon. Some, like Foley, were personally recruited by Bush. Others got their jobs because an influential Republican made a call on behalf of a friend or trusted colleague.

That's what happened with James K. Haveman Jr., who was selected to oversee the rehabilitation of Iraq's health care system.

Haveman, a 60-year-old social worker, was largely unknown among international health experts, but he had connections. He had been the community health director for the former Republican governor of Michigan, John Engler, who recommended him to Paul D. Wolfowitz, the deputy secretary of defense.

Haveman was well-traveled, but most of his overseas trips were in his capacity as a director of International Aid, a faith-based relief organization that provided health care while promoting Christianity in the developing world. Before his stint in government, Haveman ran a large Christian adoption agency in Michigan that urged pregnant women not to have abortions.

Haveman replaced Frederick M. Burkle Jr., a physician with a master's degree in public health and postgraduate degrees from Harvard, Yale, Dartmouth and the University of California at Berkeley. Burkle taught at the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health, where he specialized in disaster-response issues, and he was a deputy assistant administrator at the U.S. Agency for International Development, which sent him to Baghdad immediately after the war.

He had worked in Kosovo and Somalia and in northern Iraq after the 1991 Persian Gulf War. A USAID colleague called him the "single most talented and experienced post-conflict health specialist working for the United States government."

But a week after Baghdad's liberation, Burkle was informed he was being replaced. A senior official at USAID sent Burkle an e-mail saying the White House wanted a "loyalist" in the job. Burkle had a wall of degrees, but he didn't have a picture with the president.

Haveman arrived in Iraq with his own priorities. He liked to talk about the number of hospitals that had reopened since the war and the pay raises that had been given to doctors instead of the still-decrepit conditions inside the hospitals or the fact that many physicians were leaving for safer, better paying jobs outside Iraq. He approached problems the way a health care administrator in America would: He focused on preventive measures to reduce the need for hospital treatment.

He urged the Health Ministry to mount an anti-smoking campaign, and he assigned an American from the CPA team -- who turned out to be a closet smoker himself -- to lead the public education effort. Several members of Haveman's staff noted wryly that Iraqis faced far greater dangers in their daily lives than tobacco. The CPA's limited resources, they argued, would be better used raising awareness about how to prevent childhood diarrhea and other fatal maladies.

Haveman didn't like the idea that medical care in Iraq was free. He figured Iraqis should pay a small fee every time they saw a doctor. He also decided to allocate almost all of the Health Ministry's $793 million share of U.S. reconstruction funds to renovating maternity hospitals and building new community medical clinics. His intention, he said, was "to shift the mind-set of the Iraqis that you don't get health care unless you go to a hospital."

But his decision meant there were no reconstruction funds set aside to rehabilitate the emergency rooms and operating theaters at Iraqi hospitals, even though injuries from insurgent attacks were the country's single largest public health challenge.

Haveman also wanted to apply American medicine to other parts of the Health Ministry. Instead of trying to restructure the dysfunctional state-owned firm that imported and distributed drugs and medical supplies to hospitals, he decided to try to sell it to a private company.

To prepare it for a sale, he wanted to attempt something he had done in Michigan. When he was the state's director of community health, he sought to slash the huge amount of money Michigan spent on prescription drugs for the poor by limiting the medications doctors could prescribe for Medicaid patients. Unless they received an exemption, physicians could only prescribe drugs that were on an approved list, known as a formulary.

Haveman figured the same strategy could bring down the cost of medicine in Iraq. The country had 4,500 items on its drug formulary. Haveman deemed it too large. If private firms were going to bid for the job of supplying drugs to government hospitals, they needed a smaller, more manageable list. A new formulary would also outline new requirements about where approved drugs could be manufactured, forcing Iraq to stop buying medicines from Syria, Iran and Russia, and start buying from the United States.

He asked the people who had drawn up the formulary in Michigan whether they wanted to come to Baghdad. They declined. So he beseeched the Pentagon for help. His request made its way to the Defense Department's Pharmacoeconomic Center in San Antonio.

A few weeks later, three formulary experts were on their way to Iraq.

The group was led by Theodore Briski, a balding, middle-aged pharmacist who held the rank of lieutenant commander in the U.S. Navy. Haveman's order, as Briski remembered it, was: "Build us a formulary in two weeks and then go home." By his second day in Iraq, Briski came to three conclusions. First, the existing formulary "really wasn't that bad." Second, his mission was really about "redesigning the entire Iraqi pharmaceutical procurement and delivery system, and that was a complete change of scope -- on a grand scale." Third, Haveman and his advisers "really didn't know what they were doing."

Haveman "viewed Iraq as Michigan after a huge attack," said George Guszcza, an Army captain who worked on the CPA's health team. "Somehow if you went into the ghettos and projects of Michigan and just extended it out for the entire state -- that's what he was coming to save."

Haveman's critics, including more than a dozen people who worked for him in Baghdad, contend that rewriting the formulary was a distraction. Instead, they said, the CPA should have focused on restructuring, but not privatizing, the drug-delivery system and on ordering more emergency shipments of medicine to address shortages of essential medicines. The first emergency procurement did not occur until early 2004, after the Americans had been in Iraq for more than eight months.

Haveman insisted that revising the formulary was a crucial first step in improving the distribution of medicines. "It was unwieldy to order 4,500 different drugs, and to test and distribute them," he said.

When Haveman left Iraq, Baghdad's hospitals were as decrepit as the day the Americans arrived. At Yarmouk Hospital, the city's largest, rooms lacked the most basic equipment to monitor a patient's blood pressure and heart rate, operating theaters were without modern surgical tools and sterile implements, and the pharmacy's shelves were bare.

Nationwide, the Health Ministry reported that 40 percent of the 900 drugs it deemed essential were out of stock in hospitals. Of the 32 medicines used in public clinics for the management of chronic diseases, 26 were unavailable.

The new health minister, Aladin Alwan, beseeched the United Nations for help, and he asked neighboring nations to share what they could. He sought to increase production at a state-run manufacturing plant in the city of Samarra. And he put the creation of a new formulary on hold. To him, it was a fool's errand.

"We didn't need a new formulary. We needed drugs," he said. "But the Americans did not understand that."A 9/11 Hero's Public Relations Blitz

In May 2003, a team of law enforcement experts from the Justice Department concluded that more than 6,600 foreign advisers were needed to help rehabilitate Iraq's police forces.

The White House dispatched just one: Bernie Kerik.

Bernard Kerik had more star power than Bremer and everyone else in the CPA combined. Soldiers stopped him in the halls of the Republican Palace to ask for his autograph or, if they had a camera, a picture. Reporters were more interested in interviewing him than they were the viceroy.

Kerik had been New York City's police commissioner when terrorists attacked the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001. His courage (he shouted evacuation orders from a block away as the south tower collapsed), his stamina (he worked around the clock and catnapped in his office for weeks), and his charisma (he was a master of the television interview) turned him into a national hero. When White House officials were casting about for a prominent individual to take charge of Iraq's Interior Ministry and assume the challenge of rebuilding the Iraqi police, Kerik's name came up. Bush pronounced it an excellent idea.

Kerik had worked in the Middle East before, as the security director for a government hospital in Saudi Arabia, but he was expelled from the country amid a government investigation into his surveillance of the medical staff. He lacked postwar policing experience, but the White House viewed that as an asset.

Veteran Middle East hands were regarded as insufficiently committed to the goal of democratizing the region. Post-conflict experts, many of whom worked for the State Department, the United Nations or nongovernmental organizations, were deemed too liberal. Men such as Kerik -- committed Republicans with an accomplished career in business or government -- were ideal. They were loyal, and they shared the Bush administration's goal of rebuilding Iraq in an American image. With Kerik, there were bonuses: The media loved him, and the American public trusted him.

Robert Gifford, a State Department expert in international law enforcement, was one of the first CPA staff members to meet Kerik when he arrived in Baghdad. Gifford was the senior adviser to the Interior Ministry, which oversaw the police. Kerik was to take over Gifford's job.

"I understand you are going to be the man, and we are here to support you," Gifford told Kerik.

DOJ_NMG_0064917

"I'm here to bring more media attention to the good work on police because the situation is probably not as bad as people think it is," Kerik replied.

As they entered the Interior Ministry office in the palace, Gifford offered to brief Kerik. "It was during that period I realized he wasn't with me," Gifford recalled. "He didn't listen to anything. He hadn't read anything except his e-mails. I don't think he read a single one of our proposals."

Kerik wasn't a details guy. He was content to let Gifford figure out how to train Iraqi officers to work in a democratic society. Kerik would take care of briefing the viceroy and the media. And he'd be going out for a few missions himself.

Kerik's first order of business, less than a week after he arrived, was to give a slew of interviews saying the situation was improving. He told the Associated Press that security in Baghdad "is not as bad as I thought. Are bad things going on? Yes. But is it out of control? No. Is it getting better? Yes." He went on NBC's "Today" show to pronounce the situation "better than I expected." To Time magazine, he said that "people are starting to feel more confident. They're coming back out. Markets and shops that I saw closed one week ago have opened."

When it came to his own safety, Kerik took no chances. He hired a team of South African bodyguards, and he packed a 9mm handgun under his safari vest.

The first months after liberation were a critical period for Iraq's police. Officers needed to be called back to work and screened for Baath Party connections. They'd have to learn about due process, how to interrogate without torture, how to walk the beat. They required new weapons. New chiefs had to be selected. Tens of thousands more officers would have to be hired to put the genie of anarchy back in the bottle.

Kerik held only two staff meetings while in Iraq, one when he arrived and the other when he was being shadowed by a New York Times reporter, according to Gerald Burke, a former Massachusetts State Police commander who participated in the initial Justice Department assessment mission. Despite his White House connections, Kerik did not secure funding for the desperately needed police advisers. With no help on the way, the task of organizing and training Iraqi officers fell to U.S. military police soldiers, many of whom had no experience in civilian law enforcement.

"He was the wrong guy at the wrong time," Burke said later. "Bernie didn't have the skills. What we needed was a chief executive-level person. . . . Bernie came in with a street-cop mentality."

Kerik authorized the formation of a hundred-man Iraqi police paramilitary unit to pursue criminal syndicates that had formed since the war, and he often joined the group on nighttime raids, departing the Green Zone at midnight and returning at dawn, in time to attend Bremer's senior staff meeting, where he would crack a few jokes, describe the night's adventures and read off the latest crime statistics prepared by an aide. The unit did bust a few kidnapping gangs and car-theft rings, generating a stream of positive news stories that Kerik basked in and Bremer applauded. But the all-nighters meant Kerik wasn't around to supervise the Interior Ministry during the day. He was sleeping.

Several members of the CPA's Interior Ministry team wanted to blow the whistle on Kerik, but they concluded any complaints would be brushed off. "Bremer's staff thought he was the silver bullet," a member of the Justice Department assessment mission said. "Nobody wanted to question the [man who was] police chief during 9/11."

Kerik contended that he did his best in what was, ultimately, an untenable situation. He said he wasn't given sufficient funding to hire foreign police advisers or establish large-scale training programs.

Three months after he arrived, Kerik attended a meeting of local police chiefs in Baghdad's Convention Center. When it was his turn to address the group, he stood and bid everyone farewell. Although he had informed Bremer of his decision a few days earlier, Kerik hadn't told most of the people who worked for him. He flew out of Iraq a few hours later.

"I was in my own world," he said later. "I did my own thing."

How L. Paul Bremer's occupation paved the way for today's chaos in Baghdad.

IMPERIAL LIFE IN THE EMERALD CITY

Inside Iraq's Green Zone

By Rajiv Chandrasekaran

Knopf. 320 pp. $25.95

When President Bush announced in May 2003 that he was appointing L. Paul Bremer as the top U.S. civilian official in Iraq, I received an e-mail from one of his former business colleagues: "I just heard that Jerry [Bremer's nickname] will be running Iraq. And the Iraqis thought that the worst we could do was to bomb them."

DOJ_NMG_0064918

At the time, I just smiled and dismissed the message. Three years later, Rajiv Chandrasekaran's extraordinary book made me realize how tragically prescient that e-mail had been. Imperial Life in the Emerald City is full of jaw-dropping tales of the myriad large and small ways in which Bremer and his team poured fuel into the lethal cauldron that is today's Iraq. He was not alone and had many eager and powerful partners in Washington, Baghdad and elsewhere. Still, by reporting on daily life and decision making inside the Green Zone, the cloistered compound that housed Bremer's Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), Chandrasekaran shows how incomplete our conventional wisdom is about what went wrong in Iraq.

That common wisdom holds that while the decision to invade Iraq and topple Saddam Hussein is still open to debate, American mismanagement of the country after the invasion is not. Even the Bush administration's staunchest supporters now accept that "mistakes were made" and admit that, for example, dismantling the Iraqi army and driving out officials tied to the old dictatorship's Baath Party (both policies that Bremer championed) were bad ideas. But often implicit in this dominant interpretation is a complacent understanding, even a justification, of U.S. mistakes made during the occupation. After all, goes the thinking, ethnic divisions, suicidal Islamist fanatics, decades of oppression and decay, and all sorts of other obstacles conspired against the success of the bold American enterprise.

It is hard to hold that view after reading this book. Chandrasekaran, now an assistant managing editor of The Washington Post, was The Post's Baghdad bureau chief in 2003-04 and has a keen eye for the small detail that illuminates larger truths. He clearly suggests that the self-inflicted wounds created by CPA ineptitude, arrogance and ignorance were far from inevitable. Nor, he shows, were they minor causes of the mess the United States faces today in Iraq. Imperial Life in the Emerald City documents the way that an avalanche of unjustifiable mistakes transformed a difficult mission into an impossible one.

Take, for example, the story of Frederick M. Burkle Jr., a Navy reserve officer and physician with two Bronze Stars whom a colleague describes as "the single most talented and experienced post-conflict health specialist working for the United States government." Burkle was ousted a week after Baghdad's liberation because, he was told by his superiors, the White House preferred to have a Bush "loyalist" in charge of health matters in Iraq. Burkle was replaced (fully two months later) by James K. Haveman Jr., a social worker whose experience as the community-health director for Michigan's former Republican governor, John Engler, had followed a stint running "a large Christian adoption agency in Michigan that urged pregnant women not to have abortions." Haveman had also traveled widely "in his capacity as a director of International Aid, a faith-based relief organization that provided health care while promoting Christianity in the developing world." (That pro-life stance was not uncommon in the CPA: Two staffers report being asked during their job interviews if they supported the Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade ruling.) Chandrasekaran's rendition of Haveman's performance in Iraq makes for unnerving reading: the launch of an antismoking campaign while hospitals lacked pain killers; the emphasis on preventive medicine in a country ravaged by a bloody insurgency; an attempt to refashion Iraq's health care system with a U.S.-inspired model based on private providers, co-payments and primary care while newborns routinely died for lack of incubators.

Or take the case of Capt. John Smathers, a reservist and personal-injury lawyer charged with bringing some order to the chaotic traffic jams that ensued after U.S. authorities eliminated all import duties and the country was flooded by imported used cars. The solution? Download Maryland's motor-vehicle code from the Internet, translate it into Arabic and, after much haggling and revision, have Bremer sign it into law. CPA Order 86 included provisions such as, "Pedestrians walking during darkness or cloudy weather shall wear light or reflective clothing."

Micromanaging and emulating U.S. institutions was also the instinct of Jay Hallen, the clueless 24-year-old in charge of reopening the Baghdad stock market. His approach was to create one patterned after the New York Stock Exchange. (No, it didn't work.) Nor was Hallen the only inexperienced twentysomething CPA staffer given responsibilities for which he was utterly unprepared. Six of the "ten young gofers" that the CPA had requested from the Pentagon to handle minor administrative tasks found themselves managing Iraq's $13-billion budget. Where did the Pentagon recruit them? From the Heritage Foundation; they had sent their resumes there, looking for work in that conservative think tank.

When so much money is combined with organizational chaos, a state of emergency and the expectation that powerful friends in Washington would provide any needed cover, corruption is inevitable. Sure enough, Chandrasekaran offers tales of corruption among American contractors that read like dispatches from a kleptocratic banana republic.

Readers should avoid the temptation to dismiss Imperial Life in the Emerald City as yet another book documenting America's misadventures in Iraq. That of course it is, but the book offers more than a dispatch from the trenches. Chandrasekaran does not set out to score partisan points or unveil large geopolitical lessons; he is, essentially, a reporter telling readers what he saw. Yet it is impossible to read his book without thinking about the larger implications of the story he tells.

What caused the massive collapse of common sense that doomed the CPA and undermined the U.S. gamble in Iraq? That is the question that every page tacitly forces on the reader. American ingenuity, pragmatism and practical approaches to problem-solving are legendary. But Chandrasekaran shows that what reigned in Iraq was massive incompetence, patently unfeasible schemes, naive expectations and arrogance fueled by ignorance. His book methodically documents the baffling ineptitude that dominated U.S. attempts to influence Iraq's fiendish politics, rebuild the electrical grid, privatize the economy, run the oil industry, recruit expert staff or instill a modicum of normalcy to the lives of Iraqis. Nor are the book's complaints Monday-morning quarterbacking. The CPA's failings caused widespread grumbling at the time. Chandrasekaran tells of a message board on which some Marines had drawn a gravestone inscribed with the words "COMMON SENSE." The caption underneath it read: "Killed by the CPA."

Why? What happened? Chandrasekaran does not try to answer these questions directly. But his indispensable book offers powerful hints as to what the likely answers are. Bremer's regency suffered from too much unaccountable political power, too much carelessly spent money and too many ideological certitudes. Those conditions allowed incompetence, petty partisanship, patronage, nepotism and corruption to thrive. That is why "mistakes were made" -- and Chandrasekaran gets us away from that passive-voice formulation to show who, precisely, made them. Those mistakes go a long way toward explaining why success in Iraq is proving so tragically elusive. Â·

Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

THE CIRCULAR firing squad is the signature practice of the Democratic Party. Think of 1968, or 1972, or everything that happened during the Clinton presidency except impeachment, or the Howard Dean campaign. Democrats are never truly happy unless they're at each others' throats.

It has been a while since the Democratic Party had a good, old-fashioned internal bloodbath. The Bush years have had a unifying effect. But as Bush begins to recede from the scene, the prospect of controlling Congress looms and the presidential primaries appear over the horizon, the cherished habits are bound to resume.

In fact, the infighting has started. The new Democratic civil war, which is already burbling up in liberal magazines, blogs and opinion columns, centers on whether the Bush administration screwed up Iraq or whether the project was doomed to failure regardless.

This may sound like a trivial subject for a vicious ideological bloodbath. (Leave it to Democrats to tear each other to shreds over a counter-factual historical argument.) But it's actually a crucial question. At stake is nothing less than who gets to direct the party's foreign policy.

The liberal wing of the party has long been aware that although Democratic voters are generally dovish, the party's foreign policy elite is fairly hawkish. Liberals, understandably, want to depose that hawkish elite and replace it with a dovish one. Flynt Leverett, a foreign policy advisor to John Kerry, complained that "Democrats have fallen into a 'soft neoconservatism' that has dulled the party's voice on foreign policy." John Tirman, in his book, "100 Ways America Is Screwing Up the World," writes, "When I see a liberal hawk, I smell a rat."

The Iraq debacle (which most liberal hawks supported) has given the doves new ammunition. In some ways it resembles the fallout from the Vietnam War, when liberals such as George McGovern — who were skeptical of the Cold War — unseated the Kennedy-era hawks who had led the country into a quagmire in Southeast Asia. One difference between Vietnam and Iraq is that the former was conducted mostly by Democratic administrations, while the latter has been conducted by a Republican one. Liberal hawks (like me) believe that this mostly absolves us; it wasn't us who conducted this debacle.

Doves, naturally, want to hang the war around our necks anyway. They say blaming Bush is a cop-out. Last year, Sam Rosenfeld and Matthew Yglesias wrote an article in the American Prospect attacking those who fault the conduct of the Iraq war. "Administration bungling," they wrote, "is simply not the root source of America's failure in Iraq." Those hawks who believe otherwise, they wrote, are engaging in what they called the "incompetence dodge" — a phrase that continues to circulate among liberal doves.

The argument that the Iraq war had no chance to succeed has an undeniable surface appeal. Things are going so badly there that it's hard to imagine how it could have turned out differently.

But the more we learn about the war's conduct, the more we learn that the administration didn't just make the normal sorts of mistakes that inevitably occur in wartime; it was almost criminally negligent. The Bush administration literally refused to do any planning for the occupation. They invaded before all the available troops were in place, staffed the Coalition Provisional Authority with underqualified hacks vetted solely on the basis of ideological loyalty and rashly disbanded the Iraqi army, which could have provided some early order.

One might counter that none of this was really decisive because Iraq is so deeply riven with sectarian feuds that brutal fighting between Sunnis and Shiites was inevitable. But this misunderstands a lot about human behavior. When the authority of government dissolves, people retreat to the safety of tribal solidarity, and under such conditions they can do savage things of which they never thought themselves capable. Once the expectation of chaos sets in, it can spiral out of control.

Many doves on the left and right looked at the savagery in Sarajevo in the 1990s and saw a never-ending tribal war, but in fact Serbs, Bosnians and Croats had peacefully coexisted in a multiethnic city for decades.

Even in the United States we have seen outbreaks of racial violence and looting in Bensonhurst, Crown Heights and elsewhere. This doesn't mean blacks and whites are doomed to fight a race war.

The funny thing is that, in other contexts, liberals don't dispute the notion that Bush administration incompetence caused otherwise preventable catastrophes. Almost no liberal believes otherwise when it comes to, say, the response to Hurricane Katrina. If Bush could have bungled Katrina this badly, isn't it just possible he could have done the same thing in Iraq?

Iraq Stumbling In Bid To Purge Its Rogue Police (NYT)

By Edward Wong And Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 16 — Shiite militiamen and criminals entrenched throughout Iraq's police and internal security forces are blocking recent efforts by some Iraqi leaders and the American military to root them out, a step critical to winning the trust of skeptical Sunni Arabs and quelling the sectarian conflict, Iraqi and Western officials say.

The new interior minister, Jawad al-Bolani, who oversees the police, lacks the political support to purge many of the worst offenders, including senior managers who tolerated or encouraged the infiltration of Shiite militias into the police under the previous government, according to interviews with more than a dozen officials who work with the ministry and the police.

No one expected a housecleaning to be easy, and some headway has been made in firing people. But despite that progress, recent difficulties reveal the magnitude of the task facing Mr. Bolani and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. When he took office in late May, Mr. Maliki said one of his top goals was to reform the Shiite-led Interior Ministry, which had, to the minority Sunni Arabs, become synonymous with government complicity in abduction, torture and killing.

The ministry recently discovered that more than 1,200 policemen and other employees had been convicted years ago of murder, rape and other violent crimes, said a Western diplomat who has close contact with the ministry. Some were even on death row. Few have been fired.

Despite the importance American commanders place on hiring more Sunni Arabs for the overwhelmingly Shiite police force, the ministry still has no way to screen recruits by sect or for militia allegiance. Such loyalties are the root cause of the ministry's problems.

A senior American commander said that of the 27 paramilitary police battalions, "we think 5 or 6 battalions probably have leaders that have led that part of the organization in a way that is either criminal or sectarian or both."

Death squads in uniforms could be responsible for the recent surge in sectarian violence, with at least 165 bodies found across Baghdad since Wednesday.

There is little accountability. The government has stopped allowing joint Iraqi and American teams to inspect Iraqi prisons. No senior ministry officials have been prosecuted on charges of detainee mistreatment, in spite of fresh discoveries of abuse and torture, including a little-reported case involving children packed into a prison of more than 1,400 inmates. Internal investigations into secret prisons, corruption and other potential criminal activity are often blocked.

The Americans view an overhaul of the Ministry of the Interior as a crucial step in helping rein in the growing sectarian conflict.

"I think there are some definite issues in the M.O.I.," Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the second-ranking commander in Iraq, said in an interview. "I think there probably needs to be some leadership changes. But I know the minister of interior himself is working those."

Mr. Bolani, a Shiite engineer appointed last May, sincerely wants to purge the ministry of Shiite partisans brought in by his predecessor, the officials interviewed said. But his independence from powerful Shiite political leaders — the very quality that earned him the job — also means Mr. Bolani has limited power to remove politically connected subordinates and enact changes.

"He's got to be careful about what he does, just to stay alive," the Western diplomat said.

An American adviser to the ministry said Mr. Bolani was unavailable for an interview last week.

A New Security Plan

Some tentative progress has been made under the new government. Death squads in police uniforms no longer kidnap and kill with absolute impunity in parts of Sunni-dominated western Baghdad, many Iraqis say. The American military estimates there was a 52 percent drop in the daily rate of execution-style killings from July to August.

DOJ_NMG_0064921

Officials attribute the decline to a new Baghdad security plan, more police oversight by American trainers and policy changes in the ministry. Military officials say the killings in the past week took place in neighborhoods not yet cleared out by security sweeps and are not necessarily the work of policemen — imposters are rife throughout Iraq.

"The performance has improved slightly," said Ayad al-Samarraie, a legislator and senior official in the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni Arab group that is sharply critical of the Interior Ministry. "Less people are kidnapped, and there are less raids by the militias on the people."

Brig. Gen. Abdul Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the ministry had fired 1,500 employees since June. They include senior officers like the police chief of Anbar Province. Mr. Bolani is pushing to enact a law that would ban the ministry's 167,000 employees from belonging to a political party.

Yet, a powerful official suspected of aiding the Shiite militias, Adnan al-Asadi — nicknamed Triple A by the Americans — still holds the job of deputy minister of administration. Mr. Asadi is "the one who really runs the M.O.I.," said Saleh Mutlak, a Sunni Arab legislator. Mr. Bolani wants to oust Mr. Asadi but does not have the political backing to do so, leaving American advisers frustrated, said an American official who was not authorized to talk publicly on the subject and spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Mr. Asadi supports the ministry's inspector general, whom the advisers consider wholly ineffective. American advisers set up an internal affairs unit late last year to conduct honest in-house inquiries. But the two offices feud, and the internal affairs unit lacks full authority to investigate the police in the provinces.

A recent fingerprinting campaign throughout the ministry showed that 1,228 police officers and ministry employees had been convicted of violent crimes under Saddam Hussein's government, said the Western diplomat, who spoke only on the condition of anonymity because of protocol. A handful had been sentenced to death.

"These are rapists, murderers, drug dealers," the diplomat said. "The impression I got is that there are a lot more out there."

Mr. Bolani has said he intends to fire some of them. But a complete purging of the ministry's most criminally violent employees is impossible, the diplomat said, because "they're going to go straight to the militias, or set up their own criminal gangs."

Even top Pentagon officials now acknowledge the ministry's deeply rooted dysfunctions. "Corruption, illegal activity and sectarian bias have constrained progress in developing M.O.I. forces," according to a Pentagon report issued to Congress at the end of August. "Inappropriate tolerance of and infiltration by Shia militias, some of which are influenced by Iran, is the primary concern of the government of Iraq."

Trouble With Elite Units

Since May, when Shiite politicians fought to keep control of the ministry under the new government, the ministry's total force has grown to more than 167,000 from 146,000. It is divided into 118,000 regular police officers, 24,400 paramilitary troops and 24,700 border guards.

Of those, the paramilitary units now called the national police are the most feared. Under Bayan Jabr, a conservative Shiite politician who was Mr. Bolani's predecessor, fighters from the two most powerful Shiite militias, the Badr Organization and the Mahdi Army, were recruited into the ranks of those elite units.

Assaults on civilians by gunmen in paramilitary uniforms have continued in some predominantly Sunni or mixed areas of Baghdad.

A woman who asked to be identified as Umm Shahad said in an interview that her 24-year-old son, a Sunni Arab, was recently taken from his car at a checkpoint run by paramilitary officers in their neighborhood, Jihad. She said she went to the unit's local stationhouse and to the Interior Ministry to search for him. Officials at each place said they had no idea where he was. "These were real commandos," she said of her son's abductors. "We are so afraid."

Col. Damon Penn, the senior American adviser to the national police's 9,000-member Second Division, acknowledged that "there are still some militias operating within the national police."

"I think there are some individuals and small cells that they need to purge to make this a truly governmental force," he said. But progress had been made, he insisted.

So suspect are the national police that the American military and Iraqi Army began inspections of each battalion in August. The reviews include recording the serial numbers of all national police weapons and vehicles. Twelve battalions have already been inspected, and the rest are to be completed by October, when the units will get new blue uniforms.

Each brigade will be pulled from the field and put through a six-week training course in policing and the rule of law, Colonel Penn said.

Four of the eight police brigades are to be deployed soon from Baghdad to the provinces, so building public confidence in them is critical.

Prisoner Abuse by the Police

DOJ_NMG_0064922

The Iraqi and American inspectors assigned to the police prison known as Site 4 found themselves walking through a chamber of horrors at the end of May.

More than 1,400 prisoners had been packed into a small area by the Wolf Brigade, a national police unit accused of abuses by Sunni Arabs.

Prisoners with "lesions resulting from torture" were found during the inspection in eastern Baghdad on May 30, as was "equipment used for this purpose," according to a human rights report recently released by the United Nations mission here.

Some prisoners had been beaten, others bound and hung by their arms, an American officer said. There were at least 37 children or teenagers.

The discovery showed that torture by the police was still rampant despite promises by government officials to end it. Right after Site 4 was examined, the government stopped allowing joint Iraqi and American teams to inspect Iraqi prisons.

American commanders and Iraqi human rights officials say the treatment of detainees remains troubling. "New evidence has continued to emerge pointing to torture and other cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment in detention centers," the United Nations report said.

The Ministry of Human Rights reported that 4,331 detainees were being held in Interior Ministry prisons as of Aug. 31. Yet no one has a clear estimate of the number of prisons run by the Interior Ministry, because some elite police brigades operate detention centers on their bases.

The Second Division of the national police, for instance, holds 250 detainees in four cramped rooms at Camp Justice, the division headquarters in northern Baghdad. That number is down from 650 last March. But American advisers there recently found 12 prisoners with bruises and black eyes.

The possible existence of secret prisons like the torture compound discovered in the Jadriya neighborhood last year continues to worry American commanders.

"It's obviously a concern," said Brig. Gen. Dana J. H. Pittard, who is in charge of the operational training of the national police. "The pessimistic side of me says they exist."

Crowding and a lack of access to judges are widespread problems, despite Mr. Maliki's order for a mass prisoner release in June, said Wijdan M. Salim, the minister of human rights. Detainees can languish in prison for months before seeing a judge. Some in Camp Justice have gone six months without appearing before a judge.

Sectarianism and the Police

As long as police units remain overwhelmingly Shiite, the distrust of them that is prevalent among Sunni Arabs will be tough to overcome, Sunni leaders say. Yet, Mr. Bolani has avoided putting in place a policy that would diversify or even track the sectarian makeup of police units and recruits. A ministry spokesman said Mr. Bolani preferred not to think in those terms.

But General Chiarelli, the senior American commander, said: "I'm concerned with some of the ethnic makeup of some of the stations. Our goal was to take a look at that, to work with the minister of interior to get a balance, because I think that's absolutely essential."

The weaknesses in having an unrepresentative police force became more evident this summer. In one incident, American and Iraqi commanders tried to move the headquarters of a national police brigade from eastern Baghdad, which is mostly Shiite, to Dora, an extremely volatile area that is majority Sunni. A fifth of the 1,500 members quit, Colonel Penn said. "There are some dedicated Sunni areas that the Shia aren't comfortable going into, and vice versa," he said.

The Americans have pushed the ministry to change the Shiite makeup of the national police by filling academy classes with Sunni Arabs. The Second Division was only 7 or 8 percent Sunni Arab at the start of the summer. It is now 20 percent Sunni.

The Iraqi population is estimated to be 60 percent Shiite Arab, 20 percent Sunni Arab and 20 percent Kurd. Asked what the breakdown of the overall police force was, General Chiarelli said he was trying to find out himself.

Getting the balance right is "absolutely critical," he said, because hostility among Sunni Arabs is still high.

In the southern half of the Ghazaliya neighborhood, a mostly Sunni area in northwest Baghdad, "there is no trust between the people and the Iraqi police," said a man who called himself Abu Jafr, a guard at a sewage pumping station surrounded by small lakes of raw waste.

"Every time the Iraqi police come to the neighborhood, they get shot at, because people here think they're from the militias," he said.

To help change that perception, American commanders across Baghdad are trying a new tactic: having neighborhood police units work alongside Iraqi Army units, which enjoy a modicum of trust even among Sunni Arabs. The Americans have also placed an advisory team in most of the city's police stations.

At the main station in Ghazaliya, staffed almost entirely by Shiite officers, a group of policemen and Iraqi Army soldiers prepared to roll out on a joint patrol on a recent afternoon. The American battalion commander of the area, Lt. Col. Avanulas

Smiley, pointed to the vehicles as he strode from his armored carrier into the walled compound. “That is huge for the Ghazaliyans to see,” he said.

A few days later, six headless bodies turned up in the neighborhood. No one knew who was responsible.

Where Iraq Itself Finds Hope (WP)

By Barham Salih

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

From my experiences visiting the United States, it is easy for me to understand how disappointed and saddened Americans must be at the scenes of violence from Iraq. For Iraq's leaders, the carnage is a source of deep frustration. The pace of what we can achieve, relative to what we aspire to, is simply not what the people of Iraq and the generous people of the United States deserve.

We must change the dynamic of violence. The Iraqi government has undertaken a searching analysis and is responding with a strategy on two fronts: national and international.

We have a sense of urgency, but we refuse to give in to panic. While it is important to highlight the progress made, particularly given the extremely pessimistic tone of debate in Washington, we know we must confront many grave challenges. The unrelenting security problem, sectarian polarization, corruption and the inability of the government to deliver services are all threats to the transition. They could prove fatal if not dealt with urgently.

We Iraqis must recognize that it is up to us to resolve our problems. Outsiders cannot deliver for us. The Iraqi leadership must assume responsibility, deal with these challenges and turn the tide. This can be done by Iraqis, but they will undoubtedly need sustained support from the international community and particularly the United States.

The key planks of the national side of our strategy -- embodied in a "national compact" -- are national reconciliation, democratic federalism, political inclusion and a fair and rational oil policy. To achieve these things, the Iraqi Policy Council on National Security, composed of key elected officials, has adopted an intensive legislative timetable. This agenda is vital: It is the political part of our approach to ending the violence.

We have imposed a tough timetable because we owe it to our own people to press harder and to advance, no matter how intense the assault upon us by the terrorists. For example, this month we should pass our investment law and establish a Parliamentary Commission for the Review of the Constitution. Next month the parliament should vote on legislation to reform the de-Baathification commission. In December it should pass legislation on disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of former combatants.

These laws will move us toward a viable political equilibrium inside Iraq. Because Iraq is an inherently diverse country we need a balance that protects diversity and encourages a voluntary, democratic, federal national unity. This will benefit the entire region.

For most of its existence as a modern state, Iraq was profoundly unbalanced politically. Power was concentrated in the hands of the few, the benefits of the state denied to the many. The liberation of Iraq in 2003 temporarily created a new, if fundamentally democratic, imbalance. Almost overnight, the Kurds and Shiite Arabs were enfranchised, while many -- too many -- Sunni Arabs did not participate in the new political process.

We must defend diversity. Those responsible for the violence, the Baathist-jihadist terrorist axis, hate and reject diversity and democracy. They seek supremacy and theocracy.

Yet another force that the national compact must address is the disequilibrium that comes from majoritarianism. This is an issue not just for Iraq but for its regions, because those who are a majority in one part of the country are a minority in other areas. To prevent tyranny of the majority, Iraq now has a bill of rights that requires practical political enforcement.

Balance is critical. Without it, there could be disintegration of the country. Within the national reconciliation program outlined by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, we must seek balance on de-Baathification -- balance between the need for justice for the victims of the Saddam Hussein regime and the need to politically rehabilitate those whose crimes were not beyond the pale.

Similarly, in our counterterrorism and anti-militia strategy, we must balance political and security measures. There is no pure security solution to the terrorism and militia challenges -- just as there is no neat, "politics only" way of settling these issues. We need both approaches. The door to the political process must always remain open; our security forces must be ever vigilant.

The second part of our strategy is international. The Iraqi government understands that it must end terrorist violence not just for Iraq's sake but also for the region. If Iraq plunges into a full-blown civil war, so will the rest of the Middle East. This is not a theory but a fact that our wiser neighbors comprehend.

Resolved to avoid past mistakes, we announced the plan for an "International Compact With Iraq" in a statement with the United Nations on July 27. At a recent productive meeting in the United Arab Emirates, with the assistance of the United Nations, Iraq sat down with other interested parties to develop this compact.

It involves a road map for economic development. In a nation weaned on war, we need to give the bored young men of Iraq employment and the pride that comes from hard work -- instead of the easy swagger of the gunman. We should invest our oil revenue in infrastructure. We must aim to create jobs and distribute the benefits of the current oil boom widely.

We want a partnership, not unconditional aid. We are adopting a structured plan for economic development, not issuing a laundry list of financial demands. In utilities and hydrocarbons there has to be transparency and accountability, a dialogue between the federal government and the federal regions and equitable development.

Moreover, we are promising clear targets for economic restructuring, accompanied by mechanisms for intelligence cooperation and security coordination. Such an approach, with broad international support, is something new and, we hope, a harbinger of a Middle East characterized by cooperation, not conflict.

Oops, There Goes Basra (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Abdul Razzaq Al-saiedi

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq

ABDUL AZIZ AL-HAKIM wears the black turban signifying descent from the prophet Muhammad. He leads a powerful Shiite party with close ties to Iran. And he heads the United Iraqi Alliance, the Shiite coalition that has been the dominant force in post-invasion Iraqi politics.

Yet early this month this powerful leader made what some politicians here thought a rookie mistake. He tried — and failed — to rush through Parliament a bill giving Shiite-dominated provinces in southern Iraq a procedure to form autonomous states that could take control of much of Iraq's oil reserves.

When his bid failed, it appeared to unmask a weakness that emboldened his opponents to fight him harder on the larger issue: how soon autonomous regions can be formed in Iraq. Instead of a quick decision, he got a protracted debate that continued into the weekend.

The slipup shows how steep the learning curve may be for Iraq's legislators — even the most wily — as they observe democratic procedures.

"He obviously lost this round," said Adnan Pachachi, a secular Sunni Arab and former Iraqi foreign minister. "That's not a good thing for a politician. And he lost because many people in his own alliance were against him."

Even by the standards of the Iraqi Parliament, the argument was nasty. The Sunni speaker, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, accused supporters of the proposal of trying to sneak it past him. Other Sunni leaders hinted that the legislation could lead them to pull out of the so-called unity government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds.

Those objections were not a surprise. Everyone knew Sunni Arabs are desperately afraid that Iraq will be split into three parts and leave them with little oil.

The surprise was how quickly and widely Mr. Hakim's gambit seemed to unite others against him, including a substantial portion of his own Shiite coalition that has its own doubts about moving quickly to regional autonomy. These legislators include a faction led by Moktada al-Sadr, the firebrand cleric who has wide support among Shiites in city slums and poor rural regions and is a rival of Mr. Hakim's for power in the coalition.

Regardless of whether the federalism proposal eventually passes, the fight has now exposed the divisions within the Shiite coalition in the Parliament itself, and it has illustrated the growth of Mr. Sadr's influence relative to Mr. Hakim.

Mr. Hakim's party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or Sciri, wants the Shiite-dominated southern provinces to be allowed to form one huge autonomous state, beneath which would lie billions of barrels of oil.

But other Shiite parties, some analysts say, are hesitant to back so grand a vision because such a huge autonomous region could one day fall under the sway of one party — Mr. Hakim's. And that could marginalize the power of others like the Sadr and Fadhila parties, whose support is more concentrated in distinct areas.

Those loyal to Mr. Hakim contend he will ultimately prevail on the federalism proposal, which has the support of the Kurdish political bloc. They say meetings of political leaders in coming days may lead to a deal as soon as Tuesday. But even they admit this is not for certain.

"We are still in the middle of discussions," said Haitham al-Husseini, an adviser to Mr. Hakim. A Sunni sense of indignity figures strongly in those discussions. The new Constitution allows federal states, but it was approved in last October's referendum only after Sunni leaders won a provision requiring Parliament to reconsider provisions promptly that troubled the Sunnis. The charter also requires Parliament to define, by a set deadline, how autonomous regions could be formed. Neither has happened.

DOJ_NMG_0064925

Mr. Husseini denied that Mr. Hakim's party had tried to rush the bill through. "In fact, we think it is a bit late," he said, citing the time limit in the Constitution.

But Basim Sharif, a leader of the Fadhila Party, says Iraq needs better security, and political and social foundations before autonomous states form.

So the opposition can take heart that it has delayed the proposal. The Sadr coalition takes the position that any move to split Iraq into federal states should be delayed until the "occupiers" — meaning the Americans — leave.

"We know the Americans interfere even in minor things," said Bahaa al-Aaraji, a top Sadr aide. "What about an important issue like federalism?" There is no room for compromise, he says. "We refuse it. That's it."

As Deaths Rise, Sunnis Criticize Baghdad Plan (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 16 — Dozens more bodies have been discovered in Baghdad in the past two days, bringing the four-day total to at least 165 and prompting some Sunni Arab leaders to raise new questions about the recent security operation intended take back Baghdad from the insurgents, deaths squads and militias who have been waging sectarian warfare.

"If the result of the security plan is an increase in bodies and killings according to their identification, I think it moves toward a catastrophe," said Dhafir al-Ani, a senior member of the main Sunni Arab political bloc in Parliament.

At least 21 bodies were discovered throughout the capital on Saturday after 35 were found Friday, Iraqi police officials said.

Most of those bodies were found between 6 a.m. Friday and 6 a.m. Saturday, according to an Interior Ministry official. He said many victims had clear signs of torture or had been blindfolded, gagged or shot in the head at close range.

On Thursday, the senior American military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, said scores of mutilated bodies found in the middle of the week appeared to be "from murder execution-style type activity." He said the rise in killings was occurring in parts of Baghdad where American forces had not swept through as part of the new security push.

A senior Iraqi police spokesman, Brig. Gen. Abdul Karim Khalaf, said in an interview on Saturday that the bodies discovered over the past two days were being found "all over Baghdad." He blamed "insurgents, Al Qaeda, and groups related to the Baath Party." These perpetrators, he said, "know how to kill and how to torture."

Yet Sunni Arab leaders have voiced increasing concern that the Iraqi government has failed to crack down on death squads linked to Shiite militias that have run rampant since the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra in February unleashed a wave of sectarian violence.

"The government should be brave this time and work seriously to end the militias that now work freely" throughout the capital, Mr. Ani said in an interview on Saturday. Many people who are killed are not identified, or the government never announces their names, he said, adding, "The real number of the people who are killed is more than what is announced."

48 More Bodies Found Dumped In Baghdad (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Most of the victims were bound, tortured and shot, the Interior Ministry says. Bombings and gun battles around Iraq add to the toll.

BAGHDAD — Police said Saturday that they had recovered 48 bodies throughout Baghdad, bringing the toll from clandestine killings since Monday to about 190 people, most of them shot execution-style.

The vast majority of the bodies found during a 24-hour period in Baghdad were of young men who had been tortured, blindfolded and handcuffed before being shot several times, said Capt. Mohammed Hanoon of the Interior Ministry.

Securing the capital has become the top priority for American commanders in Iraq, who have deployed an additional 8,000 troops there in an effort to halt escalating sectarian violence.

To prevent fighters from entering Baghdad and to counter trafficking of explosives and arms, U.S. and Iraqi security forces are digging ditches and building berms around the capital, creating a 60-mile security perimeter, U.S. officials say.

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman, said Saturday that the plan would also use existing topographical features such as canals and rivers to stem the flow of contraband.

In the past, the military has built sand barriers around cities such as Fallouja and Tall Afar before major combat operations there. But Baghdad is a far more complex problem.

The deadliest threat is not explosives or large-scale attacks by Sunni-led insurgents but rather secret executions. Shiite-dominated Iraqi security forces have been accused of carrying out systematic killings of Sunni residents in the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0064926

During a news conference Saturday, Iraqi Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul Khalaf said digging a trench around Baghdad was just one idea among many.

"It's still under discussion," he said.

As police recovered the bodies Saturday, several bombs targeted civilians, politicians and security forces in the capital.

In one attack, insurgents had allegedly placed explosives in or near a corpse, detonating the bomb when the Iraqi army arrived to pick up the body. One soldier died and three people were injured.

Armed men attacked police at a Baghdad checkpoint near the Sheraton Hotel, starting a gun battle with hotel guards, authorities said.

Meanwhile, a suicide attacker killed one civilian and injured 22 in an attack on a police station in the Dora neighborhood of southern Baghdad.

North of Baghdad near Baqubah, a bomb exploded near a police patrol, killing three officers and injuring one.

A second bomb — left in a bag near a downtown shopping area — killed one person and injured four.

A third bomb killed three police officers and injured two in Zafarniya.

In Saddam Hussein's hometown, Tikrit, north of Baghdad, police and witnesses described intense fighting involving rifles, machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades.

One witness, Salim Shammari, a 43-year-old taxi driver, said he watched four armed men attack the municipal building, which was guarded by American troops.

Four armed men "shouted to everybody to leave the place," Shammari said.

They were well armed, he said.

"One of them said, 'We do not want anybody to stay here,' " Shammari recalled. "We immediately ran away." Hiding in a house, he heard fierce shooting, he said.

Police Lt. Saad Jabir said the gun battle injured several people.

Farther north, in the oil-rich city of Kirkuk, a roadside bomb exploded near a police patrol; the casualty toll was unclear. Gunmen also attacked a police checkpoint on the northern highway between Hawija and Kirkuk, injuring two policemen, officials said. Two attackers also died.

Explosions Kill 17 In Baghdad; Maliki Appeals For Unity (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal/AP, September 17, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- After a one-day lull, bloodshed surged again in the capital Saturday, with at least 17 people dead in attacks and 27 probable victims of sectarian killings found dumped in the streets as Iraq's prime minister launched a fresh appeal for reconciliation.

Violence has escalated sharply in Baghdad over the past week, except for Friday, when only three killings were recorded -- two Iraqis shot to death and a U.S. soldier killed by a bomb. Saturday's toll raised the city's violent deaths to more than 180 just since Wednesday -- either slain by bombs and gunfire or tortured and shot before being dumped, a hallmark of reprisal killings being waged between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki urged Iraqis Saturday to cast aside their sectarian, ethnic and political differences and embrace his national reconciliation plan. The appeal came as Iraqi security forces announced they will dig trenches around Baghdad in an attempt to prevent insurgents and explosive-laden cars from getting into the sprawling city of 6 million.

The U.S. military confirmed Saturday that there was a plan in progress to create a "security belt" around the capital. "There is a plan in progress for a security belt around Baghdad that includes trenches and other obstacles for channeling exit from and entry to the city through checkpoints controlled by Iraqi forces. This is a cooperative effort between the Iraqi government and the Coalition," said Lt Col. Barry Johnson, a spokesman for Multinational Forces in Iraq.

See continuing coverage2 of developments in Iraq, including an interactive map3 of major insurgent attacks.

The trenches are intended to curb attacks such as three car bombings Saturday morning in Baghdad that killed at least nine people and wounded dozens.

"No one should be part of the national reconciliation plan unless they recognize others, accept them as partners and totally reject any sectarian, ethnic or political differences," Mr. Maliki told a gathering of Iraqi non-governmental organizations

Addressing groups that represent children orphaned by terrorism and those disabled by war, Mr. Maliki said it was the responsibility of all Iraqis to join the effort. "National reconciliation is a correct way of thinking and carries a high feeling of responsibility," Mr. Maliki said. "To succeed in this today, we have to embrace the culture of dialogue and reconciliation."

Mr. Maliki unveiled a 24-point reconciliation plan in June that he hopes will bridge the religious, ethnic and political divisions feeding Iraq's violence. The plan includes an offer of amnesty to members of the Sunni Arab-led insurgency not involved in terrorist activities, and calls for disarming primarily Shiite sectarian militias.

But no major Sunni Arab insurgent group has publicly agreed to join the plan, and many Shiite militias are controlled by legislators themselves. Car bombings, mortar attacks and shootings have killed hundreds of Iraqis the past few weeks.

Mr. Maliki said that once the plan managed to create an "atmosphere of reconciliation and dialogue," his government would take decisions based on the views expressed both by NGO's and tribal leaders -- who last month agreed to back his effort.

"These decisions will be historic and they should be shouldered by all the groups participating in the political process, because participation means sharing responsibilities. There are no rights without a price. Those who do not take the responsibly of defending the state and its laws will would no longer be our partners in the political process."

In Saturday's violence, gunmen killed the former spokesman of a defunct political coalition that included Shiite, Sunni, Kurdish and independent parties. Mohammed Shihab al-Dulaimi was shot in central Baghdad, the leader of the Iraqi Accordance Front, Adnan Al-Duleymi, said.

A suicide car bomb aimed at U.S. and Iraqi vehicles in the capital's southern Dora district killed three Iraqis who were shopping in a market and wounded 19 people, police 1st Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razaq said. He said another car bomb killed two soldiers and a civilian downtown.

Police also reported three policemen slain by a car bomb, the shooting deaths of two civilians in separate incidents, and three civilians killed by two roadside bombs. Gunmen also killed three civilians and wounded eight in a drive-by shooting in central Baghdad, Lt. Bilal Ali Mejeed of the Risafa police station said.

In the volatile western city of Ramadi, meanwhile, a suicide bomber on a motorcycle killed three Iraqi policemen outside a hospital and a car bomb killed four officers at a checkpoint, a police official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media..

Inspired by Islamic history, the plan for a ditch around Baghdad is the newest twist in what has so far been a losing battle to prevent suicide car bombs and other weapons from being smuggled into the capital.

"Trenches will be dug around Baghdad in the coming weeks," the Interior Ministry spokesman, Brig. Abdul-Kareem Khalaf, told the Associated Press on Friday. "They will surround Baghdad." He provided no details of what distance the trenches would cover, nor how deep or wide they would be. It is about 60 miles around the edge of the city.

In Washington, U.S. President George W. Bush also mentioned a new plan to safeguard Baghdad -- but he spoke of using an earthen mound rather than a ditch.

Brig. Khalaf said the trench plan would restrict vehicle and pedestrian traffic to just 28 entry points, all with guarded checkpoints. Similar checkpoints are set up now on some central routes through Baghdad, including the highway to the airport, but they need hundreds of soldiers to man them.

He said the plan was inspired by the Battle of Khandaq -- Arabic for Battle of the Trench -- in 627, during which Prophet Muhammad protected the city of Medina from an army by digging trenches.

Vehicle bombs have killed at least 960 Iraqis and wounded 2,763 in Baghdad this year, according to an AP count. That's just over a fifth of the city's deaths from war-related violence and nearly a half of its wounded. Most of the car bombs are thought to be assembled in areas just south of Baghdad, in the so-called Triangle of Death.

There have been past operations seeking to prevent bombs from being smuggled into the capital. The first such plan -- Operation Lightning -- was launched with much fanfare in May 2005. More than 40,000 Iraqi police and soldiers, backed by U.S. troops and air support. But they failed to cut down on bombings.

A year later, as killings in Baghdad surged, a joint U.S.-Iraqi security offensive known as Operation Together Forward was launched June 15. It too has made little headway, with the city's death toll surpassing 1,500 in July and triggering fears among U.S. commanders that civil war could break out.

GIs Spared In Sectarian Strife (WT)

By Aqeel Hussein, London Sunday Telegraph

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The sectarian violence that has brought Iraq to the verge of civil war has had one unexpected benefit: a marked fall in the number of American military casualties in Baghdad.

American combat deaths in the capital are down 50 percent from the same three-month period last year and some terrorists say the United States has succeeded in deflecting attention from its own troops.

"Now we are fighting each other," said one insurgent. "That is what the Americans wanted and now they are winning."

From July to September last year, 44 U.S. personnel were killed in Baghdad. In the corresponding period this year, the figure fell to 24, a reflection, according to militia leaders, of the changing priorities of the insurgents.

Although the number of attacks on American forces in Baghdad has dropped, sectarian violence in the capital has snowballed in recent months as Sunni and Shi'ite gunmen attack each other.

Dozens of bodies turn up around the city each day, many the victims of summary execution, as Iraq edges closer to civil war.

Yesterday, another 35 bodies were found around Baghdad, bringing the total since Wednesday to more than 150. Many of the victims had been bound, tortured and shot.

With Sunnis and Shi'ites concentrating on attacking each other, they admit that they are struggling to find the time and resources to target Americans.

Hanza al Nasawi, a spokesman for Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi army, said it was not possible to keep fighting on two fronts.

"We stopped the fight against the Americans and now we are fighting against the terrorists because they are killing the Shia," he said. "We want to defend the Shia."

Nahid al Gertani, a former officer in the Republican Guard and one of the leaders of the Sunni fighters in southern Baghdad, said his forces were defending the Sunnis against the Shi'ite militias. "Our first target is the Shia militia," he said. "We made an agreement with the American Army four months ago to stop the fight."

Mr. al Gertani said the insurgents had decided to stop fighting the Americans so they could concentrate on tackling the Shi'ite militias, but emphasized that this did not reflect any thaw in relations between the two sides. "They are not our friends, and we will fight another day."

Iraqi civilians say they had recently been surprised to see U.S. troops in parts of the city where they previously would have been attacked had they ventured out. U.S. forces also are reported to have intervened to keep the warring parties apart, placing guards on the Alkubasey mosque -- a known base for Sunni fighters -- to protect it from Shi'ite attacks.

Abu Tayseer, a Baghdad councilor, said he was angry that the militias were fighting each other instead of the Americans.

"That is what the Americans wanted and now they are winning," he said.

The Pentagon said it is making progress in restoring order to Baghdad.

"Under Iraqi leadership, Operation Together Forward is continuing its advances toward reducing sectarian violence and terrorist attacks," said Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Pentagon spokesman.

"We are cautiously optimistic that the cycle of retaliatory violence has slowed in targeted areas, but we also recognize that the real measurement of this progress must be seen over time."

How Bad Is The Senate Intelligence Report? (WKST)

By Stephen F. Hayes

Weekly Standard, September 17, 2006

Very Bad

According to a report released September 8 by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Saddam Hussein "was resistant to cooperating with al Qaeda or any other Islamist groups." It's an odd claim. Saddam Hussein's regime has a long and well-documented history of cooperating with Islamists, including al Qaeda and its affiliates.

As early as 1982, the Iraqi regime was openly supporting, training, and funding the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood, an Islamist organization opposed to the secular regime of Hafez Assad. For years, Saddam Hussein cultivated warm relations with Hassan al-Turabi, the Islamist who was the de facto leader of the Sudanese terrorist state, and a man Bill Clinton described as "a buddy of [Osama] bin Laden's."

Throughout the 1990s, the Iraqi regime hosted Popular Islamic Conferences in Baghdad, gatherings modeled after conferences Turabi hosted in Khartoum. Mark Fineman, a reporter for the Los Angeles Times, attended one of the conferences and filed a story about his experience on January 26, 1993. "There are delegates from the most committed Islamic organizations on Earth," he wrote. "Afghan mujahedeen (holy warriors), Palestinian militants, Sudanese fundamentalists, the Islamic Brotherhood and Pakistan's Party of Islam." Newsweek's Christopher Dickey attended the same conference and wrote about it in 2002. "Islamic radicals from all over the Middle East, Africa, and Asia converged on Baghdad," he wrote, "to show their solidarity with Iraq in the face of American aggression. . . . Every time I hear diplomats and politicians, whether in Washington or the capitals of Europe, declare that Saddam

Hussein is a 'secular Baathist ideologue' who has nothing to do with Islamists or terrorist calls to jihad, I think of that afternoon and I wonder what they're talking about. If that was not a fledgling Qaeda itself at the Rashid convention, it sure was Saddam's version of it."

Iraqi leaders frequently touted their Islamist credentials. "We are blessed in this country for having the Islamic holy warrior Saddam Hussein as a leader, who is guiding the country in a religious holy war against the infidels and nonbelievers," said Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, one of Saddam's top deputies, in an address to the terrorist confab. On August 27, 1998, 20 days after al Qaeda attacked the U.S. embassies in Africa, Babel, the government newspaper run by Saddam's son Uday Hussein, published an editorial proclaiming Osama bin Laden "an Arab and Islamic hero."

None of this is a secret, as the press coverage attests. But the authors of the Senate report seem determined to write it out of the history. On what basis do the authors claim that Saddam Hussein was "resistant" to cooperation with Islamists? The finding is sourced to "postwar detainee debriefs--including debriefs of Saddam Hussein and Tariq Aziz." Well then, that settles it.

But why take Saddam's word for it? This is, after all, the same man who claims that he is the president of Iraq. Even assuming the man isn't a pathological liar, isn't it the case that detainees interrogated by a government fighting a global war on terror might have an incentive to understate their complicity in global terror?

This appears to have occurred to the report's authors. "The Committee believes that the results of detainee debriefs largely comport with documentary evidence, but the Committee cannot definitively judge the accuracy of statements made by individuals in custody and cannot, in every case, confirm that detainee statements are truthful and accurate."

In fact, it's not clear that the results of the detainee debriefs do, in fact, largely comport with the documentary evidence. What is clear is that where there was a conflict, the committee almost always chose to disregard the documentary evidence in favor of the debriefings, sometimes to comical effect. According to the report, Saddam Hussein was asked whether he might cooperate with al Qaeda because "the enemy of the enemy is my friend." The report dutifully--and uncritically--offers his response. "Saddam answered that the United States was not Iraq's enemy. He claimed that Iraq only opposed U.S. policies."

Really? That's hard to reconcile with these instructions from Saddam Hussein in a 1993 address. "Attack them, our beloved people," Saddam ordered in a speech broadcast on Iraqi television. "You are the glory of our nation. Attack them." Or this editorial: "American and British interests, embassies, and naval ships in the Arab region should be the targets of military operations and commando attacks by Arab political forces," argued Uday Hussein's newspaper Babel on November 15, 1997.

A statement from Saddam's Baath party on November 8, 1998, called for "the highest levels of jihad" against American interests. "The escalation of the confrontation and the disclosure of its dimensions and the aggressive intentions now require an organized, planned, influential and conclusive enthusiasm against U.S. interests."

And Saddam Hussein celebrated the attacks on September 11, 2001. "The American cowboys are reaping the fruit of their crimes against humanity," he declared just days after the worst terrorist attack on American soil.

These are just four examples out of dozens. Despite his claims to the contrary, Saddam Hussein regarded the United States as an enemy. And for years he demonstrated his willingness to work with Islamists by, among other things, working with Islamists. The Senate report fails to provide any of this contextual balance to the denials of detained Iraqi officials. It is a revealing omission that raises serious doubts about the quality of the reporting throughout the 52 pages examining Iraq's links to al Qaeda.

There is much to quarrel with in the report. But it is worth spending a moment to consider the vast amount of information that was left out of the committee's treatment of Iraq's links to al Qaeda. A few examples:

There is no mention in the report of Abdul Rahman Yasin, an Iraqi who admitted mixing the chemicals for the bomb used in the 1993 World Trade Center attack, cited in the July 2004 Senate report as an al Qaeda operation. The mastermind of that attack, Ramzi Yousef, is the nephew of 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. Two weeks after the bombing, according a July 2004 report issued by the same Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Yasin fled to Iraq with Iraqi assistance. ABC News reported in 1994 that a Baghdad neighbor of Yasin's told them that he travels freely and "works for the government."

There is no mention of documents recovered in postwar Iraq confirming that the Iraqi regime provided Yasin with housing and funding after his return to Iraq until the beginning of the Iraq War in 2003. Vice President Dick Cheney has discussed these documents in television and radio interviews.

There is no mention of documents unearthed by reporters with the Toronto Star and the London Telegraph. The documents, expense reports from the Iraqi Intelligence Service, contain an exchange of memos between IIS officers about who will pay for a March 1998 trip to Baghdad by a "trusted confidante" of Osama bin Laden. The documents were provided to the U.S. intelligence community. "I have no doubt that what we found is the real thing," wrote Mitch Potter, a reporter for the Toronto Star, and one of the journalists who found the documents in the bombed-out headquarters of the Iraqi Intelligence Service days after the fall of Baghdad. Intelligence and military sources tell THE WEEKLY STANDARD that the documents are corroborated by telephone intercepts from March 1998.

There is no mention of documents showing that the Iraqi regime cultivated a relationship with bin Laden's chief deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, throughout the 1990s. Time magazine's Joe Klein, an Iraq War critic who is dubious of a broader Iraq-al Qaeda relationship, noted last week: "Documents indicate that Saddam had long-term, low-level ties with regional terrorist groups--including Ayman al-Zawahiri, dating back to his time with the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood. There is strong evidence as well that elements of the Special Republican Guard ran terrorist training camps." (One quibble: Is it possible for the leader of Iraq to have "low-level" ties with the leader of Egyptian Islamic Jihad?) The 9/11 Commission reported that Zawahiri "had ties of his own to the Iraqis." In June 2003, U.S. News & World Report described what a defense official called a "potentially significant link" between Iraq and al Qaeda that came, at that early date, from a single source. "A captured senior member of the Mukhabarat, Iraq's intelligence service, has told interrogators about meetings between Iraqi intelligence officials and top members of the Egyptian Islamic Jihad, a group that merged with al Qaeda in the 1990s. The prisoner also described $300,000 in Iraqi transfers to the organization to pay for attacks in Egypt. The transfers were said to have been authorized by Saddam Hussein."

There is no mention of captured Iraqi documents that indicate the regime was providing financial support to Abu Sayyaf, an al Qaeda affiliate group in the Philippines. On June 6, 2001, the Iraqi ambassador to the Philippines, Salah Samarmad, faxed an eight-page report on an Abu Sayyaf kidnapping to the Iraqi Foreign Ministry. According to the fax, the Iraqi Intelligence Service had provided assistance to Abu Sayyaf, but following the high-profile kidnapping decided to suspend this support. According to the document: "The kidnappers were formerly (from the previous year) receiving money and purchasing combat weapons. From now on we (IIS) are not giving them this opportunity and are not on speaking terms with them."

There is no mention of alleged Iraqi complicity in Abu Sayyaf attacks in October 2002 that claimed the life of U.S. Special Forces soldier Mark Wayne Jackson. One week after that attack, Filipino authorities recovered a cell phone that was to have detonated a bomb placed on the playground of a local elementary school. The cell phone , which belonged to an Abu Sayyaf terrorist, had been used to make calls to Abu Sayyaf leaders. Investigators also discovered that the phone had also been used to call Hisham Hussein, the second secretary of the Iraqi Embassy in Manila, just 17 hours after the attack that took the life of the American soldier. Hussein was ordered out of the Philippines for his associations with terrorist groups, including Abu Sayyaf.

There is no mention of the Clinton administration's 1998 indictment of Osama bin Laden, which noted that al Qaeda had "reached an understanding with the government of Iraq that al Qaeda would not work against that government and that on particular projects, specifically including weapons development, al Qaeda would work cooperatively with the Government of Iraq." The language was dropped from a superseding indictment of bin Laden, after the August 7, 1998, East Africa embassy bombings allowed prosecutors to narrow their charges. Patrick Fitzgerald, a U.S. attorney involved in preparing the original indictment (who would later gain national prominence in the CIA leak case), testified before the 9/11 Commission. He told the panel that the claim in the indictment came from Jamal al Fadl, who told prosecutors that a senior Iraqi member of al Qaeda, Mamdouh Mahmud Salim, had worked out the agreement between Iraq and al Qaeda. According to Fitzgerald's testimony, Salim "tried to reach a sort of agreement where they wouldn't work against each other--sort of the enemy of my enemy is my friend--and that there were indications that within Sudan when al Qaeda was there, which al Qaeda left in the summer of '96, or the spring of '96, there were efforts to work on jointly acquiring weapons."

There is no mention of the Clinton administration's many public claims that Iraq was working with al Qaeda on chemical weapons development in Sudan. According to the 9/11 Commission Report, the passage in the indictment of bin Laden "led [Richard] Clarke, who for years had read intelligence reports on Iraqi-Sudanese cooperation on chemical weapons, to speculate to [National Security Adviser Sandy] Berger that a large Iraqi presence at chemical facilities in Khartoum was 'probably a direct result of the Iraq-al Qaeda agreement.' Clarke added that VX precursor traces found near al Shifa were the 'exact formula used by Iraq.'"

There is no mention of telephone intercepts, cited by a "senior intelligence official" in August 1998, connecting al Shifa officials with Emad al Ani, the father of Iraq's VX program. William Cohen, secretary of defense under Bill Clinton, reviewed the intelligence in testimony before the 9/11 Commission on March 23, 2004, and claimed that the plant owner had visited Baghdad to meet al Ani. "This particular facility [al Shifa], according to the intelligence we had at that time, had been constructed under extra ordinary security circumstances, even with some surface-to-air missile capability or defense capabilities; that the plant itself had been constructed under these security measures; that the--that the plant had been funded, in part, by the so-called Military Industrial Corporation; that bin Laden had been living there; that he had, in fact, money that he had put into this Military Industrial Corporation; that the owner of the plant had traveled to Baghdad to meet with the father of the VX program."

On it goes. In addition, there are numerous omissions that could shed light on Iraq's involvement in trans regional terrorism more broadly.

DOJ_NMG_0064931

There is no mention of Iraqi documents first reported in a monograph published by the Joint Forces Command after 18 months' study of prewar Iraq. According to their report, called The Iraqi Perspectives Project:

Beginning in 1994, the Fedayeen Saddam opened its own paramilitary training camps for volunteers, graduating more than 7,200 "good men racing full with courage and enthusiasm" in the first year. Beginning in 1998, these camps began hosting "Arab volunteers from Egypt, Palestine, Jordan, 'the Gulf,' and Syria." It is not clear from available evidence where all of these non-Iraqi volunteers who were "sacrificing for the cause" went to ply their newfound skills. Before the summer of 2002, most volunteers went home upon the completion of training. But these camps were humming with frenzied activity in the months immediately prior to the war. As late as January 2003, the volunteers participated in a special training event called the "Heroes Attack." This training event was designed in part to prepare regional Fedayeen Saddam commands to "obstruct the enemy from achieving his goal and to support keeping peace and stability in the province."

There is no mention of Iraqi documents discussing "Blessed July," a planned wave of terrorist attacks that was also first reported in The Iraqi Perspectives Project study.

According to the report: "The Saddam Fedayeen also took part in the regime's domestic terrorism operations and planned for attacks throughout Europe and the Middle East. In a document dated May 1999, Saddam's older son, Uday, ordered preparations for 'special operations, assassinations, and bombings, for the centers and traitor symbols in London, Iran and the self-ruled areas [Kurdistan].' Preparations for 'Blessed July,' a regime-directed wave of 'martyrdom' operations against targets in the West, were well under way at the time of the coalition invasion."

It is the uneven treatment of Iraqi documents that provides perhaps the best window into the mindset of the writers of the Iraq-al Qaeda section of the Senate report. The first sentence of that section reads: "The purpose of this section is to assess the accuracy of the Intelligence Community's prewar analysis on links between the regime of Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda using information collected since Operation Iraqi Freedom."

The Senate report concedes that the document exploitation process in Iraq is incomplete, but it cavalierly assures readers that nothing significant will be found. "While document exploitation continues, additional reviews of documents recovered in Iraq are unlikely to provide information that would contradict the Committee's findings or conclusions."

Such an assessment is at best premature according to intelligence officials familiar with the document exploitation project. "Given my past participation in this realm and my current status it would be imprudent to get into detail," writes Michael Tanji, a former senior Defense Intelligence Agency official who helped lead the document exploitation effort for 18 months. "Suffice it to say that when you are counting sheets of paper by hundreds-of-millions (not to mention other forms of media that have been obtained that threaten to dwarf paper holdings) and your methodology is somewhere between inadequate and woeful, saying that you have a strong grasp on what was and wasn't going on in Iraq based on an 'initial review' is akin to saying that you don't need to read the bible because you've memorized the ten commandments . . . in pig Latin."

As of March 2006, three years after the start of the Iraq War, the document exploitation project run by the Defense Intelligence Agency had fully translated fewer than 5 percent of the documents captured in postwar Iraq. The Senate report, in an apparent effort to appear more authoritative, uses a different measurement. The authors tell us that 34 million pages out of some 120 million have been "translated and summarized to some extent." Thirty-four millions pages seems like an impressive number. But think about it. Just 28 percent of captured Iraqi documents have been "translated and summarized to some extent." That is hardly the kind of exhaustive analysis that would permit meaningful conclusions.

And, in any case, there are reasons to be skeptical of those estimates. Intelligence officials familiar with the DOCEX project say that the numbers in the report are inflated in an effort to impress congressional overseers. If just the cover sheet on a 200-page document has been read once and summarized, for example, all 200 pages are counted toward the total number of documents that have been exploited "to some extent." A translator who read only the cover sheet on the eight-page fax from Manila to Baghdad would have missed the revelation that Iraq had been providing money and arms to Abu Sayyaf. But for the purposes of the Senate report, that important document would have made the list of documents "translated and summarized to some extent." The real number of fully exploited documents, according to those familiar with the DOCEX project, remains in the single digits. The report's oracular assurances--that further exploitation is "unlikely" to change our understanding of Iraqi links to al Qaeda--is both deeply revealing and deeply troubling.

Where the report isn't tendentious, it is sloppy. Key names are misspelled; it's "Shakir" on one page, and "Shakhir" on another, which might be thought trivial. But consider: The writers of the report seem not to understand that "Shaykh Salman al-Awdah" and "Shaikh Sulayman al-Udah" is the same person and that he was an important spiritual mentor to al Qaeda and its leadership. At another point, the report claims that Saddam Hussein considered al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi an "outlaw." In the body of the report, the claim is attributed to a senior Iraqi official; in its conclusions the same information is attributed to an "al Qaeda detainee."

Where the report isn't tendentious and sloppy, it's confused. Saddam Hussein and his cronies disclaim any relationship and yet the Senate report itself cites two authenticated documents in which the Iraqi Intelligence Service (IIS) itself discussed the "relationship" between Iraq and al Qaeda. A 1992 document notes that bin Laden is "a Saudi opposition official in Afghanistan" and claims "the Syria [IIS] section has a relationship with him." An Iraqi Intelligence document describing the connections between Iraq and al Qaeda in 1997 notes that "through dialogue and agreements we will leave the door open to further develop the relationship and cooperation between both sides."

In its conclusions, the Senate report once again sets aside this documentary evidence of a relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda and defers to the claims of Saddam Hussein and other Iraqi detainees. "Postwar findings indicate that Saddam Hussein was distrustful of al Qaeda and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime, refusing all requests from al Qaeda to provide material or operational support." Perhaps the documents don't count as "findings."

The Senate report is rife with such selective reading of the evidence. Consider the case of Ahmed Hikmat Shakir. Here is the report's treatment of Shakir.

The second lead centered on contact between Ahmad Hikat Shakir al-Azzawi, an Iraqi national, and [9/11] hijacker Khalid al-Mihdhar, in Malaysia in January 2000. Shakir was a part-time facilitator of Arab visitors at the Kuala Lumpur airport for the Iraqi embassy. Some information alleged that the Iraqi Embassy employee who gave Shakhir [sic] his job was a former IIS officer.

The CIA assessed that Shakir, "apparently acting in his capacity as an airport facilitator, met al-Mihdhar at the airport. The two then shared a taxi to a Kuala Lumpur hotel, although airport facilitators were not responsible for providing land transportation for passengers." The two were not spotted together again. The CIA noted that Shakir's departure from Malaysia only one week after helping al-Mihdhar, "raised suspicion about his connections and intentions." The CIA added that, "Shakir's travel and past contacts linked him to a worldwide network of Sunni extremist groups and personalities including suspects in the bombing of the 1993 World Trade Center and indirectly to senior al Qaeda associates. His relationship with the embassy employee could suggest a link between Baghdad and Shakir's extremist contacts, but it could also be a case of an Iraqi expatriate finding a temporary job for a fellow national.

After Shakir's capture in 2002, a foreign government service working in partnership with the CIA reported that Shakir was not affiliated with al Qaeda and had no connections to the IIS. The information said there was "no link, clue or hint to any foreign intelligence service, radical religious group or terrorist operation."

To summarize what the report acknowledges: An Iraqi national with known contacts to Sunni extremists and employed by the Iraqi Embassy in Malaysia, facilitated the travel of a 9/11 hijacker and then disappeared one week after the encounter. That alone is interesting. Now consider what the report leaves out.

Not only did Shakir abruptly leave Malaysia one week after he helped al-Mihdhar, he had begun his job at the Iraqi Embassy only two months earlier. The Iraqi Embassy controlled his schedule. Among Shakir's "contacts" with men the report describes only as "Sunni extremists" were Musab Yasin, an Iraqi who is the brother of Abdul Rahman Yasin, discussed above for his participation in the 1993 World Trade Center attack; Ibrahim Suleiman, a Kuwaiti native whose fingerprints were found on the bombmaking manuals authorities allege were used in preparation for that attack; Zahid Sheikh Mohammed, brother of Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the mastermind of the September 11 attacks; and Abu Hajer al Iraqi, described in U.S. court documents as Osama bin Laden's "best friend."

The Senate report tells us that "some information alleged" that Shakir's Iraqi Embassy contact had been affiliated with Iraqi Intelligence. That information also came from an Iraqi detainee. Why is it treated with skepticism when the claims of other detainees are accepted as fact?

We cite the Shakir case not because it indicates that the Iraqi regime had foreknowledge or directed the 9/11 attacks. Rather, it stands as yet another example of the Senate report's selective use of evidence and the alacrity with which its authors sought to reject alleged Iraqi ties to al Qaeda.

One of the few areas where the Senate report provides new information concerns the presence of Abu Musab al Zarqawi in Iraq before the war. According to the Senate report: "A postwar CIA assessment on al-Zarqawi notes that both captured former regime documents and former regime officials show that the IIS did respond to a foreign request for assistance in finding and extraditing al-Zarqawi for his role in the murder of U.S. diplomat Lawrence [sic] Foley. In the spring of 2002, the IIS formed a 'special committee' to track down al-Zarqawi, but was unable to locate and capture him." Those documents "also show that lower-level IIS units attempted to search for the individual."

Taken together with detainee debriefings, the documents, if authentic, certainly raise questions about the Bush administration's prewar claims, backed by CIA director George Tenet, that Zarqawi was being harbored by the Iraqi regime. The Senate report quotes a 2005 CIA analysis that concluded: "The regime did not have a relationship, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his associates."

DOJ_NMG_0064933

The CIA report may be right. But there are several additional facts to consider in evaluating the Zarqawi-Iraq relationship, only one of which made it into the Senate report. The report notes that the Iraqi Intelligence Service received information from a foreign government service on five individuals suspected of playing a role in the assassination of U.S. AID worker Laurence Foley. One of those individuals, Abu Yasim Sayyem, was captured in early 2003.

According to the Senate report an IIS officer "was shocked when the Director of his division ordered Sayyem to be released. According to the Iraqi official, the Director of his division told him that Saddam Hussein ordered Sayyem's release." The IIS officer dismissed the possibility that the IIS was involved with al Qaeda or Zarqawi and speculated that Saddam intervened to free Sayyem because he might fight U.S. forces in the event of an invasion of Iraq.

Five additional facts not included in the Senate report provide important context. According to the July 2004 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence report on Iraq, Abu Zubaydah, a top-ranking al Qaeda official in U.S. custody, told interrogators "that he was not aware of a relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda" and that he found such a relationship "unlikely." Zubaydah "also said, however, that any relationship would be highly compartmented and went on to name al Qaeda members who he thought had good relations with the Iraqis." Among those he named? Abu Musab al Zarqawi. From the July 2004 Senate report: "Abu Zubaydah indicated that he had heard that an important al Qaeda associate, Abu Musab al Zarqawi, and others had good relationships with Iraqi Intelligence." As noted, detainee testimony should be treated with skepticism. But Zubaydah, who provided both good information and bad in his debriefings, was in a position to know about Zarqawi's associations. The two men planned a millennium attack on the Radisson Hotel in Amman, Jordan, in 1999.

Zarqawi received medical treatment at a Baghdad hospital known for treating senior Iraqi regime officials. (Initial reports that he had his leg amputated were wrong. Subsequent reporting suggests Zarqawi was treated for nasal problems.) In a 2005 interview with Al-Hayat, Jordan's King Abdullah said: "We had information that he entered Iraq from a neighboring country, where he lived, and what he was doing. We informed the Iraqi authorities about all this detailed information we had, but they didn't respond." Jordanian intelligence continues to believe that the Iraqi regime knowingly harbored Zarqawi.

Muhammad al Masari, a known al Qaeda mouthpiece, told the editor of the Arabic-language newspaper Al-Quds Al-Arabi, Abdel Bari Atwan, that Saddam reached out to al Qaeda--and Zarqawi--after the fall of the Taliban in 2001 and provided funding for al Qaeda operatives to relocate to Iraq. "According to Masari, Saddam saw that Islam would be key to a cohesive resistance in the event of invasion. Iraqi army commanders were ordered to become practicing Muslims and to adopt the language and spirit of the jihadis. On arrival in Iraq, Al-Qaeda operatives were put in touch with these commanders, who later facilitated the distribution of arms and money from Saddam's caches."

Finally, when Zarqawi returned to Iraq after the war, he teamed up almost immediately with a cadre of former Iraqi Intelligence officials to conduct attacks on U.S. troops and softer targets in Iraq.

Not only is the Senate report's section on Zarqawi woefully incomplete, it is contradictory. The report's conclusions echo the CIA finding: "Postwar information indicates that Saddam Hussein attempted, unsuccessfully, to locate and capture al-Zarqawi and that the regime did not have a relationship with, harbor, or turn a blind eye toward Zarqawi." That Saddam Hussein himself ordered a Zarqawi associate freed--if the IIS officer's reporting is accurate--suggests that the Iraqi regime at the very least turned a blind eye toward Zarqawi and his network.

The mainstream press has treated the Senate report as the definitive word on Iraqi links to al Qaeda. It is not. It is worth remembering that while critics of the Bush administration have long since decided that there was no relationship at all between the Iraqi regime and al Qaeda, there are many observers who continue to hold a different view. If these individuals disagree on the extent of the relationship and its meaning, they agree that there was one.

"There was no question in our minds that there was a relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda," said 9/11 Commission co-chairman Thomas Kean.

"Saddam Hussein's regime welcomed them with open arms and young al Qaeda members entered Iraq in large numbers, setting up an organization to confront the occupation," said Hudayfa Azzam, the son of bin Laden's longtime mentor Abdullah Azzam.

"I believe very strongly that Saddam had relations with al Qaeda," said former Iraqi prime minister and longtime CIA asset Ayad Allawi. "And these relations started in Sudan. We know Saddam had relationships with a lot of terrorists and international terrorism."

"What our report said really supports what the administration, in its straight presentations, has said," noted 9/11 Commissioner John Lehman. "There were numerous contacts; there's evidence of collaboration on weapons. And we found earlier, we reported earlier, that there was VX gas that was clearly from Iraq in the Sudan site that President Clinton hit. And we have significant evidence that there were contacts over the years and cooperation, although nothing that would be operational."

And late last week, following the release of the Senate report, Barham Salih, deputy prime minister of Iraq, had this to say: "The alliance between the Baathists and jihadists which sustains al Qaeda in Iraq is not new, contrary to what you may have been told." Salih continued: "I know this at first hand. Some of my friends were murdered by jihadists, by al Qaeda-affiliated operatives who had been sheltered and assisted by Saddam's regime."

Some day there will be an authoritative and richly detailed history of the nature of the relationship between the Iraqi regime of Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden's al Qaeda and other Islamist terror groups. This latest product of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence is unlikely to merit even a footnote in this history.

Terrorist Ties (WT)

By Deroy Murdock

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

Iraq war critics trumpet a Sept. 8 Senate Intelligence Committee report that concluded Saddam Hussein knew nothing about the September 11, 2001, attacks. Hence, the argument goes, he had no connection to al Qaeda, and therefore lacked ties to Islamic terrorists. In short: "Bush Lied, People Died."

This seriously flawed report relies on unreliable witnesses, ignores potential and actual evidence of Saddam's philanthropy of terror, and yet quietly acknowledges he, in fact, worked with terrorists. If Saddam's lawyers seek a clean bill of health for their client, this isn't it.

For starters, the report's sources include "multiple detainees -- including Saddam and former Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz." Both are on trial and could face severe punishment. Their exculpatory remarks should be highly suspect, but appear valid to Senate Intelligence staffers. On Page 67, their report paraphrases Saddam's statement that he eschewed al Qaeda's anti-Americanism because "the United States was not Iraq's enemy." Perhaps he merely was being playful when he fired almost daily at U.S. aircraft patrolling the No-Fly Zone and attempted to assassinate former President George H.W. Bush in 1993. Indeed, on Page 68, Mr. Aziz offers the FBI Saddam's response to al Qaeda's August 1998 bombing of U.S. Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Saddam "was pleased at the act of terrorism because the U.S. had bombed Iraq during the first Gulf war and tried to kill Saddam. Saddam thought al Qaeda was an effective organization."

The report also quotes captured Iraqi documents. Among some 120 million such papers, only 34 million have been "translated and summarized to some extent" to speed analysis. Nevertheless, with nearly 72 percent of these records still unusable, the report concludes: "additional reviews of documents in Iraq are unlikely to provide information that would contradict the committee's findings or conclusions." Or, in plain English: "Don't confuse us with data. Trust us. We're psychic."

This report overlooks numerous indications, some firmer than others, that Saddam supported the September 11 conspiracy specifically and al Qaeda broadly, among other Islamic terrorist groups. Consider:

The report disregards the May 7, 2003, decision of Clinton-appointed U.S. District Court Judge Harold Baer Jr. that Baghdad backed the September 11 attack. Judge Baer awarded $104 million in damages from the Ba'athist regime to the families of George Eric Smith and Timothy Soulas, both killed at the World Trade Center. As Judge Baer ruled: "I conclude that plaintiffs have shown, albeit barely --by evidence satisfactory to the court -- that Iraq provided material support to bin Laden and al Qaeda."

The report misses the fact that the architect of the 1993 World Trade Center attack, Ramzi Yousef -- nephew of September 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed -- landed in America on an Iraqi passport. Nor does it mention Indiana-born, Iraqi-bred Abdul Rahman Yasin, the al Qaeda operative who built the 1993 WTC bomb that killed six and injured 1,040. He fled to Iraq and, documents show, received a house and salary from Saddam's regime. As Sheila MacVicar reported for ABC News on July 27, 1994: "Last week, [TV program] 'Day One' confirmed [Yasin] is in Baghdad. Just a few days ago, he was seen at [his father's] house by ABC News. Neighbors told us Yasin comes and goes freely."

The report forgets that President Clinton's State Department designated Iraq a state sponsor of terrorism as early as 1993. "Iraq continued to plan and sponsor international terrorism in 1999," State later declared. Baghdad "continued to provide safe haven and support to various terrorist groups."

The Senate document concedes "Saddam's record of support for secular terrorist organizations like the Palestinian Liberation Front," but then breezes past his $10,000, then $25,000, reward checks to the families of Palestinian homicide bombers. Between the $15,000 boost in these bonuses on March 11, 2002, and the March 20, 2003, launch of Operation Iraqi Freedom, 28 such killers wounded 1,209 people and murdered 223 more, including at least eight Americans.

While Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have tried to answer this paper, President Bush himself should deliver several major addresses detailing Saddam's extensive terror record.

Educating the public with new, declassified information would help counteract the "Bush lied us into war" chorus. If this left-wing cantata goes unchallenged, it could cost Republicans control of Congress and leave Mr. Bush exposed to greater indignities -- including impeachment.

U.S., Afghan Troops Launch Offensive (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Thousands of American and Afghan troops unleashed a new offensive against Taliban militants in eastern Afghanistan on Saturday in an effort to expand the government's reach into the volatile Pakistani border region.

The operation comes as a NATO-led force, including 2,500 U.S. soldiers, is launching heavy attacks on militants in Afghanistan's south, claiming to have killed hundreds of guerrillas over the past two weeks.

In London, the commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan said Saturday he expects the military campaign against the Taliban to last another three to five years.

The new offensive is "just one part of a series of coordinated operations placing continuous pressure on Taliban extremists ... in order to provide security to the population, extend the government to the people and to increase reconstruction," the military said in a statement.

Dubbed Operation Mountain Fury, the offensive involves 7,000 U.S. and Afghan soldiers in the central and eastern provinces of Paktika, Khost, Ghazni, Paktya and Logar, the military said. Fighter planes and helicopters will back the forces.

Taliban and other Islamic extremist groups, including al-Qaida, are known to operate in the region, especially in the area bordering Pakistan where the reach of the government is weak and militants find sanctuaries.

Highlighting the dangers the troops face, two separate insurgent attacks on a military base in Khost province killed a U.S.-led coalition soldier and wounded another on Friday, the military said. A number of Afghan troops also were wounded, a statement said.

A suspected suicide bomber also blew himself up in the same province when explosives strapped to his body went off prematurely as he approached a police checkpoint on Saturday. Nobody else was injured in the blast, police said.

The U.S. military said troops have been preparing for weeks for Mountain Fury but launched its "maneuver phase" early Saturday. A separate U.S.-led operation called Big Northern Wind has been under way in neighboring Kunar province's Korangal Valley since late August.

The offensives come as the country is going through its bloodiest phase since the U.S.-led invasion ousted the hard-line Taliban from power in 2001.

Lt. Gen. David Richards of Britain, who took command of the 8,000-strong NATO force last month, said predicted the campaign to crush the Taliban would take three to five more years and added he was determined to succeed.

He told Channel 4 News fighting in the turbulent southern province of Helmand had been "very intense" until about two weeks ago but that the Taliban had lost many fighters.

"Although in a way we were not able to maneuver as freely as we would have wished perhaps, we have, I think, created an environment in which most people, including many Taliban, have just had enough fighting."

According to an Associated Press count based on reports from U.S., NATO and Afghan officials, 2,800 people have died so far this year in violence nationwide, including militants and civilians — about 1,300 more than the toll for all of 2005.

"Mountain Fury will continue until the conditions of bringing security, construction and growth are met," Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, the top U.S. operational commander, said in a statement.

"The Afghan people are tired of war. They want what their government is capable of providing: security, employment, education and a better way of life," Freakley said.

Elsewhere, NATO troops and aircraft in the country's southern Uruzgan province killed 17 suspected insurgents placing roadside bombs near a military base Friday, the alliance said.

About 60 suspected Taliban militants also attacked a police checkpoint in southern Afghanistan Friday, sparking a battle in which four militants died, police said.

NATO and Afghan soldiers came to the aid of police after the insurgents attacked the checkpoint near the district police headquarters in the Khas Uruzgan district of southern Uruzgan province, said Mohammad Zahir, the district police chief.

Afghan security forces and NATO suffered no casualties. Police recovered the bodies of four suspected Taliban fighters along with their weapons, Zahir said.

Separately, a bomb blast south of the Afghan capital killed three security guards and wounded another on Saturday, police said.

The remote-controlled device went off as a car carrying four Afghans passed on the main road in the Musayi district of Kabul province, said Ali Shah Paktiawal, a police official.

DOJ_NMG_0064936

The victims were all working for local private security firms which provides services to local and international non-governmental organizations, said Mohammad Daud Nadim, regional police chief. All four were armed at the time of the blast, he said.

Road Blast In Afghanistan Kills Three Aid Workers (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Anti-Taliban Offensive Launched in 5 Provinces

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 16 -- Three Afghan aid workers were killed Saturday when their vehicle hit a bomb on a highway just south of the capital, while 7,000 Afghan and U.S. troops launched an operation against Taliban insurgents in five eastern and central provinces.

Police said the unidentified aid workers were killed and a fourth was injured when a remote-controlled bomb exploded under their vehicle. The attack was the fourth major bombing in eight days.

Aside from insurgent and military activity, the populace remained calm Saturday as news began to circulate of comments about Islam made earlier this week by Pope Benedict XVI. The remarks, which included a medieval reference to Islam as "evil and inhuman" and "spread by the sword," have angered Muslims around the world.

"We heard about it on the radio, and it seems the pope wants to create a crisis. This is an insult to all Muslims and an ignorant attack on Islam," said Enayatullah Balegh, a leading cleric. But he added: "We do not favor any violence or protest, because Kabul is not secure and someone might take advantage of it. We will show our anger in words."

The Foreign Affairs Ministry said the pope's words showed an "improper understanding of Islam" and called on him to apologize to all Muslims. In a statement, the ministry said that world leaders, instead of "inciting violence and tension," should help bring followers of different religions "closer to each other."

Afghanistan, a conservative Muslim country run by a moderate, elected government, is experiencing an insurgency by thousands of fighters loyal to the Taliban, an extremist Islamic movement that ruled for six years and was ousted by a U.S.-led invasion in 2001.

In recent months, the Taliban has unleashed the worst wave of violence in more than four years across southern Afghanistan and in other provinces. Attacks have been carried out by several hundred forces and by lone suicide bombers.

In the latest of several offensives against the Taliban, officials said that 4,000 Afghan soldiers and police accompanied by 3,000 U.S. troops began moving Saturday into five provinces that have experienced increasing insurgent violence -- Khost, Ghazni, Paktia, Paktika and Logar.

U.S. military officials here said the operation, called Mountain Fury, was one of several aimed at "placing continuous pressure on Taliban extremists" in order to bring security, governance and development to impoverished rural regions.

The officials said the operation would be accompanied by $43 million in aid projects, including new schools, roads, bridges and 26 district administration centers. Taliban forces have attacked and destroyed such district centers in remote areas of several provinces.

"While we offer stability, governance and reconstruction, the Taliban offer oppression and violence in the form of killing innocent Afghans attending funerals, burning schools and murdering effective governors," Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, senior commander of U.S. forces here, said in a statement.

Hakim Taniwal, 63, the governor of Paktia province, was assassinated by a suicide bomber last Sunday. The next day, a suicide bomber detonated explosives at Taniwal's funeral in the governor's native Khost province, killing six people.

In the southern province of Kandahar, where 10,000 NATO troops have been battling Taliban fighters for nearly two weeks, NATO officials said Saturday that they had killed more than 500 insurgents and liberated two districts near the provincial capital that the Taliban had attempted to capture and hold.

The NATO forces are being assisted by 2,500 U.S. soldiers, including helicopter crews.

"This was a decisive success," said Mark Laity, a NATO spokesman in Kabul. He said the Taliban had drawn fighters from many areas to take a stand in the Panjwai and Zhari districts. "They fought for a long time, and they lost," he said. "This will force the Taliban to think seriously about whether they can stand and fight elsewhere."

But Taliban forces took their fight to other parts of the country, including previously calm regions as well as the national capital area. The governor of remote Nimruz province in the southwest appealed for help after insurgents seized a stretch of a highway that connects Afghanistan with Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0064937

In Khost province, an American soldier was killed in an attack on a U.S. base. Officials said he was training troops in the new Afghan army. Several other Afghan and U.S. soldiers were wounded in that attack and a second one on the same base.

U.S. troops are also involved in a separate anti-Taliban operation in the eastern province of Konar, where they are fighting insurgents and assisting in development projects. A major new bridge over the Pech River will be inaugurated by U.S. and Afghan officials next week.

When Hit By The Enemy, Troops Are Taught To Send This Strong Message: Ordinary Afghans Can Trust Them. (PHI)

By Andrew Maykuth

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 17, 2006

One in an occasional series.

INQUIRER STAFF WRITER

PECH RIVER VALLEY, Afghanistan - The soldiers of C Company huddled around the radio as the bad news spread: Insurgents had ambushed a platoon about 10 miles upriver, killing the turret gunner of an armored humvee.

"One KIA," said First Sgt. John Mengels, a 20-year veteran, swearing under his breath. "One wounded."

A quiet rage ran through the main camp in eastern Afghanistan that day, Aug. 17. Army Capt. Robert Stanton, the company commander, hovered over a topographical map with one of his platoon leaders, jabbing at routes the Taliban might take to flee into the Hindu Kush mountains.

The Americans' instincts told them to strike back with great force - to send a strong message to anyone associated with the militants who had set up the ambush. But their training instructed them to retaliate only when the time was right, at precisely the right target - that winning over the population was just as important as killing the enemy.

"A lot of Afghans are sitting on the fence," said Mengels, 43, who has also served in Iraq. "If you are careful, they see that, and they come to your side. But if you kill the wrong people, it's damage that takes months - years - to recover from."

Five years after America launched the war on terrorism here after the 9/11 attacks, the battle in Afghanistan has evolved into a protracted counterinsurgency campaign stretching along much of the 1,500-mile Pakistani border, where resurgent Taliban forces live among the Afghans or find sanctuary in tribal areas across the border.

U.S. conventional military forces, trained to employ shock-and-awe power, have retooled for a more sophisticated mission. For a year before C Company and the other units of the 10th Mountain Division's Third Brigade Combat Team were deployed to Afghanistan in March, even the lowest infantryman was drilled in the new doctrine. The soldiers learned Afghan language, culture and history. No more calling the enemy Haji - not when the Afghan government that the Americans are supporting is Muslim, too.

"We are trying to advance the state of the art in counterinsurgency here," said Col. John W. Nicholson Jr., the brigade commander whose forces are stationed in eastern Afghanistan.

But the mission is difficult and frustrating, particularly when the Taliban get infusions of money, recruits and arms from outside Afghanistan. The enemy is clever and elusive, preferring to fight from afar, using rockets or improvised explosive devices (IEDs).

"Whenever they attack us directly, we win," Mengels said. "But they fire rockets at us, and they run. Or they leave IEDs. They're like ghosts out there."

While NATO troops fighting in Afghanistan's southern deserts have received much attention, Americans are dying here in mountainous eastern Afghanistan. It's the forgotten front in a forgotten war.

Of 28 coalition deaths in Afghanistan in the last month - 10 Americans, eight Britons, eight Canadians and two French - a quarter occurred here in Konar and Nurestan provinces, a few miles from Pakistan.

In a little more than a week in August when an Inquirer reporter and photographer were embedded with forces, seven Americans died in engagements near the Pech valley.

This is the territory of the First Battalion, 32d Regiment - one of the Third Brigade's light infantry battalions now deployed in eastern Afghanistan. During six months in Afghanistan, the 1-32 has taken more casualties than it did during its yearlong deployment to Iraq.

"When I first came to Afghanistan, I actually thought it was more of a peacekeeping mission at the time," said Pvt. Adam Boguskie, a humvee gunner from Kentucky. "I couldn't have been more wrong."

Into the teeth of al-Qaeda

DOJ_NMG_0064938

The Afghanistan government has never exerted much control in the severe highlands of Konar and Nurestan, where the mountains contain some of Afghanistan's only forests. Nurestan, the more northern province, is so isolated that its inhabitants converted to Islam only in the 19th century, more than a thousand years after the rest of the country.

This region traditionally has been governed by tribal groups, who conspire with smugglers and insurgents to transit arms and fighters on narrow footpaths that thread through the valleys. Before the Taliban fell, Islamic militants trained here without much risk of detection. Even after the Americans in 2002 established a base in Konar's capital, Asadabad, coalition control did not extend far beyond the wire.

"The terrorists who attacked the Trade Center were trained up here," said Stanton, the C Company commander. "It's a traditional safe haven for al-Qaeda... . They're here, they're in the country, they're very prevalent, and they don't want us here. More specifically, they don't want the government of Afghanistan to succeed."

In 2005, three members of a four-man Navy SEAL team were killed in an ambush in Konar, in the hills along the Korengal River, a Pech tributary. The militants shot down a Chinook helicopter sent to rescue the SEALs, killing all 16 aboard, the biggest blow against U.S. forces in Afghanistan since 2001.

The Americans responded with an intense campaign in the Korengal valley last fall, and followed in the spring with an assault called Operation Mountain Lion. But the militants only fled deeper into the mountains until the operations ended.

This summer, American commanders have changed their strategy. They launched an aggressive road-building program, replacing rutted gravel tracks with roads that can accommodate two lanes of traffic. The new roads allow more rapid troop movement, spur economic growth and loyalty to the government, and are far more difficult for the enemy to mine.

"Where the road ends, that's where the influence of the antigovernment elements begins," said Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the overall commander of the coalition forces.

To protect the road builders and expand the government's influence, the Army established small valley outposts manned by one or two platoons in spartan conditions.

They have crude latrines, no showers, minimal fortifications and no tents. The soldiers can shower and call their families once every two weeks, during 24-hour "refits" at the big operating bases.

"There's no Internet, no phones, no television, no radio," Stanton said. "It's literally a patch of dirt on the side of the road."

C Company moved into the Pech valley in June to protect a contractor rebuilding the 20-mile road between the American forward operating bases at Asadabad and Nangalam. Before the company established itself, IEDs routinely filled the road.

Three months later, American patrols move up and down there 24 hours a day. "Now we own this road," said Lt. Christopher Haynes, a platoon leader.

But ownership has come at a price.

The militants initially rained down rockets on the American bases or peppered them with machine gun fire at dusk.

And then there were IEDs. Even with greater control, fears lingered that militants might slip in and bury a bomb.

"There are days when I spend the whole patrol staring at the road thinking, 'It's going to blow up,' " Haynes said.

On June 16, militants exploded a bomb beneath a six-wheeled all-terrain vehicle that carried Lt. Forrest Ewens and Sgt. Ian T. Sanchez. They were killed instantly.

As is typical after many IED strikes, a firefight broke out immediately between the Americans on the road and the militants on the high ground. The Americans said they had returned fire into the nearby village of Dag. An undetermined number of civilians were killed.

Two days later, a jittery private guarding one of the U.S. outposts fired on a car bristling with rocket-propelled grenades as it sped past the camp. It turned out to be a friendly, unmarked police vehicle. Three officers were killed.

In both cases, the soldiers have attempted to mend relations by meeting with villagers and police officers.

In a meeting in Dag, Haji Osman Jan told Lt. Timothy Lo that many villagers were still wary of the Americans, but appreciated the road project.

"People are happier, now that they know you are helping our country to rebuild," he said.

'It has become personal'

A big part of C Company's routine is "village assessments," which often last a week. A platoon of foot soldiers, each hauling 100 pounds of equipment and Kevlar body armor, hikes into the mountains to live in small villages, gathering intelligence and information on the local needs.

On July 24, one such patrol received intelligence that a militant group had abducted a civilian friendly with the Americans, and the soldiers went in pursuit. Soon they were engaged in an intense firefight. Even Stanton, the company commander, was pinned down.

Six insurgents died, but so did David M. Hierholzer, a popular squad leader from Tennessee. The loss of Hierholzer - along with Ewens and Sanchez - stung the company.

DOJ_NMG_0064939

"It took me 20 years in the Army to lose somebody close to me," Mengels said, "and it was real bad."

The soldiers blame a local militia commander, Habib Jan.

"It has become personal," Mengels said. "I don't want to leave Afghanistan with Habib Jan still alive."

More killed, then attack

There was no sign of Habib Jan in the Pech valley in August. But other militants were active.

On Aug. 11, insurgents attacked a B Company foot convoy, and three soldiers died.

On Aug. 17, A Company took the next casualty, in the Korengal valley, where the militants had supposedly been cleared out. In that ambush, turret gunner Pvt. Joseph R. Blake, 34, was shot in the head, showering blood and brains over the soldiers in his vehicle.

It was the radio news of that attack that so enraged C Company, even though it held back from pursuit.

On Aug. 19, two days later, the radio crackled again with another grim report from the Korengal.

The insurgents had struck A Company again, this time with a roadside bomb that set a humvee ablaze. Three soldiers were wounded and three killed.

The response that night was swift and powerful.

From 10 miles away, the sky rumbled with thunder from artillery fire and the primal buzz-saw of an A-10 Thunderbolt raking the mountains with its lethal Gatling gun.

The ridge line erupted in light - the soldiers said a plane had dropped a phosphorous bomb - and for a few seconds the horizon turned crimson, like hell on earth.

This time there was no holding back.

The Death Of An Afghan Optimist (WP)

By Barnett R. Rubin

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Hekmat Karzai, a cousin of President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan, called me from Kabul last Sunday. "Barney," he said. "We lost a friend today." A suicide bomber had blown up the car of Hakim Taniwal, the governor of Paktia province on Afghanistan's frontier with Pakistan, killing him and two aides. The attack took place outside Taniwal's office, where I had gotten into the same car with him five weeks earlier, and where we had our final conversation.

I first met Taniwal in 1985 in Peshawar, Pakistan, where he had joined other intellectuals fleeing the Soviet occupation of his homeland. After the scholar and poet Said Bahauddin Majrooh was gunned down in his Peshawar home in February 1988 by radical Islamists favored by Pakistan and the CIA, these scholars started to disperse. Taniwal left for Australia, and would return to his native Afghanistan only after the Karzai government came to power.

As his name indicated, this bearded sociologist was part of the Tanai tribe, one of Afghanistan's border groups so often depicted as fierce and warlike. But Taniwal, educated in Europe, exemplified another side of tribal life -- the soft-spoken elder who leads and reconciles by wisdom and eloquence.

Hekmat Karzai, who has documented how tactics such as suicide bombing have migrated to Afghanistan from the new terrorist haven of Iraq, told me that after learning of Taniwal's death, he had walked with President Karzai in the garden of Afghanistan's presidential palace. How, they wondered, could they still ask Afghanistan's professionals to help govern the country? Yet without them, the government could not possibly meet popular expectations, could not begin to restore hope to a nation nearly bereft of that emotion.

The last time we spoke, Taniwal repeatedly emphasized that stability was possible only with the support of ordinary Afghans. "We should invest in peace," he said, "not in fighting." He backed military operations based on precise intelligence, but such operations, he believed -- even if they killed, captured or routed some Taliban -- would have little long-lasting effect without popular support and economic development. Elders from 10 provinces, whom I met the day before my visit with Taniwal, had agreed, denouncing corrupt state officials. The people have totally lost trust in the government, they told me.

The Taliban "are slowly neutralizing the people," Taniwal said. "The government can't protect them, so they will go to the other side. They will not help the government to keep security." An elder from the neighboring province had offered a similar conclusion: "If the people were not distressed with the current government, the Taliban could not do anything. If the government starts negotiation with the elders and recognizes them, then we will be the police for the government." A minister in Kabul estimated the annual cost of putting elders in each district on the government payroll at $5 million -- a small price to pay for greater stability in a country where violence such as the suicide bomb that killed Taniwal is increasingly resembling that of Iraq in intensity, if not yet in scope.

Taniwal and I did not debate whether Pakistan was supporting the Taliban. As we sat a few miles from the frontier between the two countries -- the Pakistani tribal district of North Waziristan was a two-hour drive away on a dangerous road -- the answer was too obvious. "All the Taliban were once in Afghanistan," Taniwal said. "Now they are in Pakistan. The Taliban are helped by the [Pakistani] government." As we ate lunch at his home, a call from the police told of a suicide attack against a convoy on that very road to Pakistan.

Taniwal opposed big offensives by the U.S.-led coalition. "They roll over and flatten the whole area," he said. "But the enemy just goes from our side to the other side." The other side, of course, was Pakistan, where Taniwal, like so many other Afghans, had found a combination of refuge and persecution.

Pakistan was then negotiating a truce with Taliban who had gained control of most of North Waziristan. The final agreement, announced four days before Taniwal's killing, ceded control of the area to the militants in return for expelling "foreigners" (Arabs, Chechens, Uzbeks and others) and ending infiltration into Afghanistan. According to reports from the region, however, the suicide bomber who killed Taniwal four days later may have been sent on his mission from Waziristan.

Taniwal wanted the coalition to "pressure Pakistan more and more to keep the people there and also arrest and send them to Afghanistan." But for him, pressuring Pakistan was aimed not at destroying the Taliban but at reintegrating them. He wanted them, and all Afghans, "not to solve problems with the Kalashnikov. The Taliban should join with the government, the society, and have their own party," like the Taliban's sympathizers in Pakistan, who run in elections.

Though he asked me to keep this confidential, his death allows me -- indeed, it obligates me -- to reveal that he also advocated settling Afghanistan's historic conflict with Pakistan over the Pashtun territories across the frontier known as the Durand Line, which Afghanistan has never recognized as a border, even under the Taliban. "All the troubles up until now have been because of this problem," Taniwal said. Afghanistan built its army with Soviet aid to counter Pakistan, a U.S. ally. As a result, he said, "we did not gain Pashtunistan, but we almost lost Afghanistan." If international mediators can help resolve this conflict, "then there will be peace, development, business," Taniwal said. "Then Pakistan will be secure, and Afghanistan will be secure."

Taniwal feared that the United States and the current Afghan government would make the same errors as the Soviets and the governments they supported, but he recognized the difference between the two eras. "This is not an occupation," he said. "Afghanistan was a base for terrorists. These bases have been destroyed. Now they are trying again, and we have to fight back. But we should not make mistakes. Afghanistan is slowly going to be like the problem in Iraq if we don't solve these problems."

He put on his turban. We left his office, accompanied by a few lightly armed guards, and walked toward his car.

Nobel Laureates Call For Peace, Slam Bush (WT)

By Valerie Richardson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 17, 2006

DENVER -- Ten Nobel Peace Prize winners gathered here this weekend to issue a worldwide call for peace and understanding toward all people, with the possible exception of those in the Bush administration.

The laureates, who met here to celebrate the 10th anniversary of PeaceJam, an international education organization, opened the three-day event by excoriating the White House for its invasion of Iraq and subsequent increases in military spending.

"I honestly wonder how any of them can think for a nanosecond how having civil war in Iraq has made us safer," said Jody Williams of Vermont, who won the peace prize in 1997 for her work toward clearing land mines.

Billed as the largest U.S. gathering of Nobel Peace Prize winners in history, the event served as a starting point for the laureates' "Global Call to Action," an initiative aimed at urging young people to record 1 billion "acts of peace" over the next 10 years.

About 3,000 young people from 31 countries attended the event, held at the University of Denver.

The event's biggest names, the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Desmond Tutu, steered clear of politics. The Dalai Lama was greeted like a rock star yesterday before a one-hour speech in which he urged young people to embrace globalization.

"There are no national boundaries. The whole globe is becoming one body," the Tibetan spiritual leader said. "In these circumstances, I think war is outdated -- destruction of your neighbor is actually destruction of yourself."

At a press conference Friday, however, other peace prize winners criticized U.S. foreign policy, saying the focus should be on social and economic justice.

Adolfo Perez Esquivel, the 1980 winner for his Latin American human-rights work, took it a step further with a personal shot at President Bush.

"Bush says he prays. But I think God covers up His ears when George Bush prays," Mr. Esquivel said through a Spanish translator.

DOJ_NMG_0064941

The Nobel Peace Prize winners also issued a statement identifying 10 "barriers to global peace." They included disease, poverty, nuclear weapons, social injustice, racism, access to natural resources and the rights of women and children.

Conspicuously absent from the list was global terrorism. Several laureates said that terrorism was an outgrowth of ignorance, prejudice and inequality, and that it cannot be eradicated until those underlying social issues are addressed.

Mrs. Williams said the September 11 attacks were a response to U.S. aggression around the world, and that the White House should have tried to understand the reasons behind them before invading Iraq.

"They do not like the aggressive policies of the country and they don't like that we're ignorant of that," she said.

Mr. Esquivel compared the nearly 3,000 persons killed on September 11 with the tens of thousands of children who die every day of hunger. "I call that economic terrorism," he said.

Shirin Ebadi, who won the peace prize in 2003 for advocating democracy and human rights in the Middle East, said she was "very sorry for the sad events of September 11," but added that it would have been better for the United States to build a school in Afghanistan for each victim, rather than invading the country.

The founders of PeaceJam, Dawn Engle and Ivan Suvanjieff, said one of the event's goals was for the laureates to become as popular with young people as actors and musicians.

"I want the Nobel laureates to be icons, [instead of] some thumb-sucking [celebrities]," Mr. Suvanjieff said. "I want peace to be hip, sexy and cool."

Task Force Receives Top Award (HC)

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales this week bestowed his office's top annual award to federal prosecutors, FBI agents and paralegals who have served on the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, including those involved in this year's fraud and conspiracy trial of former Enron chairman Ken Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling.

The recipients of the Attorney General's Award for Exceptional Service included Sean Berkowitz, Kathryn Ruemmler, John Hueston and Cliff Stricklin, the lead prosecutors in the four-month trial of Lay and Skilling.

Other team members who received the award were prosecutors Robb Adkinds and Andrew Stolper and appellate specialists Douglas Wilson and John Drennan.

The award was also given to previous task force attorneys and leaders, including its first director, Leslie Caldwell; her successor as director, Andrew Weissmann; and former task force prosecutors Samuel Buell, Matthew Friedrich, Lisa Monaco, Benton Campbell and Linda Lacewell.

CRIMINAL LAW:

'Continued Criminal Conduct' Leads To Longer Sentence (SELMATJ)

By Victor Inge, THE SELMA TIMES-JOURNAL

Selma (AL) Times-Journal, September 17, 2006

MOBILE - A Selma man who federal authorities say "continued criminal conduct" will get a longer sentence than recommended.

DeWayne Lewis, 34, pleaded guilty to a felon in possession of a handgun in May 2006 and faced a sentencing range of 63 to 78 months in prison, under the federal advisory sentencing guidelines.

In the plea agreement, prosecutors had recommended the low end of the guidelines, court officials said.

However, after Lewis testified in his own behalf at the sentencing hearing this week, senior U.S. District Judge Charles R. Butler ruled that Lewis had perjured himself during his testimony and therefore "lacked acceptance of responsibility for his actions."

While on release awaiting sentencing, Lewis tested positive for cocaine use.

In addition, Lewis was a passenger in a vehicle stopped by the Selma Police Department when a gun was found next to where Lewis was seated.

Judge Butler then sentenced Lewis to the maximum term of 78 months in federal prison, to be followed by three years of supervised probation, according to information obtained from the U.S. Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0064942

Deborah J. Rhodes, U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Alabama, said the charges resulted from a joint investigation conducted by the ATF&E, The SPD and the Dallas County Sheriff's Office.

Federal law enforcement authorities have been vigilant about gun crimes in Selma lately, as ATF&E officers have worked for the past two years to help bring charges against more than 15 individuals from the St. Phillips Street area.

Authorities say they operated as "a street gang," and used guns to protect their turf.

Rodriguez Trial Entering Final Stage (STPPP)

By Dave Kolpack

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 17, 2006

FARGO, N.D. - The trial of Alfonso Rodriguez Jr. is entering its final stage, and jurors may begin deliberating this week over whether he should be the first person sentenced to death in North Dakota in nearly 100 years.

The verdict by the federal court jury of seven women and five men must be unanimous for Rodriguez, 53, of Crookston, Minn., to be sentenced to death instead of life in prison. He was convicted late last month of kidnapping resulting in the death of University of North Dakota student Dru Sjodin.

"I think this part is much harder to predict than when he was found guilty," said Joseph Daly, a Hamline University law professor who has participated in death penalty cases and has been following the Rodriguez case. "In North Dakota, jurors are not used to dealing with death penalty cases."

North Dakota does not have the death penalty but it is allowed in federal cases. During a trip to Fargo last year, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the government is justified in seeking capital punishment in some cases in states that have outlawed the penalty.

"I believe the fact the state doesn't have the death penalty doesn't mean that the people of the state would not impose the ultimate sanction when the right circumstances dictate that that happen," Gonzales said.

Prosecutors point to the fact that jurors, in deciding earlier that Rodriguez was eligible for the death penalty, found that Sjodin, 22, of Pequot Lakes, Minn., was killed in an "especially heinous, cruel and depraved manner."

Sjodin disappeared from a Grand Forks mall parking lot in November 2003. Her body was found in a ravine near Crookston the following April. Authorities said she had been beaten, raped and stabbed.

Defense attorneys say several factors favor a sentence of life in prison for Rodriguez. They say he was sexually abused as a child and may have suffered brain damage from farm chemicals, leading to psychological and behavioral problems.

Rodriguez's attorneys are expected to wrap up their testimony on Monday. U.S. District Judge Ralph Erickson said he believes jurors could began deliberating his sentence by the middle of the week, after prosecutors present rebuttal evidence.

Rodriguez's mother and two of his sisters testified last week about their struggles as a poor migrant farm family, living in a house with no electricity or running water. They said children teased Rodriguez about his race and physical appearance.

"It's not so easy to put aside that kind of heartfelt feeling of a mother and his background," Daly said Sunday. "I think it will have some effect on the jurors ... and you only need to affect one juror."

Prosecutors say another factor favoring the death penalty is that jurors found Rodriguez caused serious injury in three earlier assaults on women.

The government also believes that testimony by friends and family of Sjodin in the last phase of the trial points to a death sentence.

Daly said he expects the case to be appealed, whether Rodriguez receives the death penalty or life in prison. Death penalty appeals would be more prolonged, Daly said.

"It's possible her parents will never see him executed," he said.

FBI Sex Raises Privacy Issues (PTR)

By Carl Prine, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, September 17, 2006

It's a steamy story of sex, lies and videotape, told in an obscure federal court case the FBI doesn't want you to hear about.

But the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review uncovered the hidden details of "Dale J. Herr vs. the Department of Justice" at the normally staid U.S. Merit Systems Protection Board in Washington, the agency where fired federal workers go to get their jobs back.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation's quest to keep its dirty laundry from public sight concerns civil libertarians, who worry 9/11 turned a naturally secretive agency into a place that now walls off even routine litigation. Labor lawyers also fear federal courts are letting agencies pry too far into the private lives of employees.

FBI officials, however, insist they will continue to evict X-rated G-men.

The salacious Herr dossier makes the FBI's Cleveland field office into Hugh Hefner's Playboy Mansion. Herr, 38, a West Point grad and former special agent, concedes in court documents that in 2002 he videotaped his sexual exploits with three women -- two co-workers and one from outside the agency.

One female agent "had consented to videotaping of her sexual activities with (Herr) on other occasions," but he later filmed her "when she had not consented to and was not aware of the taping," according to court records.

FBI files also reveal two other women had no clue they were caught on film, footage Herr kept solely "for his own use."

"Based on conversations I had with (one of the women), I believed she would not be comfortable making videotapes of our sexual encounters," Herr admitted in court papers. FBI files say Herr knew at the time it "was not ... the right thing to do."

One of the female agents found the tapes in 2002 and told co-workers. Scuttlebutt about the amateur pornos swept the Cleveland field office, and the FBI began to question Herr's integrity and hold "much less confidence in his abilities to perform ... any job," according to legal filings.

An unnamed Cleveland supervisor testified he had to counsel two filmed female feds and make sure that "they and other employees concentrated on their work, rather than on the gossip and rumors." But Cleveland superiors never questioned Herr's job as a high-ranking agent. His office even recommended only a 30-day suspension, according to his attorney, Richard L. Swick of Washington.

The FBI brass overruled that recommendation. On June 9, 2004 -- 20 months after Herr's blue movies triggered an internal investigation -- he lost his badge. His appeal is pending.

Agents at field offices nationwide who knew Herr declined to speak on the record about the matter, saying they didn't want to jeopardize the litigation or incur agency discipline. Herr's attorney advised his client not to talk to the news media.

Girls on film

Special Agent Jeffrey B. Killeen, an attorney representing the Department of Justice in the matter, is so close-mouthed he won't even admit Herr exists. Killeen, assigned to the Pittsburgh office, often works on internal FBI investigations.

Although one of the taped women continued a romantic relationship with Herr after the brouhaha -- according to Herr's attorney -- Killeen persuaded administrative law judges to remove her name from documents because she was a "victim." Killeen also got judges to erase mention of the Cleveland field office and the identities of anyone who gave testimony.

When Herr's lawyer moved to rename his client "John Doe," not only did the FBI not oppose it, but also begged the court to seal every aspect of the case.

Senior FBI officials declined to discuss the Herr case.

"Decisions like that are never made lightly," said Patrick W. Kelley, FBI's deputy general counsel. "It's a process. We have to keep in mind that there may be victims, and we have a duty to protect them from an unwarranted invasion of their privacy. To do that, we must look even at singularly identifying details in cases. We do this to ensure that more damage isn't done to the victims."

Administrative law judges hear nearly 12,000 appeals annually for the Merit Systems Protection Board from federal workers who say they've been unjustly fired, furloughed or demoted. Judges rarely close hearings, disguise the identities of participants or bar taxpayers from reading testimony. Over the past 33 years, the board's panel in Washington has cloaked only three cases out of almost 300,000. The last "John Doe" caption came in a 1981 case involving a spy accused of molesting his daughter.

Against FBI wishes, the Washington panel published some details of Herr's case. But at the FBI's insistence, judges continue to keep citizens from attending Herr's Chicago hearings, reading transcripts or accessing court filings. Judges and their clerks in Washington and Chicago declined comment.

Contacted by the Trib, nearly a dozen top civil libertarians said FBI and board actions in the Herr matter raise questions about when it's appropriate to hide agent misconduct. At issue: Did the FBI push so hard to protect alleged victims, or did the agency fear embarrassment from a salacious story?

"The FBI and the board went too far, in my opinion," said attorney David K. Colapinto of Washington, an expert on government secrecy. "They could've blacked out the names of the women without putting the case under seal. The danger in all of this is that they could turn future proceedings in cases like this into a Star Chamber, which has happened before and which has been shown to have violated both the U.S. Constitution and the public's right to know.

"But does it surprise me? No. We're living in an era of secrecy. After 9/11, the FBI and the courts are making everything 'confidential' or 'secret,' and I'm afraid that mentality now might be extended even to the Merit Systems Protection Board."

NeXXXus of Evil?

Some labor lawyers fear the board's ruling reached too far into the private lives of federal workers. Herr's Chicago judge initially found the FBI failed to find a link between his boorish behavior and how he fought crime. That's important because FBI policies let agents engage in legal sexual conduct that some people find morally objectionable -- including adultery, homosexuality and gender-bending wardrobe choices.

"That's the key. It was none of the FBI's business," said attorney Swick. "They were just upset about what he did, and they can't say what he did was illegal. He didn't violate the FBI's own personnel policies, so why are they doing this to him?"

Swick says it's a shame the nation lost a dedicated agent and vows to reinstate him. The FBI concedes what Herr did in Ohio in 2002 wasn't illegal, but Pennsylvania and 47 other states now have "video voyeurism" laws banning what he did.

The Board tribunal reasoned that making pornos didn't get Herr in trouble, it was his "clearly dishonest" conduct that "caused emotional distress to the FBI employees he had videotaped." Judges said the fallout from his bedroom behavior snarled FBI operations, and an agency charged with collaring corrupt city cops can hold its own law enforcement officers to "a high standard of conduct."

FBI leaders consider the "high standard of conduct" the agency's cornerstone. They take pride in a rigorous vetting process that weeds out most applicants. To refresh academy ethics training, the FBI routinely posts e-mails to agents detailing bad behavior in their ranks. Strict standards govern much of a G-man's professional life, and agents are warned to never project an "appearance of impropriety."

"It's important for agents to understand that their conduct outside the agency can have repercussions in the office," said the FBI's Kelley. "And just because something isn't illegal doesn't mean it won't affect what we do."

Ralph Smith says the FBI's culture won't allow seamy conduct to go unpunished. The former civil service supervisor, best-selling author and staffing firm owner published some "John Doe" details on his popular Fedsmith.com Web site.

"Imagine a case like this one, with all the sex and videotaping, the gossiping and the long investigation that followed," said Smith. "There are issues of privacy and trust involved in all of that, and those are important concepts to FBI supervisors. The culture of the FBI won't tolerate that kind of behavior, even if it's not illegal."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

In Shadow Of 70's Racism, Recent Violence Stirs Rage (NYT)

By Dan Frosch

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

FARMINGTON, N.M. — The memory of 1974 still hangs heavily over this troubled New Mexico town, like a bad spirit drifting down from the sandpaper mesas and scrub-speckled hillsides.

That was the year the bodies of three Navajo men were found in nearby Chokecherry Canyon, burned and bludgeoned. The three white high school students charged in their killings were sent not to prison but to reform school.

The violence and mild sentences incited marches by Navajos through Farmington's streets and exposed tensions between them and the town's largely white residents. The United States Commission on Civil Rights eventually investigated and found widespread mistreatment and prejudice against Navajos.

Now, more than three decades later, Navajo leaders here are again calling for federal intervention.

On June 4, the police said, three white men beat a Navajo man, William Blackie, 46, and shouted racial slurs at him after asking him to buy beer for them. The men were charged with kidnapping, robbery and assault, and are being prosecuted under the state hate crimes law, which allows for longer sentences.

Six days later, a white Farmington police officer killed a Navajo man, Clint John, 21, after a struggle in a Wal-Mart parking lot. The police said Mr. John had assaulted his girlfriend and attacked the officer — grabbing his baton and moving aggressively toward him — before the officer shot Mr. John four times. Mr. John had a history of violence, the police said.

Mr. John's family says he did not have the baton when he was shot and is filing a wrongful death lawsuit against city officials, the Police Department and the officer.

The San Juan County Sheriff's Office, which investigated Mr. John's death, concluded that the shooting was justified. But after an outcry from Navajo Nation officials, the United States Justice Department is reviewing the matter to determine if a federal inquiry is necessary.

Both events have rocked this commercial hub of about 42,000 residents on the eastern edge of the Navajo Nation. After Mr. John's shooting, the Navajo Council allocated $300,000 to study racial violence in the 11 towns that border Navajo land and to finance the John family's lawsuit.

On Sept. 2, amid growing unease, Navajo leaders organized a march they said drew 1,000 participants. The march snaked along Highway 64, which leads to the Navajo community of Shiprock.

"We marched to memorialize the people that have died because of racial violence here," said Duane Yazzie, president of the Shiprock chapter of the Navajo Nation. "This was an outlet for people who are frustrated and angry."

Similar marches 32 years ago protested the severe, sometimes violent treatment of Navajos, like the practice of beating drunken Navajos passed out on Farmington's streets.

In 1975, the Civil Rights Commission released "The Farmington Report: A Conflict of Cultures," which described widespread prejudice against American Indians in Farmington and said they had suffered in almost every area from injustice and maltreatment.

These days, Farmington is no longer the Selma, Ala., of the Southwest, as some derisively called it then. The town has more Indians — about 17 percent of its residents, compared with less than 10 percent in the mid-1970's. The Civil Rights Commission, revisiting Farmington in 2004, found marked progress.

Mayor Bill Standley cited improvements including the creation of a citizen police advisory committee, an intertribal service organization and a Navajo behavioral health center. Mayor Standley categorized this year's violence as isolated.

"When these things happen, we still have to be concerned, and we have to listen," he said. "We have thousands of interactions between people in Farmington where nothing happens. But when things do go wrong, the culprit is usually alcohol. For the most part, it's not racism that drives Farmington's problems today, it's alcohol."

Indeed, a study this year by the Police Department showed that most crimes against Indians in Farmington were committed by Indians.

Police Chief Mike Burridge said the 12 Indians among the 124 officers on his force had supported the department after Mr. John's shooting.

"They told me they wished it was a Native American officer that was involved," said Mr. Burridge, adding that his officers underwent cultural sensitivity training that specifically addressed Navajo issues.

But Larry Emerson, chairman of the New Mexico Indian Education Advisory Council, said white residents had not absorbed the history of Indian subjugation and its psychological and social effects.

"The bias, the unfairness, this has been going on all along," said Mr. Emerson, who is Navajo. "Our people have suffered intergenerational trauma. They're so numb to it, they can't feel own their feelings anymore."

Racial violence — like the bludgeoning death in 2000 of a 36-year-old Navajo woman by two white men — still occurs, if less frequently. Mr. Emerson and Mr. Yazzie said many crimes against Navajos went unreported.

"We've become so accustomed to our treatment by the Anglo community, we just accept it as normal," said Mr. Yazzie, who was shot by a white hitchhiker in 1978 and lost an arm in the attack.

Mr. Yazzie said he believed outsiders, new to Farmington and its complicated racial dynamic, were to blame for the upswing in violence. He said he considered Mr. John's shooting unjustified and wanted the federal government to intervene, as it did in the 1970's. Other tribal leaders agree.

"We've come a long way since 1974, but sometimes it takes the feds to move things in the right direction, said Joe Shirley Jr., the president of the Navajo Nation. "Otherwise, it doesn't get done."

A stroll down Main Street, lined with antique shops and Navajo art galleries, reveals familiar divisions.

"The majority of Navajos are good people," said Joann Carney, a white saleswoman at a clothing shop. "But a few give them a bad name."

"Navajos get a lot of looks walking down the streets here," said Patrick John, an American Indian from Shiprock. "There's a lot of tension here. This is a border town."

For George Arthur, a Navajo Nation delegate who lives near Farmington, the problems are escalating. A few years ago, Mr. Arthur said, his son was beaten by white youths who tried unsuccessfully to set him on fire. Mr. Arthur said no one was charged in the crime.

"The Navajo are a proud people," he said. "We've learned to survive, and we can tolerate certain aspects of life. But not when it comes to our dignity."

Report Sizes Up The Toll Of Human Trafficking In Minnesota (MINNST)

By Myron P. Medcalf And Howie Padilla, Star Tribune Staff Writers

Minneapolis Star Tribune, September 17, 2006

About 120 social-service groups in Minnesota that responded to a survey estimated that they had worked with more than 500 sex trafficking victims and 55 labor trafficking victims over the past three years.

The exploitation in Minnesota of victims lured into forced labor and sex should be addressed on an "organized, statewide" level, according to a Minnesota Department of Public Safety report on human trafficking.

DOJ_NMG_0064946

About 120 social-service groups in Minnesota that responded to a survey estimated that they had worked with more than 500 sex trafficking victims and 55 labor trafficking victims over the past three years. Some victims had been trafficked from Minneapolis, St. Paul, Roseville and the Mall of America, according to the report.

Without statewide data on trafficking-related arrests, the numbers don't represent the fullness of the crime, according to the report, which was prepared for the Legislature.

Someone is trafficked when "forced, defrauded or coerced into service regardless of movement," but sometimes the offense involves transporting people across borders, domestic and international.

"This is an issue Minnesota is beginning to pay attention to," said Danette Buskovick of the Department of Public Safety, who wrote the report.

Also this week, the St. Paul Police Department's Gerald D. Vick Human Trafficking Task Force held its first meeting.

In a teleconference that lasted about four hours, St. Paul Sgt. John Bandemer and Cmdr. Todd Axtell -- along with other federal, state and local law enforcement officials -- heard from Houston officials about how they battle the problem. A federal grant honoring Vick helped fund the department's work on human trafficking. The slain St. Paul police sergeant was known for his zeal in fighting human trafficking and helping prostitutes turn their lives around.

But cracking down on leaders of human-trafficking rings has proven challenging because of scare tactics used to silence victims, some of whom are threatened because of their immigrant status, said Gail Pendleton, a national consultant on immigration issues who was in St. Paul on Friday for a conference on domestic violence in immigrant and refugee communities.

"The challenge is finding them," she said. "They generally are held captive. ... The first people they're not going to talk to are law enforcement."

Also at the conference was Joy Friedman, a former prostitute who was trafficked between states and now works with Breaking Free, a St. Paul group that assists females fleeing prostitution. Said Friedman: "This is something that's happening in our own back yard."

Woman Seeks To Take Monkey Into Restaurants For 'support' (AP)

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, September 17, 2006

SPRINGFIELD, MO. -- A woman from southwestern Missouri has asked the Springfield-Greene County Health Department to allow her to take her pet monkey into restaurants as a service animal.

The woman, Debby Rose, of Springfield, says Richard, her bonnet macaque monkey, provides emotional support that allows her to overcome an anxiety disorder and go out in public places. Rose said the federal Americans With Disabilities Act should allow the practice.

Health department officials met Friday with a local service agency, the Southwest Center for Independent Living, which is acting as an agent for Rose. The health department told the agency that Rose must produce some kind of federal ruling or certification that the monkey is a service animal under the ADA before it will consider allowing her to take the monkey into public places, said Kevin Gipson, director of health.

Family members said Rose's anxiety was disabling. Without her monkey, she's less able to manage normal tasks, such as grocery shopping and dining out, because of severe anxiety.

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman from the Justice Department in Washington, said that although the law was somewhat vague regarding emotional-support animals, they were covered.

"It's kind of a fine line, but the law errs on the side of protecting individuals that are disabled," she said.

Some Officials Say Voting Law Changes And New Technology Will Cause Trouble

An overhaul in how states and localities record votes and administer elections since the Florida recount battle six years ago has created conditions that could trigger a repeat -- this time on a national scale -- of last week's Election Day debacle in the Maryland suburbs, election experts said.

In the Nov. 7 election, more than 80 percent of voters will use electronic voting machines, and a third of all precincts this year are using the technology for the first time. The changes are part of a national wave, prompted by the federal Help America Vote Act of 2002 and numerous revisions of state laws, that led to the replacement of outdated voting machines with computer-based electronic machines, along with centralized databases of registered voters and other steps to refine the administration of elections.

But in Maryland last Tuesday, a combination of human blunders and technological glitches caused long lines and delays in vote-counting. The problems, which followed ones earlier this year in Ohio, Illinois and several other states, have contributed to doubts among some experts about whether the new systems are reliable and whether election officials are adequately prepared to use them.

In a polarized political climate, in which elections are routinely marked by litigation and allegations of incompetent administration or outright tampering, some worry that voting problems could cast a Florida-style shadow over this fall's midterm elections.

"We could see that control of Congress is going to be decided by races in recount situations that might not be determined for several weeks," said Paul S. DeGregorio, chairman of the federal Election Assistance Commission, although he added that he does not expect problems of this magnitude.

"It's hard to put a factor on how ill-prepared we are," said former Ohio governor Richard F. Celeste, a Democrat who recently co-chaired a study of new machines with Republican Richard L. Thornburgh, former governor of Pennsylvania, for the National Research Council. They advised local election officials to prepare backup plans for November.

"What we know is, these technologies require significant testing and debugging to make them work," added Celeste, now president of Colorado College. "Our concern -- particularly as we look to the November election, when there is a lot of pressure on -- is that election officials consider what kinds of fallbacks they can put in place."

The main focus is on whether people know how to properly use the machines, particularly the large army of volunteers who staff the polls at most precincts.

"We know the equipment works because it's been qualified to federal standards," said Kevin J. Kennedy, executive director of the Wisconsin State Elections Board and president of the National Association of State Election Directors. "The real challenge is to make sure our poll workers are trained and make sure voters have been educated so that we don't have an experience like Maryland had."

What is clear is that a national effort to improve election procedures six years ago -- after the presidential election ended with ambiguous ballots and allegations of miscounted votes and partisan favoritism in Florida -- has failed to restore broad public confidence that the system is fair.

To the contrary, litigation is on the rise. Rick Hasen, a law professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles and the author of Election Law Blog, found that the number of election challenges filed in court had risen sharply from 2000 to 2004 -- from 197 per year to 361. "Parties have become more willing to go to court," Hasen said.

In 2004, some Democrats alleged widespread voting irregularities in Ohio, including questionable vote-counting and problems with machines in Democratic-leaning precincts. Nonpartisan election experts have said the problems were not so severe to call President Bush's victory, by about 119,000 votes, into question.

This year, there are debates over standards for keeping voter registration rolls up to date; for the handling of "provisional ballots" used by people who do not show up on those rolls but believe they are legally qualified to vote; and for assuring the validity of electronic vote counts through the use of paper trails for all electronic machines. State legislation requiring state or federal identification for all voters has been challenged in courts.

One reason many issues are coming to a head this year is that the Help America Vote Act set the start of 2006 as the deadline for states to comply fully with its regulations.

Help America Vote does not mandate electronic voting, but it has greatly accelerated that trend. The law banned lever machines and punch cards to end debates about ambiguous "hanging chads" of the sort that occurred in Florida in 2000. What is clear is that electronic machines have their own imponderables.

In Montgomery County, the breakdown came when election officials failed to provide precinct workers with the access cards needed to operate electronic voting machines. In Prince George's County, computers misidentified some voters' party affiliation and failed to transmit data to the central election office. At least nine other states have had trouble this year with new voting technology.

During Illinois's March primary, poll workers in Cook County (Chicago) experienced problems at hundreds of sites with new voting technology, delaying results in a crucial vote for the county's board.

In Ohio, results from the May primary election were delayed for nearly a week in Cuyahoga County (Cleveland) when thousands of absentee ballots were incorrectly formatted for electronic scanners and had to be counted by hand.

Twenty-seven states require electronic voting machines to produce a paper trail available for auditing during a recount, but an analysis of Cuyahoga County's paper trail by the nonpartisan Election Science Institute showed that a tenth of the receipts were uncountable.

So far, none of these problems has prompted lingering legal challenges. But experts say turnout in general elections is much higher than in primaries and will put new stresses on the election system.

Although Help America Vote imposed national standards, it did not impose a uniform system. There are different styles and brands of equipment in use, with the potential for different bugs. The main systems are optical-scan machines and touch-screen machines. The potential problems election officials cite include machines breaking down or paper ballots not being read by optical-scan machines.

Beyond technical bugs, questions remain about whether the machines are vulnerable to vote fraud by hackers.

For several years, prominent computer scientists have taken aim at the electronic voting machines, which in essence are computers. In analyses of the software that runs widely used models of the machines, and in tests on specific brands, the scientists have shown how they could manipulate the machine to report a vote total that differed from the actual total cast by voters.

Machine vendors and some election officials have said that, while changing vote totals may be possible for someone with sophisticated technical knowledge in a controlled experiment, it is highly unlikely in a real election, given the security and oversight.

In the wake of Help America Vote, Congress has appropriated more than $3 billion to states to upgrade equipment, and Vermont Secretary of State Deb Markowitz, the president of the National Association of Secretaries of State, said many states have met all of Help America Vote's requirements. Backers credit the law with making voting easier for the disabled and people for whom English is not a primary language. And they say that when machines and databases work properly, they make voting more accurate.

As Election Day nears, however, states remain embroiled in legal disputes growing out of Help America Vote's requirements for centralized voter databases and for some first-time voters to show identification at the polls. The Justice Department has sued New York state for failing to comply with Help America Vote requirements, such as upgrading machines and building a central voter database.

Democrats and Republicans remain at odds over voter registration rolls. The Brennan Center for Justice, a liberal advocacy group, recently showed that properly registered voters in Florida, New Jersey and Kentucky were being removed from voter databases through electronic purges.

"Voter suppression doesn't happen with intimidation on Election Day, but rather through silent and sometimes secret government actions in the weeks leading up to an election," said Michael Waldman, the center's executive director.

Republicans have pressed for laws requiring voters to show a state or federal identification card -- a requirement Democrats say could disenfranchise low-income and minority voters.

A handful of states have passed expansive laws requiring voters to show state or federal ID at the polls. On Thursday, a circuit court judge in Missouri struck down as unconstitutional that state's ID requirement. That ruling followed a similar decision by a court in Georgia. A court in Indiana, however, upheld the requirement.

Further clouding the election process is the fact that, in many states, the administration of elections remains in political hands -- run by secretaries of state or other officials who run for office with partisan affiliations and who often have designs on higher office.

Robert Pastor, director of a commission on election reform organized by American University and headed by former president Jimmy Carter and former secretary of state James A. Baker III, said this tradition should be abandoned.

"The Carter-Baker commission identified 87 steps that need to be undertaken," he said. "Regrettably, almost none of them are being done right now. I would start by establishing statewide, nonpartisan election administration."

Md. Election Problems Fuel Push For Paper Record (WP)

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

After Primary Day Fiasco, Some Area Officials and Activists Say Electronic Voting Systems Need Backup

The primary day debacle in Montgomery and Prince George's counties will add momentum to regional efforts to ensure that election systems create a paper record of each vote, according to some elected officials and activists critical of paperless balloting.

They say the crisis at the polls in Florida during the 2000 presidential race, which prompted many states to switch to electronic voting, forced the adoption of overly complex systems that now must be simplified.

An aide to Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), who is seeking reelection in November, said heightened concerns about electronic voting in last week's primary would strengthen calls for a return to a paper-based system.

DOJ_NMG_0064949

Precinct judges in Montgomery and Prince George's counties have reported various machine-related problems, including computers that misidentified the party affiliations of voters, electronic voter registration lists that froze and voting-machine memory cards whose contents could not be electronically transmitted. The electronic voter lists, or "e-poll books," were used for the first time in Maryland.

Ehrlich remains "wary about the use of these machines in the upcoming elections," said policy adviser Joseph M. Getty, though the governor has announced he will take whatever steps are necessary to protect the security and reliability of the state's voting system.

Activists in Virginia said they hope Maryland's problems will inspire renewed efforts to require that all voting systems in the commonwealth produce a paper record of each vote. The voting in Virginia's June primary went smoothly, and Jean Jensen, secretary of the State Board of Elections, said she has not felt "a lot of unease in the population" over electronic voting.

Jensen said she is worried that opponents of electronic voting will exploit Maryland's troubles, which were partially the result of human error, and "turn this into a machine issue."

The District has a dual system in which voters at each polling station have a choice between voting electronically or casting a paper ballot that is read by an optical scanner. There were no significant problems at the polls Tuesday, but community activist Dorothy Brizill said she hopes the Board of Elections and Ethics will still conduct a review.

In Maryland, Ehrlich has requested that Linda H. Lamone, the administrator of the State Board of Elections, appear Wednesday before a three-member panel that includes the governor. Ehrlich, who has clashed frequently with Lamone, told her in a letter that last week's problems "raise questions about insufficient training, management and oversight of Maryland elections."

Deputy Administrator Ross Goldstein said Lamone "is reviewing the letter and will respond."

The outcomes of primary races for a congressional seat and two General Assembly seats remain undetermined as a result of voting irregularities.

In Montgomery County, where primary day began in chaos after election workers forgot to provide the plastic cards needed to access the machines, 10,000 to 12,000 voters had to use provisional paper ballots. The counting of provisional votes statewide will begin tomorrow and in Montgomery could take two or three days because of the volume, county officials said.

Meanwhile, Donna Edwards, who ran against Rep. Albert R. Wynn for the 4th District Democratic nomination, has said she will file a lawsuit because of concerns about the security of voting machines that were not returned promptly to the Prince George's Board of Elections.

Wynn leads by fewer than 3,000 votes in a district that stretches from Prince George's into a slice of Montgomery.

Both candidates in the close race for the Democratic nomination for Prince George's executive -- the disappointed challenger, Rushern L. Baker III, and the victorious incumbent, Jack B. Johnson -- also have called for an investigation of the county's voting process.

Kevin Zeese, an independent candidate for Maryland's open U.S. Senate seat and a longtime critic of electronic systems that do not provide a "paper trail," acknowledged that many problems in Maryland were caused by human error. Even so, he said, "the real problem [with electronic machines] continues. We can't tell whether the result really reflects the will of the people. There's no way to audit an electronic count."

Ehrlich pushed legislation this year that would have required Maryland to adopt paper ballots and optical scanners, but the measure died in the state Senate.

Several efforts to institute a paper record also died in the Virginia legislature this year. Carrie Nixon, a lawyer who leads the New Electoral Reform Alliance for Virginia, a nonpartisan group that has pressed for changes in the commonwealth's election system, said she hopes that Maryland's problems will give the initiatives another life.

Virginia's elections have run well in recent years, but Nixon said volunteer lawyers participating in an election-monitoring program organized by the Democratic National Committee in 2004 reported 117 problems with individual machines at about 600 polling stations. "These types of problems do give people pause with respect to the integrity of the system," she said.

Jensen said that not a single vote was lost in 2004 and that 8,000 to 10,000 voting machines were in use on Election Day.

In the District, voters have been able to choose between casting electronic and paper ballots since 2004, said Alice P. Miller, executive director of the Board of Elections and Ethics. Most voters still prefer paper, she said, but the number opting for an electronic ballot has risen with each election.

Brizill, the community activist, said she has visited polling sites where the electronic voting machine "sits vacant and not used, all day long."

Missouri, Other States Grapple With New Voting Requirements (SLPD)

By Bill Lambrecht And Adam Sichko, POST-DISPATCH WASHINGTON BUREAU

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON In the Arizona primary election last week, some Navajo Indians who don't drive and have no use for U.S. government-issued photo IDs didn't vote because of a new state law requiring identification to vote.

"Probably in the future, a lot of our elders just won't show up, and they're dedicated voters," said Isabelle Walker, the Navajo Nation's deputy chief of staff.

But in Macon, Ga., which tested Georgia's controversial photo identification law for the first time last week, only one voter of more than 200 who turned out for a school board special election lacked a picture ID — even though he had driven to the polling place.

"It went well. We feel like voters are grasping the idea," said Twiggs County Election Superintendent Marette Fair.

Missouri — where a judge last week struck down a new state photo ID law — is not alone in grappling with new voting requirements. More courtroom maneuvering is expected over the Missouri law, which requires voters to produce a valid Missouri drivers license, nondrivers ID, U.S. passport or military ID.

In at least eight states, political activists are squaring off over new rules requiring photo IDs as well as proof of citizenship and other identification for voter registration. In most cases, Republicans are supporting the restrictions, and Democratic-leaning groups are fighting them.

In Georgia, a federal judge ruled last week that voters in his state will not have to produce picture IDs in 30 special elections next week. But the ruling doesn't prevent Georgia from moving ahead with its new photo-ID law in November.

Other voting glitches

Ongoing confusion in several states is just part of the nation's unsettled election machinery less than two months before elections that will decide control of Congress.

Some states still are struggling with federal legislation requiring computerized voter registration lists. About one-third of the country — including parts of Missouri and Illinois — will deploy new voting machines for the first time in a general election. Serious glitches last week in Maryland's primary showed the need for well-trained poll workers in the new era of electronic voting.

The disputes over registration and voter identification add to pre-election anxieties.

In Florida, the League of Women Voters stopped registering voters earlier this year rather than risk penalties under a new state law putting requirements on civic organizations' voter drives. A federal judge intervened to stop the law — saying it "chills" First Amendment rights — and the league is back in the registration business and trying to make up for lost time, its president, Dianne Wheatley-Giliotti, said last week.

How much impact?

In Missouri and elsewhere, analysts say that the final outcome of the court challenges could have a bearing on close elections in November.

The voter ID requirements, along with the new registration rules "could have a potentially enormous impact on elections and could unquestionably swing the results of elections one way or the other," asserted Daniel Tokaji, an Ohio State University assistant law professor who writes a Weblog on election-law disputes.

Court cases have featured wildly varying estimates about who might end up not voting because they don't have photo IDs and lack the wherewithal or patience to get them. In Missouri, Secretary of State Robin Carnahan said that 240,000 voters could lack the necessary ID under the new law; the state Department of Revenue put that number at 138,000.

A St. Louis election-law attorney, Mark "Thor" Hearne, disputes that thousands of people will end up not voting.

Hearne, 45, who helped the Bush-Cheney campaign prevail in the Florida recount of 2000, has emerged as a key player nationally in arguing the case for voter ID laws. He is chief legal adviser to the American Center for Voting Rights, a northern Virginia advocacy group that has been a driving force in legislation demanding photo identification to vote.

"You get all these dire predictions of hundreds of thousands of people disenfranchised. But when they finally run an election, they find that it's no big deal," he said.

Hearne disputed those who say that the new laws fall unfairly on those least able to produce a photo ID, much the way poll taxes once kept people from the polls.

"This isn't singling people out," he said. "This is a feature of modern life. You need a photo to get on a plane, cash a check, receive government benefits."

Courtroom disputes

The ID movement is a product of outrages from voter fraud as well as the nation's post-9/11 security mind-set. The 2002 Help America Vote Act requires that first-time voters who register by mail produce government-issued IDs when they cast ballots.

DOJ_NMG_0064951

The movement picked up steam a year ago when the Commission on Federal Election Reform, headed by former President Jimmy Carter and ex-Secretary of State James Baker, concluded that a uniform voter identification system could help rebuild confidence in voting.

The bipartisan panel added that such a system should not impede participation. Whether it does — and ultimately will — is the crux of courtroom disputes.

In Missouri, Cole County Circuit Judge Richard Callahan concluded that the ultimate effect of the law was an unconstitutional new qualification to vote. Supporters say it can be fixed with legislative tinkering.

Arizona is one state where the pro-ID forces have prevailed in court, much to the dismay of Indian tribes and partisans who relish the heavily Democratic vote from the 250,000-strong Navajo Nation.

Many older Navajo were born at home and don't have birth certificates, tribal officials said. And even if they can afford the IDs, some simply reject state dictates.

"It offended our elders very much. They say, 'Now you end up telling me I have to prove who I am to you?' That's not right given that we were the indigenous people of this country even before laws were created," said Leonard Gorman, a Navajo elections expert.

Joe Kanefield, state election director in Arizona, countered that tribes in his state were given special consideration, allowing them to show just one form of ID proving tribal membership, whether or not it had a photo.

Last week's election, he said, "went very smooth. There were very few problems, if any. . . . We don't think this law in any way discouraged people from voting."

Meanwhile, Marette Fair, the election head in Twiggs County, Ga., had this message for Missourians after hearing that her state's on-again, off-again voter ID law had been temporarily suspended.

"I hope your election in Missouri goes well and you don't get jerked around like us," she said.

City's Vote Recount Ends (MJS)

By Derrick Nunnally And Dave Umhoefer

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 17, 2006

46,500, not 80,000, people turned out, agency says

Milwaukee officials announced Saturday that after a three-day manual count of ballots, Tuesday's primary election brought 46,500 voters to the polls in Milwaukee, not 80,000 as the city previously reported.

City Election Commission chief Susan Edman said the ward-by-ward review of turnout confirmed the city's suspicion that a computer programming error by her office caused the misreporting.

The new turnout count, which still needs confirmation by county officials, means that 15.5% of the city's registered voters came to the polls.

The earlier report of nearly 27% turnout had generated confusion because it suggested that tens of thousands of people showed up to vote but ignored or voted incorrectly in the top races on the ballot, including state attorney general and Milwaukee County district attorney and sheriff.

The discrepancy was brought to the city's attention by the Journal Sentinel, which reported on it Thursday. Its cause, Edman said, was a double and triple count at polling sites containing multiple wards. The duplicated figures showed up in 198 of the city's 314 wards, the paper found. 2004 election

After consulting with state and county election officials, the city did a full ballot count to assure public confidence in the system. That confidence had already been shaken by highly publicized problems the city had in the 2004 presidential election.

"The public should be very pleased with the outcome of this joint canvass," Edman said.

The laborious manual review was not a recount of votes cast for individual candidates. Milwaukee Mayor Tom Barrett and Edman have said repeatedly that the computer error was isolated to total turnout and did not affect the reporting of results in any race.

Those statements seemed to satisfy all the candidates on the ballot except Vince Bobot, an assistant city attorney who lost a fairly close race for the Democratic Party nomination for sheriff. Bobot is considering seeking a recount of votes in the sheriff's race, for which the total vote tally - 39,285, including write-in votes - is in line with vote counts for other races.

The hand count was conducted by the city with help from the county at the city's warehouse on N. Hawley Road. The count was completed Saturday and turned up 46,413 ballots, compared with the original report of 80,064, a difference of 33,651.

Based on city officials' diagnosis of the computer miscalculation, city officials believe instead of 46,413 that 46,548 people actually voted last week. The gap of 135 between that machine count and the hand count is mostly due to 101 ballots cast at 53rd Street School, 3618 N. 53rd St., that were tallied the night of the election but could not be located for the hand count, Edman said. A search is under way.

The remaining variance of 34 ballots will be reconciled when city officials review polling lists and other election materials before turning its numbers over to the Milwaukee County Election Commission. The county does the official canvass of vote totals and reports that to the State Elections Board.

Edman said she was satisfied by the outcome of the unusual ballot count because of the small variance.

"It really confirms the fact that the system works," she said. Programming error

The programming error has been fixed and will not be repeated in the November general election, Edman said.

The city initially said the computer error had affected tallies at every ward located in a multiward voting site.

But in the city's original turnout report, seven wards at multiward polling locations did not show duplicated turnout figures, seemingly in contradiction to the city's description of the computer error. Edman said Saturday, however, that there was a simple explanation for that: in those seven multiward sites, more than one voting machine was present.

Janice Dunn, county Election Commission manager, said she expects to complete the canvass of Milwaukee and suburbs by the end of the week. From the Sept. 17, 2006 editions of the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

Global Gun Rights? (NYT)

By Joshua Kurlantzick

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

In July, as rifle-wielding militias in Iraq slaughtered civilians, the United Nations held a conference on small arms. The conference aimed at creating an international treaty limiting the trade in small arms — weapons designed for personal use, which cause about a thousand deaths worldwide each day. But after intensive debate, and despite the support of many nations, even the normally sunny Kofi Annan had to admit that the conference had collapsed or, as he put it, had "ended without agreeing on an outcome."

One group represented at the conference had reason to celebrate: the National Rifle Association, which in the past decade has been refining its own version of globalization. At first, the group openly fought gun control abroad, but that enabled gun-control advocates to accuse local gun lobbies of selling out to America. In Brazil, the N.R.A. tried a new approach. Brazil has the most gun deaths annually of any country, and last October it held a referendum on a nationwide gun ban. In the run-up to the vote, polls suggested that more than 70 percent of Brazilians supported the ban. Then the Brazilian gun lobby, which previously had emphasized the desirability of gun ownership, began running advertisements that instead suggested that if the government could take away the right to own a weapon (though Brazilians have no constitutional right to bear arms), it could steal other civil liberties. This argument took gun-control advocates by surprise, and on voting day, 64 percent of Brazilians voted against the gun ban. "We gun-control groups failed to anticipate this idea of focusing on rights," admits Denis Mizne of Sou da Paz, a Brazilian public-policy institute. As a report in Foreign Policy revealed, the National Rifle Association lobbyist Charles Cunningham had traveled to Brazil as early as 2003 to impart strategy to local gun advocates, teaching them to emphasize rights instead of weapons.

Around the world, the N.R.A. is finding that a rights-based approach translates into many languages. As the N.R.A.'s executive vice president, Wayne LaPierre, says: "They made the rights argument [in Brazil.] They made the argument that this was being taken away from the people." He pauses. "It caught Iansa" — the International Action Network on Small Arms — "by surprise. They already had the Champagne on ice." In the mid-1990's, the N.R.A. became a nongovernmental observer at the United Nations and helped form a global coalition of pro-gun groups to match disarmament coalitions. At U.N. conferences, this coalition then uses success in national referendums to argue against global treaties. "The vote in Brazil on last Oct. 23 was a mandate," the head of one gun-advocacy group argued at the U.N. conference this July. "The international anti-gun community, especially powerful NGO's, was intimately and extensively involved in supporting the gun-ban referendum. They lost. They did not receive the mandate."

The N.R.A. is in the conservative vanguard: in recent years many conservative groups have been increasingly willing to engage abroad. Going global has several advantages. Organizations get more leverage over U.S. policy: conservative groups' growing knowledge of H.I.V. issues in Africa has given them more say over America's global AIDS policies, leverage that conservatives have used to press abstinence as a leading strategy. Going global also can provide a defense against the influence of international law, which judges like Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer have increasingly introduced into American courts. Conservative legal organizations like the Alliance Defense Fund have headed to countries like Sweden to combat international precedent on issues ranging from human cloning to home schooling. And conservatives now realize that by co-opting the language of rights, traditionally employed by the political left, they can export their own ideas of universal rights, whether that means the White House's democratization program or a universal right to bear arms.

Lee Hospital Deal Scrutinized (FMNP)

By Jennifer Booth Reed

Fort Myers (FL) News-Press, September 17, 2006

The state attorney general is looking into Lee Memorial Health System's acquisition of Southwest Florida Regional Medical Center and Gulf Coast Hospital.

"We are aware of this potential merger, or purchase, and we're in the process of reviewing the situation," spokeswoman JoAnn Carrin said.

In the 1990s, the attorney general had filed an amicus brief on Lee Memorial's behalf during the system's bid to acquire Cape Coral Hospital. At that time, the Federal Trade Commission was challenging Lee Memorial, saying the purchase would have given Lee Memorial too much control of the market.

District and appeals courts rejected the FTC argument and ruled Lee's status as a public hospital exempted it from antitrust action and the FTC did not have jurisdiction over the matter. The FTC dropped its complaint because Health Management Associates, or HMA, purchased it.

Cape Coral Hospital ultimately merged with Lee Memorial in June 1996. At the time of that merger, the state was seeking to block Hospital Corporation of America from taking over Cape Hospital because it would have too much power.

"The theory of antitrust is to protect the public," said Charles Bigelow, a retired attorney who used to work for Lee Memorial and is familiar with its status as a public agency. "If you apply antitrust to a public hospital, you're protecting the public from itself."

Carrin said there had been changes to the law in 2000, and state lawyers are looking to see whether those amendments have impact on the previous court rulings in Lee Memorial's favor.

"If we see an issue we would contact the parties," Carrin said.

U.S. Says Plan To Expand Alaska Oil Drilling Should Proceed (BLOOM)

By Jim Efstathiou Jr.

Bloomberg, September 17, 2006

Sept. 16 (Bloomberg) -- The Bush administration said a Sept. 27 sale of oil drilling leases in Alaska should go forward and rejected a court's objections that environmental effects have not been properly addressed.

The U.S. Interior Department said in a court filing yesterday that the impact of expanded drilling on air, water, wetlands and wildlife had been properly considered in the plan to expand drilling in the National Petroleum Reserve.

Earlier this month, U.S. District Judge James Singleton in Anchorage ruled that an environmental impact statement prepared by the agency failed ``to adequately address the cumulative effects'' of drilling.

``Depending on the resource or activity, the cumulative impacts throughout the entire North Slope are discussed,'' the Interior Department said in the filing. The agency ``conducted the required `hard look' at those impacts given the limited nature of information available at the leasing stage.''

Singleton's preliminary decision threatened plans to proceed with the lease sale and drew praise from groups including the National Audubon Society. The sale includes 400,000 acres around Teshekpuk Lake, an area environmental groups consider a critical Arctic wildlife habitat.

Expanding domestic oil and natural gas supplies was a cornerstone of the energy plan President George W. Bush unveiled early in his first term. Bush has so far failed to persuade Congress to allow drilling in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, 300 miles to the east of the petroleum reserve.

Teshekpuk Lake

The 23-million acre National Petroleum Reserve, on the Beaufort Sea between Barrow and the Colville River, was established in 1923 as a source of oil for the U.S. Navy. Environmental groups and some lawmakers oppose drilling in the area between Teshekpuk Lake and the Beaufort Sea.

Thousands of geese gather to molt in the area, and caribou birth their calves there, according to the National Audubon Society. Two oil spills from BP Plc pipelines this year further east in Prudhoe Bay have stirred concern about drilling for oil on Alaska's tundra.

DOJ_NMG_0064954

The leasing plan acknowledged environmental concerns by imposing limits on surface structures and drilling activity during periods when wildlife could be impacted, the Bureau of Land Management said. The bureau oversees oil and gas drilling on federal lands for the Interior Department. Drilling would not be permitted in Teshekpuk Lake.

Prudhoe Bay Spill

The entire petroleum reserve could hold 9.3 billion barrels of crude, a 2002 U.S. Geological Survey report said. About 87 percent of the petroleum reserve has previously been available for drilling. The planned Sept. 27 lease sale would boost that to 95 percent.

BP in March reported the largest-ever oil spill on Alaska's North Slope, and last month the company partially shut Prudhoe Bay, the largest U.S. oil field, after discovering pipeline leaks and corrosion.

BP, the world's third-biggest oil company, neglected its Prudhoe Bay oil pipelines for years and may have suppressed worker complaints, U.S. lawmakers said at a Sept. 7 hearing in Washington. Senate Republicans who support expanded drilling in Alaska last week said BP's problems may set back efforts to tap Alaska's resources.

A Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times poll of 1,321 people in June found that 61 percent blamed Bush for high gasoline prices. In a July survey of 1,011 people, 32 percent said they have been forced to cut spending in other areas and to conserve energy. In the same poll, 51 percent were opposed to drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge while 45 percent were in favor.

Gulf Oil Discovery Adds Pressure To Offshore Drilling Debate (FLSUNSEN)

By William E. Gibson, Washington Bureau Chief

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Discovery of a vast oil deposit deep under the Gulf of Mexico has put additional pressure on Congress as it considers legislation on whether to allow offshore drilling closer to the Florida coast.

The undersea oil field 270 miles southwest of New Orleans, which could expand U.S. reserves by as much as 50 percent, provides new arguments for both sides of a contentious debate over legislation to expand offshore drilling.

Proponents say the discovery shows the great potential for tapping the Outer Continental Shelf closer to shore to boost energy supplies.

Opponents contend it proves energy companies have plenty of tracts to explore without moving into more environmentally sensitive areas near Florida, California and other states dependent on clean beaches and tourism.

Opponents already are on the defensive because of a rising demand for supplies amid high fuel costs, though prices have eased lately. They fear the discovery will prompt Congress to allow exploration in areas where drilling now is banned.

``It gives us [drilling opponents] a steeper hill to climb, now that the news of the size and scope of this find has been all over the country," said U.S. Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fort Pierce. ``This is welcome good news for energy independence and gives us new capacity. But I remain troubled by the prospect of putting more rigs in vulnerable areas along the main path of hurricanes."

The discovery comes as Congress is grappling over conflicting offshore drilling bills, written to boost domestic supplies and reduce U.S. dependence on foreign sources of oil and natural gas.

Most Florida leaders are rallying around a Senate-passed bill that would open 8.3 million acres of the Gulf to energy production but keep rigs more than 125 miles from the state's shores. Most drilling proponents prefer a House-passed version that would allow exploration as close as 50 miles from shore.

Drilling forces immediately hailed the discovery in the central Gulf as proof that the Outer Continental Shelf contains much more oil and gas than previously suspected.

A trio of energy companies dug a test well into ultra-deep waters below salt formations to find an oil supply undetected by more superficial seismic testing. The test well is spouting 6,000 barrels of oil a day, prompting estimates that the area contains 3 billion to 15 billion barrels.

``It's a big deal and very important," said Allan Pulsipher, executive director of the Center for Energy Studies at Louisiana State University. ``It will enable the U.S. to maintain its domestic supply of oil and gas at a level similar to where we are now. We'll still be dependent on oil imports, but less dependent than if this reserve were not there."

While significant, even 15 billion barrels would be tiny compared to Saudi Arabia's reserves of 250 billion barrels. The U.S. currently imports about 60 percent of its oil supplies and consumes about 20.6 million barrels a day, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration. Fifteen billion barrels would cover the nation's petroleum needs for about two years.

Proponents say expanding oil exploration could reveal there is much more than 3 billion to 15 billion barrels beneath the Gulf.

``This shows us the potential is there for America to not be so dependent on foreign sources," said U.S. Rep. John Peterson, R-Pa., a leading proponent of natural gas drilling.

DOJ_NMG_0064955

Peterson has taunted Florida, whose members represent the biggest obstacle to his drilling plans, in the House debate. He once exhorted the White House to ``get its head out of the Florida sands'' rather than accommodate the state's concerns.

``Florida has carved out a position that is actually thwarting America's opportunity to become energy self-sufficient,'' he said in an interview. ``The OCS is a safe place to produce. It's not a threat to Florida tourism or its beaches.''

Foley and many environmentalists remain unconvinced, pointing to other recent developments that show vulnerabilities in oil drilling and distribution.

These include leaks found in an Alaska pipeline and a federal report citing 124 spills from offshore rigs and pipelines in the Gulf last year caused by Hurricanes Rita and Katrina. Most of the 124 spills were minor, but all told, they spewed 741,384 gallons of toxic petroleum into Gulf waters.

``This new find will alleviate some of our dependence,'' Foley said, ``but at what cost and what risk?''

Hunt For Source Of Bad Spinach Carries On (NYT)

By Julia Preston And Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

SALINAS, Calif., Sept. 16 — Packaged spinach salad disappeared from store shelves across the country Saturday, as investigators searched for the source of bacterial contamination that has now sickened more than 100 people.

Officials said Saturday that the number of people affected by the E. coli outbreak now stood at 102, up from 94 the day before. Dr. David Acheson, director of food safety at the Food and Drug Administration, reported no additional deaths beyond one that had occurred in Wisconsin.

At this point, Dr. Acheson said, federal officials do not know how or when the spinach was contaminated.

“We advise consumers not to eat fresh spinach or fresh-spinach-containing products until further notice,” he said Saturday night. The advice applies to food purchased at restaurants and supermarkets, he said.

Officials at the F.D.A. announced Friday that they had detected an “epidemiological link” between the outbreak of infections of E. coli O157:H7 and spinach produced by Natural Selection Foods, a company that grows and packages fresh greens in San Juan Bautista, Calif., and is best known for its organic Earthbound Farm brand.

But company executives and health officials emphasized Saturday that no E. coli bacteria had been found in Natural Selection plants or on any salad the company had distributed.

Federal officials initially advised consumers not to eat fresh spinach that had been packed in plastic bags. But Dr. Acheson said consumers should avoid eating fresh spinach in general because it might have come from such packages before it was displayed or served.

“Consumers may not be aware that the spinach available to them was prepackaged,” he said.

With the wide publication of the Earthbound Farm name in connection with the outbreak, consumers wondered whether organic farm practices were implicated in the contamination. But no conclusive link has emerged between the infection and organic farming, Natural Selection executives and organic farming experts said.

Natural Selection distributes many products grown by its farmers that are not certified organic, and it has a large business packing fresh greens for other nonorganic growers, including Dole.

Growers and scientists were beginning to grasp the serious difficulties the F.D.A. faces in trying to pinpoint the source of the bacteria and eliminate it from the food supply. Health and agriculture experts said E. coli could creep into fresh leafy food at many points, from the field to the packing plant to the store.

In response to a question, Dr. Acheson said water used to irrigate spinach and lettuce fields was a possible source of the latest contamination, though he said officials had no evidence for or against that hypothesis.

“E. coli resides in the intestinal tract of cattle,” he said. “When cattle manure gets into the water system, it can spread and contaminate anything the water gets into contact with.”

Natural Selection packs produce from 150 organic farmers in four states who are its direct partners in Earthbound Farm, and from farmers whose produce sells under at least two dozen other brands.

The 102 cases of illness have been reported from 19 states. In 16 of the 102 cases, Dr. Acheson said, patients developed a form of kidney failure called hemolytic uremic syndrome.

Natural Selection has issued a voluntary recall of all its products containing spinach carrying “Best if used by” dates from Aug. 17 to Oct. 1. F.D.A. officials said a number of people who were infected had reported eating spinach salads from brands that the company packs. But officials warned that their investigation could still point to other companies.

In California, growers said virtually all harvesting and production of spinach products, whether bagged or canned, had come to a halt.

Growers said the complexities in the process of farming, picking, washing and packing fresh leafy greens could make the contamination extraordinarily difficult to detect.

"To trace this you can go from the ground up," said Tim Chelling, a spokesman for Western Growers, which represents 3,000 growers and shippers in California and Arizona. "Testing the soil and the growing area would be the first possible point of entry."

Farming procedures in conventional, nonorganic fields are not regulated by the government. The production process, Mr. Chelling said, involves a host of people, like pickers and produce stockers, as well as many kinds of farm equipment and cleaning machinery.

Earlier this summer, the F.D.A detected a pattern of E. coli bacteria in fresh leafy vegetables, primarily lettuce, and focused its attention on the Salinas Valley in California. Since August, officials have been inspecting lettuce farms and packing plants in the valley, said Patti Roberts, a spokeswoman for the California Department of Health Services.

On Thursday and Friday, F.D.A. inspectors examined the huge Earthbound Farm packing plant, set among long rows of leafy vegetable crops, and found no evidence of bacteria, company executives said.

"Earthbound Farm has been making fresh salads for more than 20 years, and there has never been a safety problem associated with any of our products," Myra Goodman, a founder and vice president of the company, said Saturday. "Any association with this tragedy is obviously devastating to us."

Natural Selection's association with the infection was to some extent a result of its own success. Founded in 1984 on a three-acre farm, Natural Selection Foods now distributes produce farmed on 26,000 acres of certified organic fields in Arizona, California, Colorado and Washington.

Even within its organic operations, the company generates substantial sales of nonorganic products, Ms. Goodman said. As the organic food market expands, the company is converting new fields to organic farming, which does not use chemicals and pesticides. A field must be farmed organically for three years before its produce can be certified organic. During the transition, Natural Selection markets produce under nonorganic brand names.

Growers said they had set up rigorous safety systems, especially in the fresh produce industry. But contamination remains a constant challenge. "You can't just boil bacteria," said Hank Giclas, vice president of Western Growers. "It will kill the bacteria, but it also will kill some of the desirable features of the product."

Department Of Billion-dollar Bungling (TIME)

By Douglas Waller, Washington

Time, September 17, 2006

How the Interior Department managed to lose about $2 billion of the public's money. Can this mess be cleaned up?

Complaints are beginning to pile up against the U.S. Interior Department. And they're coming not just from outside critics but also from people in the agency. The problems surfacing are serious: managerial incompetence, bureaucratic snafus that are costing taxpayers billions of dollars, and a pervasive forgive-and-forget attitude toward senior department officials who cross ethical lines.

The Project on Government Oversight, a private watchdog group, released a study this week charging that Interior's Minerals and Management Service (MMS) has become far more lax the past four years in collecting unpaid royalties from the land it leases to oil and natural gas companies. From 2002 to 2005, MMS's auditing and compliance division collected $48 million not paid on mineral leases, which is "less than half the average $115 million collected annually in the division's first 20 years," according to Beth Daley, the watchdog organization's director of investigations. The drop in collections, Daley says, came after the auditing and compliance division cut its staff by 26% and began relying more on a computerized checking system of the leases "based upon information provided from the industry."

But the watchdog group's beef with Interior is tepid compared with the blast delivered a day earlier by the department's own inspector general, Earl Devaney. In scorching testimony before a House Government Reform subcommittee the no-nonsense Devaney charged that during his seven years as Interior's IG his revelations of misdeeds and foul-ups have been routinely "disregarded by the department." Numerous IG reports on regulations circumvented, procurement irregularities, project failures and bureaucrats being awarded bonuses despite their failures have been met with "vehement challenges" by Interior officials "to the quality of our audits, evaluations and investigations," he told lawmakers.

One of the most expensive examples of "bureaucratic bungling," according to Devaney, was a department program in the late 1990s to encourage oil-company exploration in deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico, where it's more difficult than it is on land to extract the crude. Those leases exempted the companies from having to pay royalties to the federal government. The agreements, however, were supposed to have a clause in them that lifted the exemption if oil prices shot past $36 a barrel. (Oil currently sells for more than $60 a barrel.) But because of a foul-up in drafting the deepwater leases, 1,000 of them issued in 1998 and 1999 didn't contain the language lifting the exemption for higher prices. And, Devaney says, mid-level Interior bureaucrats kept their superiors in the dark about the omission for five years. The Government Accountability Office estimates that the mistake has so far cost taxpayers $2 billion in lost royalty revenue and that number could eventually soar to $10 billion.

Rather than heads rolling for infractions, the Cabinet agency has become a fault-free zone, Devaney claims. "Short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of Interior," says the former Secret Service agent. "Ethics failures on the part of senior department officials—taking the form of appearances of impropriety, favoritism, and bias—have been routinely dismissed with a promise 'not to do it again.'" In numerous instances top officials who leave the department under a cloud, said Devaney, "are sent off with a party paying tribute to their good service."

A case Devaney found particularly troubling was that of Steven Griles, Interior's deputy secretary in George W. Bush's first term. Devaney in 2004 referred 25 possible ethics violations by Griles to the Office of Government Ethics outside of Interior. That office cleared Griles of 23 of the violations but referred the remaining two to then-Secretary Gale Norton for a decision. Devaney says Norton refused, over his objections, to take any action against her deputy.

Griles, who left the department in January 2005, says he was cleared because all the allegations investigated by the IG were "conclusively and unquestionably proven to be false." Norton tells TIME that of the two potential violations the ethics office kicked back to her, "one was about a dinner Steve Griles had in the home of a lobbyist (which Griles paid for), and the other was a question about the definition of a 'particular matter' under federal ethics guidelines. On that latter point, I simply viewed Mr. Devaney's interpretation as legally incorrect."

Meanwhile, Dirk Kempthorne, who replaced Norton as Interior Secretary last July, insists he's taking Devaney's "allegations concerning issues dating back to 1998 very seriously." Kempthorne points out that his first day on the job he sent a letter to Interior employees titled "Our Ethical Responsibilities." Since then, the new Interior chief says he's been preaching to his workers that when they're unsure whether something is ethical or not, "if in doubt... don't."

Congress, however, wants to see more than employee pep talks. "The Interior Department breached its fiduciary duty to the American people," says Republican Rep. Darrell Issa, who chairs the government reform panel's Energy and Resources Subcommittee. "It is charged with holding our natural resources in trust." Instead, he complains, the department "squandered billions."

Issues Of Ecology, Theology Collide (KCS)

By Rick Montgomery

The Kansas City Star, September 17, 2006

Before watching the end of the world, hundreds of movie viewers bowed their heads.

“Guard us against the historical arrogance of our own species,” a Methodist minister prayed recently at the Glenwood Arts Theatre in Overland Park. Then lights dimmed for the Midwest premiere of “The Great Warming.”

The documentary on the man-made dangers of global warming is being released for church groups to review before the Nov. 7 elections. While its plot is an easy sell to this invited crowd — more left than right, plenty of hybrid cars parked outside — the film raises spiritual questions that could carve up evangelical voting blocs in new ways.

Is protecting Earth a moral value, an act of stewardship?

Seeking to nudge more social conservatives into the ecological fold, bumper stickers are asking, “What Would Jesus Drive?”

“This movement in the last six to nine months has mushroomed,” said Chuck Gillam, a one-time Republican who is a representative to the Sustainable Sanctuary Coalition, an interfaith group that meets monthly in Prairie Village. “Global warming could be the one thing where you can get a united front between the secular and religious.”

Cracks are appearing within evangelical communities once inclined to dismiss environmental protection as a scientific rush to big government. Many conservative pastors remain skeptical — not because the science is wrong, but because they say their congregations would rather take on abortion, stem-cell research and same-sex marriage.

The harmful effects of those issues will “come kicking at our door far quicker than global warming will,” said the Rev. Jerry Johnston of First Family Church in Overland Park.

But in February, an unlikely coalition of church, corporate and seminary leaders called for the U.S. government to aggressively curb greenhouse-gas emissions. Their TV ad campaign urged Americans to “stop global warming for our kids, our world and our Lord.”

Backers of this so-called Evangelical Climate Initiative include Rick Warren, author of the best-selling book The Purpose-Driven Life, and leaders of the National Association of Evangelicals — a group comprising 60 denominations representing 45,000 churches.

In July, an opposition group fired back.

DOJ_NMG_0064958

More than 100 Christian pastors, economists and climate researchers calling themselves the Interfaith Stewardship Alliance signed a 12,000-word manifesto debunking the science that blames global warming on human activity and the burning of fossil fuels.

Saying that global warming exists but probably by natural causes, the group questioned whether humans can or should do anything to correct it.

"It is immoral and harmful to Earth's poorest citizens to deny them the benefits of abundant, reliable, affordable electricity and other forms of energy," the policy statement noted.

Still, groups such as Green Cross International and the Evangelical Environmental Network hope "The Great Warming" will prompt some social conservatives to slide left on this one topic.

The campaign aims to schedule special screenings for large churches nationwide before the film hits theaters in late October. About 500 pastors have been asked to give Earth-friendly sermons and urge their flocks to quiz candidates on environmental positions.

"There are socially conservative business leaders frustrated with the current administration when it comes to energy policy," said Troy Helming, a "green Republican" and founder of Lenexa-based Krystal Planet Corp., a renewable-energy company that is backing the film.

"Some feel they can't speak up without alienating themselves."

A crossover issue

An August poll by the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life found global warming was considered a serious problem by 79 percent of Americans — and 68 percent of "white evangelical Protestants."

Nearly half of white evangelicals who responded to the poll said stricter environmental laws were "worth the cost," still less than Catholics, mainline Protestants and "secular" respondents.

"There's a real potential for this to become a crossover issue," said John Green, a Pew Forum fellow.

"White evangelical Protestants are much more sympathetic to environmental problems than other people might think," Green said. "It could be that their attitudes are changing. It could be they're just beginning to form opinions as more becomes known" about global warming.

The Rev. Richard Cizik pushes "creation care" — a crusade against climate change. Cizik, the former head of the National Association of Evangelicals, calls ecological degradation "an offense against God."

Weighing in last month in The New Republic was Harvard University biologist Edward O. Wilson, the winner of the National Medal of Science and two Pulitzer Prizes.

"Despite all that divides science from religion, there is good reason to hope that an alliance on environment issues is possible," Wilson wrote in an open letter to an imagined Southern Baptist pastor.

"While the Old Testament God commands humanity to take dominion over the Earth, the decree is not … an excuse to trash the planet."

That was the broadside attack in 1967, when historian Lynn White Jr. wrote in Science magazine that Christianity "bears a huge burden of guilt" for raping the planet. He blamed a dominion theology spelled out in the book of Genesis for allowing centuries of misuse of the environment.

"You don't hear those arguments about dominion anymore," said Bill Stancil, the chairman of the theology department at Rockhurst University.

However, Armageddon and the end of days remain popular concepts, evidenced by huge worldwide sales of the Left Behind series of novels by Tim LaHaye and J.B. Jenkins. Those beliefs may work against efforts to spur Christian conservatives to rally against climate change.

After all, said Stancil, "what instigates the second coming of Christ is the world getting worse, not better."

'A matter of priorities'

Says Johnston of First Family Church: "I doubt you'll have more than a small handful of churches that will get on this global-warming bandwagon." Johnston is the host of a conservative radio show and leads a congregation of 6,000.

It is not so much a matter of religion versus science, said Johnston. "It's a matter of priorities. On the list of priorities of most evangelical churches, it would be way down the ladder," he said of global warming.

At a meeting of the Sustainable Sanctuary Coalition last week at Village Presbyterian Church, a dozen volunteers from 10 congregations discussed how best to spread the bad news about God's green Earth. Many weren't sure their pastors were willing to extol a message that some churchgoers may see as too political.

And their own politics?

Only one coalition member professed to be Republican. Another proudly flashed a sticker thumping the GOP as the "Grand Oil Party."

DOJ_NMG_0064959

None who spoke up agreed with the Bush administration's position on the Iraq war or the president's ban on funding embryonic stem-cell research.

Meet the religious right's alter ego — the social-justice left. Beyond politics dividing the two, theological differences can lead to stalemate.

"The fork in the road is when you question whether the world is unfolding according to God's plan or we're just messing it up on our own," said coalition leader Margaret Thomas.

There is one sure way to end the conversation, said Stancil, the Rockhurst theologian.

"We've become so polarized, the easy thing is to fall into group think: 'That's your group's issue — not my group's issue.' "

Alabama Guns In Criminal Hands Across Country (BN)

By Carol Robinson, News Staff Writers

The Birmingham News (AL), September 17, 2006

Lenient laws blamed for supplying black market of crime weapons

Guns, bought easily and legally in Alabama and other states, are landing in the hands of criminals elsewhere, drawing the ire of leaders who have sued to stop the flow and pledged to fight what they say is a deadly export.

Alabama's role as a Top 10 supply state for "crime guns" - weapons purchased legally here but transferred illegally to others and sometimes used in crimes - is undisputed.

New York City police say that 5 percent of the guns recovered at crimes in the first half of 2005 were last sold at retail in Alabama.

"Alabama ranks, along with some other Southern states and some Midwestern states, in being a supply state because of its traditionally more lenient lifestyle and gun laws," said Jim Cavanaugh, who supervises ATF operations in portions of the South. "Guns are more readily available, more easily traded, plentiful. It's real."

Guns trafficked out of Alabama have turned up during all kinds of investigations in other locations - robberies, assaults, sex crimes, drug crimes and at least 10 homicides - in the past several years, according to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Special Agent Eric Kehn said Alabama guns have shown up from coast to coast: from Landover, Md., to Los Angeles; from Chicago to cities throughout Florida.

New York City has sued in Georgia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and Virginia - and pledged to sue wherever needed - alleging a handful of gun dealers have created a public nuisance and are negligent in selling weapons that eventually land in the hands of criminals.

Outlined in the suit is the purchase of 60 weapons in Ohio and Alabama, including some guns later sold in the New York City's Mott Haven public housing community.

The New York City actions and scrutiny of crime guns have set off a congressional fight about the release of information used to trace the weapons, data compiled by the ATF. While the bureau continues to provide trace information in criminal cases, it has been blocked by special amendment in Congress from making the information public.

28 Alabama cases

ATF concentrates its investigations on firearms traffickers who divert guns from lawful commerce into the hands of criminals. Nationally, ATF investigations resulted in the convictions of 1,448 firearms traffickers in 2005. Alabama had 28 cases and 29 convictions that year, mostly from the greater Birmingham area, Kehn said.

Two 2005 Alabama cases accounted for hundreds of firearms.

ATF said a Hazel Green man and a man and wife from Huntsville were sentenced for dealing firearms without a license, obliterating serial numbers and conspiracy. The cases - involving the illegal sale of several hundred weapons - included guns recovered in New York, New Jersey, Florida and elsewhere.

Also in 2005, ATF and 20 other law enforcement agencies cooperated in Operation Flea Collar, an effort to stop illegal arms sales at flea markets and gun shows in Collinsville, Dutton and Birmingham. Eleven people were indicted and 556 weapons seized. The investigators recovered guns previously purchased from the defendants in Texas, Illinois, New York, Michigan, California, Georgia and North Carolina, according to the ATF.

Joe Vince Sr., former chief of gun analysis at ATF and now a partner in a firm called Crime Gun Solutions, said 86 percent of all firearms dealers never have a crime gun traced back to their business. The New York City suit, citing ATF research, says only about 1 percent of gun dealers are responsible for 57 percent of illegally possessed guns nationwide.

DOJ_NMG_0064960

Easy smuggling

ATF's Cavanaugh said traffickers choose Alabama because they can get guns easier here than in other states.

"Cities in the North create stringent laws so a black market is created," Cavanaugh said. "Criminal firearms traffic doesn't have to cross a national border. So the smuggling across state lines becomes easy for a criminal to do. He's not going to run into border checkpoints and be questioned. Once he acquires the guns, he has an unfettered route."

New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg not only had his city file suit but also has formed a coalition that has drawn more than 80 mayors to share information about guns and to fight for stricter controls and reporting.

"This is not a question of ideologies or a referendum on the Second Amendment," Bloomberg said when the group was formed. "This is about public safety and making sure that illegal guns never make their way into the hands of criminals and onto our streets."

Gun-ownership Case Is Going To Trial In Wyoming (AP)

By Ben Neary, Associated Press

AP, September 17, 2006

State aims to help some domestic abusers regain right

CHEYENNE — Arguments are scheduled next month in a case in which Wyoming is seeking a federal court ruling affirming its authority to help some people convicted of misdemeanor domestic violence regain their right to own a firearm.

Federal law prohibits people with such convictions from owning guns.

U.S. District Judge Alan Johnson is scheduled to hear arguments in the case Oct. 6 in Cheyenne.

The state alleges that the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives acted illegally when it threatened to disallow about 11,000 concealed weapons permits the state issued as a substitute for federal background checks for firearms purchases.

The federal agency threatened to take that step unless the state repealed a 2004 law that allows people to expunge a first conviction for misdemeanor domestic violence.

State Sen. Cale Case said he and former state Rep. Mike Baker, both Republicans, sponsored the Wyoming expungement law after Case heard from a constituent who had lost his right to own firearms because of a misdemeanor domestic violence conviction and then discovered there was no way to appeal.

"I just look at it as constitutional; it is the Second Amendment," Case said. "And to me, one of the fundamental rights in society shouldn't be lost for anything less than a felony conviction."

Wyoming Attorney General Pat Crank says the current lawsuit comes down to an issue of states' rights. The National Rifle Association and the Gun Owners Foundation in Washington, D.C., have both filed briefs supporting the state's position.

"We believe that Congress has very explicitly said that you look to state law to see if someone's firearms rights have been restored," Crank said.

Federal officials, however, say the issue is more narrow. They contend the state law fails to meet the legal standard for expungement.

Although the law allows people to petition in court to expunge a first misdemeanor conviction, it specifies that the record of that first conviction remains on the books for purposes of enhancing penalties for any subsequent crime.

"The nuts and bolts of the government's position is that an expungement of a conviction wipes the slates clean, and that an expungement erases a conviction," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Carol A. Statkus, one of the lawyers representing the ATF. "The Wyoming statute that's at issue in this case doesn't do that."

Mike Blonigen, the district attorney in Casper and vice president of the Wyoming Prosecutors Association, said the state needs to know either way whether its expungement law is valid in the eyes of the nation.

"I feel very uncomfortable telling people they're OK, when we don't know that they are," Blonigen said. "That's the biggest thing we're worried about: We do the expungement, they think they're OK, and they get into trouble in another state."

Case, however, says the lawsuit has become "a test case for the entire nation, and boy, I'm glad to have a small part in that. If we can get the constitutional rights remedied, that would be a great thing."

Daniel Webster, co-director for the Center for Gun Policy and Research at Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health in Baltimore, says he worked on a national study that found that the risk women face of being killed in an abusive relationship increases approximately fivefold when their male partners have access to guns.

Webster said Wyoming's effort to restore gun rights to people who have been convicted of domestic violence "suggests that there's greater value being placed on guns than on individual's lives, and I think that's very sad."

A School Day Of Reckoning Over Steroids? (WP)

By Fay Vincent

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

It was a long time ago, but the memories of those first days of football practice linger with me the way the taste of sweet little cakes did with Proust. For me, the smell of freshly cut grass does it. I am immediately drawn back to a time some 50 years ago when I would stretch out on the field at my little New England college doing what we called "grass drills."

Next to us was a river, and beyond, a display of autumn foliage so stunning that it became a major distraction for young players trying to focus on the guttural directions of their coaches.

I remember looking at that scene and having a distinctly religious experience. I knew God was somewhere in those hills. And then I was back on the grass pushing my 18-year-old frame against a classmate and trying to learn how to block and tackle.

For a lineman, there was only so much to the skill part of football. The bulk of it was a function of size, which I had, and strength, which I had in some lesser measure. For I was a 6-foot-2 tackle weighing 230 pounds, which in those days meant I was considered a big guy.

Not anymore. The other day I went down to my old college field to watch the current generation begin to get ready for their season, and the size of the kids was astonishing. Not only were they enormous, they were also exceptionally muscular. As they stood there with shirts off, I could see the effects of all their weight training -- even on the smaller backs and receivers. Some of the linemen were obviously pushing 300 pounds -- and it wasn't fat.

My immediate thought was how fortunate I was to have played when I did. For while I may envy today's players their youth, I have to wonder about their size. Is it all diet, exercise, training? Or is some of it attributable to chemicals?

Another former player at my college, who went on to a distinguished career in medicine, marvels at the size of even Division III players. (That's the NCAA division where they don't give athletic scholarships.) He told me he was certain some of these kids were taking supplements to reach the sizes they did at such young ages. "You cannot get that big eating your Wheaties" is how he put it.

It got me thinking of the possible consequences of what has been going on the past few years with young athletes in virtually all sports. If, as seems likely, many of this generation have been taking such things as steroids and human growth hormones, they have been doing so with the benign neglect of their coaches and school officials. It is inconceivable that the people who are around these kids a lot don't know, or at least suspect, that something is going on.

And yet we are doing little to educate young athletes to the risks of using such chemicals. Perhaps some of us believe we're excused because we have no hard data on the long-term medical consequences of taking whatever these kids have been taking. But I wonder about the risks for the schools.

Let us shift forward several decades. Now the players are returning to their old fields, as I did to mine, to sit in the shadows of advancing age and watch others sweat in the grass. I wonder whether they'll feel as warm and fuzzy about their colleges and their experiences on the field as I do. Or will some be coping with serious medical ailments and disabilities -- problems they now attribute to the failure of others to have warned them against using chemicals that inflated their bodies but also injured them and distorted their genes?

Will our universities and colleges be like the tobacco companies, forced to argue in court that these kids knew, or should have known, that the substances they were using weren't good for their health? I wonder whether the schools will be faced with lawsuits based on the mounting numbers of former athletes who might allege that they were victims of neglectful abuse by their onetime educational mentors.

And I wonder whether those former athletes taking their alma maters to court might not have a pretty good case.

IMMIGRATION:

Contractors At Federal Detention Facility Detained -- For Fake Immigration Documents (MH)

The Miami Herald, September 17, 2006

Immigration officers have detained 15 foreign nationals and accused them of using fake documents while working for a company doing roofing contract work at a federal detention facility in South Miami-Dade, ICE said Friday.

Barbara Gonzalez, the agency's spokeswoman in Miami, said the 15 men were detained Sept. 7 after officers from the bureau of prisons at the Federal Correctional Institution stopped three of them because they suspected their immigration documents were fraudulent.

DOJ_NMG_0064962

Gonzalez said the officers contacted ICE, which dispatched investigators. Gonzalez said the three detained initially were scheduled to work at the facility with a roofing contractor.

"Further information developed by ICE agents revealed that 15 individuals working as contractors were illegal aliens," Gonzalez said. ``They had fraudulent immigration documents."

Gonzalez said 13 of the detained men came from Mexico and the other two came from Guatemala. Twelve of the men had fraudulent green cards, and three had fraudulent Social Security cards, she said.

All were transported to the Krome detention center in West Miami-Dade and put in deportation proceedings, Gonzalez said.

Disclosure of the Miami detentions came three days after two alleged leaders of a nationwide "employee-leasing conspiracy," allegedly involving hundreds of undocumented foreign nationals, pleaded guilty in Fort Lauderdale before U.S. District Judge Kenneth Marra, who sentenced a third defendant in the case.

The Justice Department and ICE said Jaroslaw Sawczuk, 39, a Polish citizen formerly of Coral Springs, and Jozef Bronislaw Bogacki, 43, a Polish-born naturalized U.S. citizen living in Clearwater, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy to transport, house and encourage undocumented immigrants to remain in the United States, commit visa, wire, mail and tax fraud, and money laundering.

Marra sentenced a third defendant, Pavel Preus, 39, a Polish citizen residing in Pompano Beach, to 37 months in prison and 36 months of supervised release. He pleaded guilty to similar charges on Wednesday, the agency said.

Three other Slovak defendants -- Lucia Kanis, 31, Ivan Kanis, 39, and Andor Pikali, 37 -- are at large and believed to be abroad, the agency said.

Day Laborers' Lawsuit Casts Spotlight On A Nationwide Conflict (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

WHITE PLAINS, Sept. 14 — The 36-year-old Mexican man has lived in Mamaroneck for eight years, trekking each morning to Columbus Park near the village center to wait for contractors who might pay him $10 an hour at best. But the village closed the hiring site in the park in February, and after that, he testified in court here last week, the police often chased away the employers with tickets, and the workers with fear.

"An officer stands very close, sometimes within a foot or 18 inches, to where I or a group of day laborers stand," the man told a judge, speaking through a Spanish translator. "He crosses his arms and stares at us for long periods of time until we eventually feel compelled to change our location.

"Sometimes," he added, "he places his hand on his gun while he stares at us."

The man, identified in court as John Doe No. 6, is one of six anonymous day laborers whose federal lawsuit against the Village of Mamaroneck could set a new national standard for the way local governments deal with the fast-growing influx of day laborers in their communities. For a week, Judge Colleen McMahon in Federal District Court heard testimony in a nonjury trial from the laborers, the police, contractors, merchants and village officials. Lawyers in the case said they hoped a decision would be reached by mid-October.

The case accuses village officials of harassing the workers as part of a "deliberate and coordinated" campaign to drive them off the streets, and rests on the workers' 14th Amendment claim that they are discriminated against because they are Hispanic. At the start of the trial, they dropped their original First Amendment claims — that the village had violated their rights to free speech and free association — out of concern that it would force them to reveal their immigration status. The plaintiffs say they are remaining anonymous because they fear retaliation from the authorities. Their lawyer said some of the workers were here legally, while others are not.

"If we lose, the signal that is being sent is that towns and villages can aggressively enforce ordinances in a way that might make it impossible for the day laborers to find work," said Cesar A. Perales, president of the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund. "That's what's being tested here."

Across the country, the proliferation of day laborers has yielded disjointed responses, both in traditional immigrant hubs such as Texas and California and in suburban communities like Mamaroneck that have experienced sudden and sharp increases in immigration. Advocates and local officials place the blame, in part, on the federal government's inconsistent enforcement of immigration policies.

In Burbank, Calif., local officials required a new Home Depot store to build a day labor site, but five miles to the southeast, the City of Glendale passed a law barring day laborers from soliciting work from curbs. In May, a federal judge sided with the laborers in Glendale in a suit claiming that the law violated their free speech rights; the city has appealed the decision.

Fort Worth opened an official hiring site to get the workers off street corners and out of shopping center parking lots. In Herndon, Va., a Washington suburb, a similar move last year drew protests from the Minutemen Project, a group intent on fighting illegal immigration.

After years of recoiling in the face of opposition, the laborers are now fighting back, in court and on the streets. In Freehold, N.J., for example, after officials shuttered a hiring site two years ago, the workers filed a class-action suit, and though they now lack a place to gather, they have organized to keep daily lists of everyone seeking jobs.

"The day-laborer issue is very controversial and emotional," said Edwin Meléndez, a professor at Milano The New School for Management and Urban Policy and co-author of a recent study of day laborers.

"These workers are highly visible, which makes them an easy target. And then you have the neighbors complaining that they drink, loiter, urinate in public. When you have this equation that your safety is being threatened and your quality of life is being affected, the sort of knee-jerk reaction is to conclude that the day laborers have to go."

Here in Westchester County, day laborers had flocked to Mamaroneck, a village of 19,000 on the edge of Long Island Sound, for at least a decade, turning the parking lot of Columbus Park into an unofficial hiring site. Many worked regularly for the same contractors; many of the contractors relied on them during the hectic summer months.

Two years ago, the Hispanic Resource Center in Mamaroneck proposed building a hiring site on a piece of village-owned land near Interstate 95, but residents objected, saying it would clog traffic on an already busy strip. Instead, village officials soon decided to formally designate the parking lot as a sanctioned hiring spot. On warm days, as many as 200 men converged at the park, coming from across Westchester County and from as far south as the Bronx.

Residents charged that the workers urinated in public, defecated, fought with one another, littered and slept in the park overnight. Parents bringing children to a nearby day-care center told the police that the men's presence made them feel uneasy, and a developer of luxury condominiums being built across from the park urged officials to make the laborers go elsewhere.

In August 2004, the Police Department began posting two patrol cars at the park, which the laborers said scared away the contractors. At a public hearing in January, one village trustee compared the laborers to locusts, and then joined in a 3-2 vote to shut down the site on Feb. 1, 2006. In April, Mamaroneck's mayor, Philip J. Trifiletti, defending the decision, accused the workers of "trashing" the park and straining village finances.

The workers moved to the streets after that, and the police followed them, particularly along Mamaroneck Avenue and Van Ranst Place, where most of the men gathered between 7 and 10 a.m. every day but Sunday, according to court testimony. At times, the laborers said, police officers used words or gestures to order the workers to move; other times, they just stared.

Two contractors testified that they were ticketed for minor traffic violations after picking up workers in Mamaroneck, suggesting it was retaliation for supporting the day laborers. None of the workers have been arrested or ticketed. But the village's police chief, Edward E. Flynn, a defendant in the lawsuit, along with Mayor Trifiletti and the village itself, said his officers were simply enforcing the law by citing drivers who violate traffic regulations. "At no time was the police presence ever undertaken to restrict or impede laborers from soliciting or obtaining work," Chief Flynn testified.

He said he had gotten complaints from residents about laborers running across the street and blocking traffic or sticking their heads into cars to solicit work. "There was definitely increased police activity in that area, but that was because of the complaints we had received."

The village's lawyer, Kevin J. Plunkett, added, "What they're trying to do now is beat up our Police Department, and we're simply not going to allow that."

As the trial progressed through the week here, day laborers continued to pace the streets six miles away in Mamaroneck, searching for work.

Testimony for two of the plaintiffs had to be postponed because they were working when they were scheduled to be in court. "What choice to I have?" asked one of those plaintiffs, a 24-year-old man from Guatemala. "I have a family to support at home, and I still have to pay my rent."

Guardsmen's Behavior Called Isolated Incident (HC)

By John W. Gonzalez

Houston Chronicle, September 17, 2006

·'Operation Jump Start' is dealt a setback after gunfire at cookout

EAGLE PASS - Nobody said it would be a thrill for National Guard troops to help the U.S. Border Patrol with administrative and other tasks, allowing scores of patrol agents to resume law enforcement duties.

But the two-year military mission known as "Operation Jump Start" wasn't supposed to be such a tedious assignment that highly trained troops would bide their off-duty time with beer-fueled joyriding and reckless gunfire.

DOJ_NMG_0064964

That's what may have happened here earlier this month in an incident that has disappointed Texas National Guard officials during an otherwise successful deployment.

Three soldiers from North Texas, at least one of whom had served in Iraq, were arrested the evening of Sept. 6 on felony deadly-conduct charges after several shots were fired from their private vehicle as it passed a family cookout in a modest Maverick County subdivision, officials said.

Several adults and children "hit the dirt" fearing a drive-by attack, Sheriff Tomas S. Herrera said, but no one was targeted or injured by the gunshots and no property damage was reported.

"Apparently the family was having a carne asada outside and they saw this vehicle drive by, stop in front of the residence and shoot several times. Then they took off and made a U-turn and came back and did the same thing," Herrera said.

Reputation damageTwo cases of beer — minus three brews — were found in the car when the suspects were located at a convenience store soon after the gunfire was reported to sheriff's dispatchers, Herrera said.

None of the soldiers appeared intoxicated upon arrest, Herrera said. The 9mm pistol, owned by one of the soldiers, and several spent shells were in the car, the sheriff said. The suspects took turns firing, he added.

After being held nearly a week on $50,000 bond each, the suspects were freed Tuesday after bond was reduced to $15,000. Charged were Pfc. Brandon Leland Jones, 23, of Saint Jo; Pvt. David Wayne Hampton, 23; and Spc. Corey Lydell Sampract, 24, both of McKinney. Their cases may be submitted to a grand jury later this month, the sheriff said.

Damage to the Guard's reputation still was being assessed last week.

"Obviously we're very disappointed. We're addressing this as an isolated incident where three individuals made some really, really bad choices," said Guard headquarters spokesman Chief Master Sgt. Gonda Moncada at Camp Mabry in Austin.

"We are praying that this does not reflect on the overall view our citizens have on what the Texas National Guard does, because we have 20,000 folks doing the right thing," she said.

Investigation continuesAfter posting bond, the soldiers, who could face military sanctions, were reassigned to Camp Mabry while the sheriff completes his investigation, Guard officials said. Military prosecutors await the same findings.

So far, it looks like a case of boredom getting the better of young troops far from home, Herrera said.

"They were not on duty at the time. They were not in uniform. The weapon they used was not a field weapon that belonged to the federal government. They were just bored from not doing anything and decided to go out on a joyride," Herrera said.

Lodged in motels, the troops were among 1,500 soldiers stationed along the Texas border since June to bolster the Border Patrol while it trains new agents. Barred from enforcing immigration laws, the troops handle jobs from surveillance to truck repair, serving tours of duty usually spanning several months.

In training, troops learn about the communities where they're stationed and are reminded of the conduct expected, officials said. With ample volunteers for the border operation, Guard officials insist they assign soldiers who are best suited for the mission.

No change in trainingThe way troops prepare for border duty won't dramatically change as a result of the arrests, which captured the attention of Guard leaders, said Capt. Dick Jinks, spokesman for Operation Jump Start in Texas.

"I don't see any impact on our training per se, but I can tell you that the chain of command for all of Texas Operation Jump Start is taking this very seriously and addressing it at every level, reiterating to the soldiers about responsibility," he said.

"With 1,500 people over a given amount of time, you're going to have small things here and there," he added.

County Judge Jose A. Aranda Jr. agreed the arrests were "isolated," but he said they were puzzling because the community has welcomed the troops, even though some residents disapproved of their presence.

Options are limitedAranda, who opposes the deployment, sympathizes with soldiers assigned here because entertainment options are limited to restaurants, bars, the Kickapoo casino and the Mexican border town of Piedras Negras, he said.

"You send in a group of people who are actually trained to do something else, you put them behind a desk, you've got them stashed away in a hotel. They're bored and they were out having fun," Aranda said.

Renewing his claim that troops wouldn't fully appreciate border culture, Aranda said the soldiers' random gunfire in the Deer Run subdivision showed insensitivity.

"They don't understand how our neighborhoods are, and you're not supposed to be out there shooting on the roads. That can lead to something," Aranda said.

Guarding The Country From The Border Line (BSUN)

In Ariz., Maryland National Guardsmen keep watch in the immigration fight -- even on sovereign land

Sells, Ariz. -- Even from this height, almost 100 feet above the cactus-covered desert floor and armed with high-powered binoculars, Spc. Donald Neuer struggles to identify the small black dots scurrying down the Baboquivari Mountains near the Mexican border.

Cattle? Horses? People?

The 21-year-old Maryland National Guard soldier immediately radios in a report to the U.S. Border Patrol. His confidence grows quickly: There are more than 30, he concludes, and they're human. He quickly tags them as UDAs -- undocumented aliens.

And they are still running, heading toward the thick mesquite brush along a bone-dry streambed known as a desert wash. He's about to lose them in the twilight.

"We're going after the guy with the tan shirt. He gave us, uh, the gesture," Neuer says.

In a few minutes, before day folds into night, Border Patrol agents swing into action.

Guided by Neuer and his fellow soldiers, they storm the darkened site about a mile away with an armada of ATVs and motorcycles and their noisy helicopter hovering over it all.

Neuer and 120 fellow volunteers from the Maryland National Guard have been dispatched to the Sonoran Desert as part of a stopgap interdiction measure announced in May by President Bush.

Critics have questioned whether sending up to 6,500 part-time soldiers to watch the southern border is wise for a National Guard still saddled with commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan. They asked whether the Guard should be engaged in a seemingly extracurricular homeland security mission when its leaders struggle to recruit more soldiers and retain the guardsmen in their ranks today.

Before Sept. 11, 2001, signing up for the National Guard largely meant spending weekends doing training exercises, protecting communities during natural disasters and answering a rare call to defend abroad. Now, those who join could be serving in wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and standing on the Mexican border.

Watching the flow of people crossing the border every day, some of the Marylanders admit, has been eye-opening and disturbing, causing some to question the nation's immigration policies. Several guardsmen here are still waiting to become citizens and sympathize with those seeking to come to America.

Feel like strangers Moreover, the Marylanders say they sometimes feel like strangers in a strange land, conducting operations in the country's second-largest Native American reservation.

But they also believe their efforts are paying off. Their presence, they said, also gives the Border Patrol extra time to train 6,000 new agents over the next two years.

"I think the biggest surprise was the level of activity of people crossing the border and what the Border Patrol agents have been up against for the last several years," said Capt. Brian Perez, commander of the Maryland unit here. "The number of people coming across daily is just incredible."

More than a million suspected illegal immigrants were caught last year along the southwest border alone. The Border Patrol does not estimate how many its agents failed to catch.

The guardsmen knew their assignment would take them to south-central Arizona for about 60 days, a tour that ends later this month. Once they arrived in early August, the guardsmen learned more about their unusual destination: All of their surveillance outposts are within the independent Tohono O'odham nation.

Bordered by Arizona to the north, east and west and to the south for 74 miles with Mexico, about 14,000 Native Americans, live on these traditional lands that match the size of Connecticut and straddle the U.S.-Mexican border.

Its sparsely populated and unforgiving topography -- with miles to go before reaching a town or city, much less a decent drink of water -- has turned the Tohono O'odham lands into one of the deadliest illegal border crossings. In parts, its plains stretch out unmercifully, littered with empty water bottles and discarded clothing. This year, 56 immigrants have died here.

"We found some of them hanging who committed suicide," said the tribe's assistant police chief, Joseph Delgado. "One time, we found they were close to death and they had buried themselves in the dirt because of the heat."

Sgt. Tobias Nez joined the Nation's police department 25 years ago when it had about 20 officers. Today, inundated by illegal immigrants, his department has 70 officers.

While most illegal immigrants only seek safe passage, he said, tribal members have also seen their homes broken into and occasionally have become victims of assaults and kidnappings. Last year, Tohono O'odham officials estimate its tribe spent $2.7 million in border-related expenditures, from death investigations to drug-smuggling cases.

Still, not every tribal member was pleased about the Guard's arrival. Their legislative body unanimously passed a law this summer to permit the Guard, but the legislation contains restrictions governing how and where the soldiers can operate.

In addition to the soldiers, about 800 American border guards swarm over traditional Native American lands.

DOJ_NMG_0064966

"By militarizing the border, the federal government is violating the sovereignty of the Tohono O'odham nation in the name of homeland security," James Riding In, associate professor of American Indian studies at Arizona State University, told Indian Today in July.

Officials also worry that some tribal members benefit from the illegal migration.

"People need to acknowledge that some of us make money from the smuggling that goes on here," said David Garcia, 54, a former member of one of the tribe's 11 district legislative councils in Itak.

The soldiers say they try to tread softly while carrying their M-16s.

They walk as gingerly around the spindly ocotillo plants as they do around the flutter of pink flags that tribal members use to mark their sacred sites. A Native American ecologist warned them to enter sensitively and leave their rocky observation posts as they found them.

A seemingly random pile of rocks, according to tribal archeologists, might in fact be a burial marker or the crumbling wall of an ancestral ruin.

"It's definitely been a learning experience," Perez said. "There have been a number of cultural challenges. It's not where we normally go. Once again, they own this land, they govern this land. ... They have been really wonderful."

Because the tribe's traditional boundaries stretch across the U.S.-Mexico border, armed Border Patrol agents are empowered to stop residents and request that they produce papers proving their citizenship.

"It's a unique challenge for the Border Patrol," said Gustavo Soto, a spokesman for the Border Patrol's Tucson sector.

Critics inside the Nation sometimes complain that agents rotate in and out so often they don't get to know who are the legitimate tribal members. They also point to the accidental road death of a young O'odham man who was struck and killed by a border agent's vehicle in 2002.

How well the Maryland guardsmen perform could help determine how long tribal leaders support the president's strategy. For now, it's seen as a successful but uneasy alliance.

'We live in fear' "We live in fear," Tohono O'Odham Nation Chairwoman Vivian Juan Saunders says. "It's why tribal members have taken a position that they would not have 10 or 15 years ago. We're continuing to improve our communication. The Guard has many troops coming and going. We're trying to keep track of them."

So does Perez.

In 24-hour shifts, his soldiers in four-man teams occupy seven hilltops with sweeping views of the desert plain: Little Egypt, Topawa, North and South Animos, Chi Chi, Cow Hill and No Hair.

Before heading into the desert, soldiers stop about 20 miles from their Tucson hotel at the local armory of the Arizona National Guard, where soldiers sit at long tables, check and clean their weapons and slide their rounds into M-16 magazines.

They also take night-vision goggles, thermal detectors and infrared flashlights to aid their search for immigrants who regularly travel under the cover of night.

Electronic sensors along the border alert agents to crossers, but hundreds a day escape capture.

From their rocky vantage points, Maryland's citizen soldiers sleep under the stars, swat away buzzing flies and try to stay cool under large blue tarps when the temperature tops 100 degrees. The Maryland Guardsmen largely expressed support for their assignment.

"I figured my family came up here the right way, why can't they?" said Pfc. Colin Dawkins, 19, of Silver Spring. His mother is Guyanese, and his father hails from Jamaica.

Sgt. Dan Atkinson, a 38-year-old landscape contractor from Millsboro who likes to stand on top of his Humvee and scan the horizon here for hours, however, said it was common and distressing to see illegal immigrants in his industry.

"They're poor people, and employers are taking advantage of them," he said "I think it should be a little easier for them to get into this country legally."

The deployed Maryland soldiers are largely drawn from the Annapolis-based 1st Squadron, 158th Cavalry of the 58th Infantry Brigade Combat Team. They also include members of an Olney-based infantry company just home from a year in Iraq.

"Compared to Iraq, I don't have to worry about IEDs," said Spc. Sergio Cruz, 33, of Gaithersburg, referring to improvised explosive devices. "We have to worry about drug smugglers."

New perspective The Peruvian carpenter said he understands the well-meaning Mexicans who yearn to cross the border for a better life.

But he and his friend, Spc. Doug Wildenberg, 34, of Towson, both believe any letdown in the security of the border would also encourage criminals to enter the country.

"You have to remember national security," said Cruz, who served in combat before he became an American citizen.

"It's given me a whole new perspective," Wildenberg said. "I mean, I think I appreciate more why people would want to come. But they need to come the right way."

DOJ_NMG_0064967

Despite the challenges, the Border Patrol praises the Guard's effort, saying its soldiers have sent out a clear message to potential crossers to stay away.

So far this year, apprehensions are down about 9 percent in the Tucson sector, which includes the Tohono O'odham Nation.

"Personally, I feel that they are needed out there," Delgado of the Nation's police department says. "In the short time that they have been out there, I think we've seen a decrease in the UDAs out there and the amount of time the Nation police department is spending dealing with illegal immigration."

As Perez describes it: "We've gotten into a groove."

18 Wheels And Countless Dangers (DMN)

By Gregg Jones, Holly Becka, Jennifer Lafleur And Steve McGonigle, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 17, 2006

Trucking companies often put non-English speakers, felons, addicts in driver's seat, but rarely take blame in fatal crashes

SMILEY N. POOL/DMN Traffic moves along State Highway 114 near Paradise. On this stretch of road, Kim Hughes, Shiloh Hughes, Afton Hughes Royse and Joyce Watkins were killed in an accident involving a gravel truck in December of 2002.

First of three parts

On a sunny December afternoon, Kim Hughes turned onto State Highway 114 in Wise County and headed west toward home in Paradise. Christmas was eight days away. Four generations were crammed into her GMC Yukon after a morning of holiday shopping.

In the cab of an 18-wheeler leased to TXI Transportation Co., Ricardo Rodriguez drove east on Highway 114, riding herd on 73,000 pounds of truck and a trailerload of sand. An illegal immigrant from Mexico, Mr. Rodriguez had used a fake Social Security number to get a Texas commercial driver's license six years earlier. He had found steady work around North Texas driving rock trucks and other 18-wheelers, his history of immigration arrests and truck safety violations ignored or overlooked.

Just east of Paradise, on a flat stretch of road, the mom and the trucker met.

Mr. Rodriguez crossed the center line of the two-lane road and barreled head-on toward Ms. Hughes at 60 to 65 mph, a civil jury later concluded. With trees and a creek bed blocking her escape to the right, Ms. Hughes turned left, into the oncoming eastbound lane.

Just then, Mr. Rodriguez turned back toward his lane. Too late, Ms. Hughes swerved right. The Yukon struck the big rig on the driver's side, scraped along the trailer and spun off the back. A Ford pickup behind the truck smashed into the Yukon, injuring the pickup's occupants and nearly tearing apart the SUV.

Ms. Hughes' 14-year-old son, Shiloh, and 70-year-old mother, Joyce Watkins, died almost instantly. Ms. Hughes, 38, and her 17-year-old daughter, Afton Hughes Royse, pregnant with twins, died later in a Fort Worth hospital, without regaining consciousness.

In Texas ...

502 people died in big-truck accidents in 2005.

·9,807 were injured last year.

·344,000 trucks were registered here.

·632 state troopers enforce truck safety on nearly 302,000 miles of roadway.

Amid the Christmas presents and holiday treats, the only sounds of life from the shattered SUV were the screams of Afton's 14-month- old son, Jagr Royse, and the frantic shouts of a female voice on Shiloh's cellphone.

Mr. Rodriguez climbed from his truck, uninjured.

Trucking companies in Texas often gamble on drivers such as Mr. Rodriguez, a seven-month Dallas Morning News investigation has found. They hire illegal immigrants who struggle to read road signs and communicate in English with police and emergency personnel. They hire felons, drunks and drug addicts. Sometimes, they make only cursory checks of work history and driving records, then put the new hires behind the wheel of rigs with the destructive potential of guided missiles.

When accidents occur, trucking companies defend their drivers and often blame the other vehicles – and in many cases the dead occupants – regardless of the evidence. They typically fight any release of information about their drivers and vehicles, and wage protracted legal battles to avoid blame.

Beyond that, the companies suffer few consequences, in part because the soaring number of trucks on Texas highways are overwhelming regulators and law enforcement officers. Mr. Rodriguez was never ticketed by the Texas Department of Public Safety or charged with a crime. Federal immigration authorities didn't deport him. State officials didn't suspend his license.

DPS never took action against TXI for its role in putting Mr. Rodriguez on the road that day and continuing to employ him, even after he admitted under oath that he entered the U.S. illegally, exaggerated his truck-driving experience on his job application and had a fake Social Security number. Mr. Rodriguez continued driving for TXI for at least another six months after he made those disclosures in front of a company lawyer.

DPS did not even subject TXI to a compliance review – a procedure by which trucking companies can be fined or forced out of business for failing to comply with rules and one which regulators say promotes greater road safety.

Ultimately, Mr. Rodriguez and TXI, part of Dallas-based Texas Industries Inc., were held accountable by the recourse of last resort for many truck accident victims: a lawsuit.

On May 13, 2004, a Wise County civil jury unanimously found Mr. Rodriguez, TXI and the owner of the leased truck, Aurelio Melendez, negligent: Mr. Rodriguez for his operation of the rock truck, Mr. Melendez for entrusting the rig to him, and TXI for hiring the truck and its driver. The jury awarded $23.5 million in damages to the victims' families.

TXI, which under federal regulations is responsible for the damages against Mr. Rodriguez and Mr. Melendez, is appealing the verdict. It contends the dead driver, not the trucker, caused the accident.

"We had an experienced driver with a good driving record with good equipment," said Mark Stradley, a Dallas attorney who represents TXI in the Wise County lawsuit. He described the 46-year-old Mr. Rodriguez as a hard-working father of three.

Randy Hughes, who lost his ex-wife and children in the accident, feels betrayed by the trucking industry that once was his livelihood and by authorities responsible for enforcing trucking regulations.

"It feels like you've been let down, that people didn't do their job right or he wouldn't have been here and maybe my family would," he said. "I think every day, how many more is out there that's like this guy was? Whose family is he going to run over?"

Profits soar, safety drops

More than 5,200 people died in accidents involving large trucks in the U.S. last year – 502 in Texas. The state consistently leads the nation in fatalities, in part because it has more roadway miles and the second-highest number of registered trucks.

The state's fatality rate, measured in truck crash deaths per 100,000 people, was 24th nationwide. California, the only state whose volume of truck traffic exceeds Texas, ranked No. 38. Another 10,000 people, on average, are injured in Texas each year in crashes involving big trucks.

Responsibility for these accidents is hotly contested; DPS investigators typically don't assess blame. Even the department's database refers only to "contributing factors" not "cause."

The most comprehensive national study, released in March by the U.S. Department of Transportation, found that truck drivers were at fault in at least 44 percent of all accidents between cars and big trucks. The American Trucking Associations, which represents the industry's biggest companies, says trucks cause only about 25 percent of fatal accidents involving cars.

When trucking companies are to blame, records show, it's because truckers drive too fast, don't pay attention, work too many hours or take to the road in poorly maintained equipment – sometimes with the knowledge and encouragement of their employers.

Many Texas trucking companies and their drivers also flout safety laws with little fear of punishment. Only about 1,000 of the state's more than 64,000 registered trucking companies faced compliance reviews last year. And only about 37 percent of the trucks inspected in Texas last year underwent the most thorough inspection, known as a Level 1. The majority of those were done on Mexican trucks that travel only a few miles north of the border before returning home.

Nationwide, the rates of fatal crashes and fatalities have declined about 24 percent in the last decade, in part because of rising seat-belt usage and safety innovations, such as airbags and anti-lock brakes. But the number of deaths in large-truck accidents is about the same as it was in 1994 because more trucks are on the road, driving more miles than ever.

"If you have enough trucks on the road, I don't care how confident your safety director is and how closely you adhere to the guidelines, you're going to have accidents," said Tom Fee, a Dallas lawyer who defends trucking companies. "It's unfair to paint with a broad brush that this is a dirty industry that is cutting corners just to put money in their pocket. But there are bad apples, fly-by-night operators that spoil the whole apple cart."

In Texas, the number of intrastate carriers increased 43 percent in the past five years, with a similar increase in the number of interstate carriers based here. The number of registered large trucks in the U.S. increased 24 percent from 1994 to 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0064969

Business is so good, in fact, that U.S. trucking companies reported a record year in 2005: They generated $623 billion in revenue while hauling nearly 70 percent of the nation's freight.

Trucking boom costly

The Dallas-Fort Worth area is both an important hub for the nation's trucking companies and a crossroads in the movement of goods. On the streets and highways of Dallas and surrounding counties, long-haul, interstate trucks moving food, appliances and other commodities vie for space with short-haul, intrastate trucks carrying rock, sand and gravel to area construction sites.

The trucking industry's growth has overwhelmed law enforcement agencies. The problem is especially acute in Texas, where U.S.-based trucks pick up loads at the Mexican border and fan out across the country. U.S.-Mexico trade has more than doubled since the North American Free Trade Agreement was implemented in 1994, according to federal data. About 68 percent of truck traffic from Mexico enters the U.S. at the Texas border.

In the late 1990s, DPS asked the state Legislature for additional enforcement officers to keep weigh stations open and conduct roadside inspections. The Legislature cut in half one department request. Two years later, it slashed DPS' request for 127 more troopers to five.

Since then, DPS has had to rely on federal money for additional truck inspectors, almost all of whom have been assigned to the border. That has left staffing throughout the rest of Texas stagnant, at slightly more than 300 inspectors.

"The whole attitude is the industry will regulate itself," said Alan Powers, a Decatur attorney who represented victims in the TXI accident.

Maj. Mark Rogers of the DPS Commercial Vehicle Enforcement service in Austin said his force had no permanent presence in 128 of the state's 254 counties.

He also said some trucking companies openly taunt the state's overwhelmed commercial vehicle officers.

Trooper Randy McDonald, based in Decatur, northwest of Fort Worth, said that when he recently ticketed a big-rig driver for a local oil company, the trucker passed on a message from his boss: The troopers could write all the tickets they wanted, but it wouldn't change anything. The company was willing to break truck weight limits and other safety rules to maximize profits.

"I've been here a long time," said Maj. Rogers, "and they've been saying that same thing for a long time."

Pressures of low pay

One of the chief legacies of the federal government's deregulation of shipping rates in the early 1980s, which made it possible for virtually anyone with a truck to go into business, is that trucking has become fiercely competitive. The vast majority of trucking companies operate along the margins of profitability, and about 40,000 go out of business every year, said Jerry Donaldson, senior research director for the nonprofit Advocates for Highway and Auto Safety.

Corporate America has leveraged this competition to push shipping rates even lower. It has also put more pressure on trucking companies to deliver loads at a specific time, as part of "just-in-time" inventory management that lets companies keep fewer products and spare parts on hand and use trucks as rolling warehouses. Late drivers can lose a load, money, even a customer.

In response, trucking companies push their truckers hard.

"The managers, the owners of trucking companies unquestionably put the dollar above the safety of the traveling public," said Frank Branson, a Dallas plaintiff's attorney who has handled hundreds of truck accident cases. "They treat mutilations and deaths as the cost of doing business."

Trucking companies say a shortage of drivers, not safety shortcuts, is the biggest problem facing their industry. Long-haul trucking companies need 20,000 additional drivers, and that could exceed 100,000 drivers over the next eight years, according to a 2005 study commissioned by the American Trucking Associations.

Industry experts and independent truckers say the problem is a lack of drivers willing to work for such low pay in a business notorious for long hours, extended time away from home, delivery deadlines that don't accommodate bad weather or traffic and unpaid downtime waiting for loads.

Some of the biggest carriers have tried to stem the declining pool of experienced drivers by increasing wages and benefits. They pay drivers by the hour rather than by the load or mile, a practice safety experts say encourages drivers to speed and drive fatigued.

Drivers for J.B. Hunt Transport Inc. had fewer accidents after the Arkansas- based company increased driver pay in 1997, University of Michigan researchers found. A 1 percent increase in pay rate resulted in a 1.33 percent decrease in crash risk, said Daniel Rodriguez, one of the study's authors who is now a professor at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Lax vetting of drivers

Regardless of pay, companies are supposed to hire safe drivers and make sure they follow the rules.

Federal regulations require prospective drivers to disclose in writing such information as the previous three years' employers, motor vehicle accidents and traffic tickets, and the reason for leaving a job. The company is supposed to verify that information and check a driver's motor vehicle and safety performance records for the previous three years. Although the law doesn't require companies to do criminal background checks, it does ban truckers convicted of certain crimes from driving for a period of time.

Every driver a company hires is supposed to read and speak English well enough to converse with the general public, understand highway traffic signs and signals, respond to official inquiries and make entries on reports and records.

Texas doesn't require intrastate truck drivers to speak English and doesn't enforce the English- language requirement on interstate drivers unless "it becomes a true safety issue," said Maj. Rogers. He said the law was never intended to be enforced in roadside inspections, rather by the companies themselves.

The employer's responsibilities also apply to leased trucks and drivers, which companies often use to lower overhead costs.

But some companies do nothing more than make a phone call or send a fax to one of the former employers listed, court documents reviewed by The News show. If the former employer doesn't respond, the company is supposed to make a note of that in the driver investigation file and report the failure to the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration, but that often doesn't happen.

Clay Miller, a Dallas lawyer who has sued trucking companies in dozens of wrongful death and injury cases, said inadequate vetting of drivers "is a huge issue," especially with smaller companies. Larger companies often subscribe to a service that does a cursory background check on a driver, he said, allowing companies to say they've fulfilled their legal obligations.

Trucking's day laborers

Driver vetting is especially lax in the sand and gravel hauling business, an industry crucial to North Texas' booming construction sector. Dallas County leads the state in the number of active gravel pits and rock quarries, with 40. Nationally, Texas ranks second to California in construction sand and gravel sold or used.

Many sand and gravel haulers are the trucking industry's equivalent of undocumented day laborers. Paid by the load, they are frequently hired by homebuilders and construction contractors, even though they often lack proper insurance or registration.

"You can sit outside any rock quarry in Texas and find them," said Bill Webb, former president of the Texas Motor Transportation Association, the state's largest trucking industry group.

Questions about a trucker's training and experience surfaced soon after Wise County resident Pamela Nielsen sued Aggregate Haulers Inc. in 2002, two years after being seriously injured when one of the company's 18-wheel rock trucks forced her off the road on Highway 114 between Boyd and Paradise.

The truck driver, Esteban Hernandez, was ticketed for an improper lane change at the accident scene. He testified in a deposition that he had driven a bus for the El Conejo line in Texas before buying a big truck and signing an exclusive lease agreement with Aggregate Haulers to transport sand and gravel.

The San Antonio-based company hired Mr. Hernandez in violation of its own guidelines that required drivers to have a minimum of two years of verifiable experience, Ms. Nielsen's attorneys argued in court filings. Mr. Hernandez testified he had only 10 months of experience driving a rock hauler in the U.S.

Aggregate also didn't verify his previous three years' experience, as required by federal law, but played down the importance of that requirement.

"We don't get responses very often, in fact, and we put people to work every day that we get absolutely no response from previous employers," testified Jay Griffin, Aggregate's director of safety. "The fact of the matter is we still put them to work. We still feel confident that we're putting a safe driver on the road."

The company contended that Ms. Nielsen caused the accident by suddenly passing its truck in the right lane. But in October 2003, it agreed to pay the woman an undisclosed amount and to set up $100,000 trust funds for each of her two daughters. The company did not admit liability.

JTM Materials of Denton broke no laws in employing Jerry Lee Largent as a rock hauler under a lease agreement with Hammer Trucking Co., but was apparently unaware of his criminal record and traffic violations, court records show.

In his job application for JTM, Mr. Largent noted his 15 years of experience driving rock trucks for small Wise County companies. He disclosed that he had been involved in a fatal accident in November 1993, had received a speeding ticket in June 1996 and temporarily lost driving privileges for not having insurance on his personal vehicle. He checked "no" beside the question: Have you ever been convicted of a crime?

JTM used a private service to obtain a driver's record report that stated Mr. Largent's driving record contained "no reported convictions or accidents" in the three years preceding Sept. 12, 1996.

The trucking company didn't obtain a DPS report on Mr. Largent's driving record or run a criminal background check on him, according to court documents. If it had, JTM would have learned that Mr. Largent had been arrested for burglary in the early 1970s, convicted of driving while intoxicated in 1980 and convicted of methamphetamine possession in 1984 and sentenced to three months in jail. He was charged with driving while intoxicated in February 1994 but pleaded guilty to reckless conduct, received deferred adjudication and was sentenced to community service. He also had been ticketed five times between 1982 and 1990 for driving without liability insurance, a DPS report showed.

Mr. Largent was hired in September 1996 to haul crushed rock from a JTM quarry in Wise County to Dallas-area construction sites. Late one Saturday evening two months later, Mr. Largent's 18-wheeler collided with a car driven by Grant Morris on a Bridgeport street. Mr. Morris was seriously injured; Mr. Largent pleaded guilty to driving while drunk. After a protracted legal battle, Mr. Morris received a $1.9 million settlement.

Cutting corners

An attempt to require quarries and concrete plants to check the insurance and state registrations of trucks picking up loads failed last year when sand and gravel producers used their political clout in Austin to defeat legislation proposed by the Texas Motor Transportation Association.

Leading the effort to kill the legislation were the Texas Aggregates and Concrete Association and the Associated General Contractors, said Mr. Webb.

"When we start talking to them about policing the unregistered trucks, they say they can't do it – it would drive up their costs," he said.

Jennifer Newton, a spokeswoman for the Associated General Contractors in Austin, said she was unfamiliar with the legislation cited by Mr. Webb and would have no comment on it.

Michael Stewart, executive director of the Texas Aggregates and Concrete Association in Austin, said operators of quarries and concrete plants already check the insurance and registration of haulers to protect themselves from liability. "If they don't they're foolish, and they're playing Russian roulette with the system," he said.

Maintaining big trucks also drives up costs, so some companies try to run the rigs as long as possible between overhauls. They seek maximum mileage from tires. They ignore worn brake pads or maladjusted air brakes. They overlook or miss loose lug nuts and cracked trailer frames, as seen in recent spot truck inspections in Wise County.

State and federal inspectors ordered off the road about one-third of the trucks they stopped in each of three recent crackdowns. Some drivers said they had reported the maintenance problems to their employers but were told to keep driving.

With an 80,000-pound rig, the consequences of ignoring a problem are sometimes deadly.

In March 2002, Nelta Osborn was driving her rig for Celadon Trucking Service Inc. west along Interstate 30 in southwest Arkansas when another trucker radioed that a hose on her trailer was dragging the ground. Ms. Osborn pulled over and found a tiny hole had been worn in one of her air brake hoses. Her co-driver, husband Tom Osborn, stuck a toothpick in the hole and wrapped it with electrical tape, according to court records.

Back on the road, Mr. Osborn described the fix to a Celadon dispatcher. The dispatcher advised the trucker to get the hose fixed at a garage but remarked on his ingenuity: "Were you a Boy Scout?"

As they roared southwest along I-30 into Texas, the Osborns passed truck garages where they could have had the brake hose repaired or replaced, but they drove on. Just west of Texarkana, the hose failed, and the air brakes locked. The 18-wheeler screeched to a stop in the interstate's passing lane. Matthew Giuliano, a 23-year-old newly commissioned Army second lieutenant driving to Fort Hood for his first assignment, slammed into the back of the truck and was killed.

"If you look behind the curtain, you tend to see an industry that is paying truck drivers less because of the fierce competition," said Fort Worth attorney Steve Laird, who represented the Giuliano family in a lawsuit against Celadon. "And when truck drivers are not paid as well as they once were, they feel that there is an incentive to not only push the envelope but to sometimes break the rules."

In April 2005, a Waco jury found Indiana-based Celadon at fault and awarded the Giuliano family $17.5 million. Celadon settled the case by agreeing to pay the family $1.25 million, with no admission of liability. After the jury trial, Celadon chairman and chief executive officer Steve Russell extended condolences to the family and defended his company's business practices.

"This tragic situation was an isolated incident and is not reflective of the way our company does business," he said in a statement. "The owner-operator team involved was immediately suspended after the accident and never drove for the company again."

A history of problems

In the December 2002 accident that killed four members of the Hughes family, investigators determined the TXI-leased truck was properly maintained. Driver log records showed that Mr. Rodriguez was under the state daily driving limit of 12 hours at the time. His driving record wasn't even particularly alarming by rock hauler standards: He overturned an 18-wheeler leased to TXI and got three speeding tickets in the late 1990s.

The case against TXI came down to whether the company had fulfilled its legal obligations to check the driver's qualifications and prior work history. Regulations didn't require TXI to road-test Mr. Rodriguez.

DOJ_NMG_0064972

There were several problems with the application Mr. Rodriguez filled out for TXI. For starters, he didn't say why he had left three trucking jobs in three years, as federal regulations required. There were also questions about his experience.

Mr. Rodriguez later testified he had 20 years of experience in trucking and had driven for "many, many companies" in Mexico over several years. But he could identify only one by name.

On his TXI application, Mr. Rodriguez listed a series of truck-driving jobs in the U.S. dating to 1994. However, he told U.S. immigration officers on two occasions that he didn't enter the U.S. until 1996. He testified in his civil trial deposition that he had worked in the U.S. in the 1980s and returned in 1996. But state records showed he didn't obtain a Texas commercial driver's license until October 1996.

TXI's transportation manager, Jonathan Kennemer, testified that he believed the company had tried, but failed, to confirm Mr. Rodriguez's claim to have worked for a Coronado Trucking in Dallas from 1994 to 1996. "If I remember correctly, they were out of business," said Mr. Kennemer, who recently left the company.

Mr. Rodriguez also stated that he had driven for a company called Data Documents from February 1996 to January 1997. It turned out he had worked at the company, but not as a truck driver. And he had claimed to have driven a truck for Aggregate Haulers from December 1999 until May 2001; Aggregate later informed TXI that Mr. Rodriguez had driven for the company for only three months, according to court records.

Mr. Rodriguez also stated on his job application that he left a job with Aggregate Haulers for a better paying job, when actually he had been deported by U.S. immigration authorities.

Mr. Kennemer would later describe Mr. Rodriguez's job application as "incomplete," but said it didn't raise concerns.

The trucker testified that he used the fake Social Security number to take his commercial driver's license test in Texas in 1996. Under state law, he was allowed to take the test in Spanish. Even in his native tongue, Mr. Rodriguez failed the general knowledge and air brake tests on his first try, according to DPS records.

His shaky knowledge of trucks and spotty English didn't hurt his ability to find work driving 18-wheelers in the Dallas area. After six years of driving, interrupted only by two arrests by U.S. immigration authorities as he went back and forth to Mexico, Mr. Rodriguez went to work driving trucks for a Dallas man named Aurelio Melendez in 2002.

Mr. Melendez owned nine trucks at the time, all leased to TXI. He testified that he road-tested Mr. Rodriguez but didn't make any record of it, as federal rules require. He also testified that he wasn't familiar with the Texas Motor Carrier Safety Regulations, which govern trucking companies.

Mr. Rodriguez was hauling his last load of the day to a construction site in Richardson when he collided with the Hughes family. He told the lead DPS investigator that the SUV was in his lane and that he tried to avoid it by steering to the right. Mr. Rodriguez was the only eyewitness. The trooper working the case had never been lead investigator on a fatal accident, and she accepted Mr. Rodriguez's version of events as fact. The trooper found Ms. Hughes at fault, and no charges were filed.

TXI stands by its driver

Attorneys for TXI and the plaintiffs continue to contest most of the key facts as to what happened, and an appeal is pending.

TXI blames Ms. Hughes, suggesting that she crossed the center line either because she was eating, talking on a cellphone or had a tire blow out.

The judge hearing the civil case, however, rejected the company's request to introduce phone records showing that Ms. Hughes' ex-husband had called her around the time of the accident. The court ruled there was no evidence that a phone call might have caused the accident.

Attorneys for the family said Ms. Hughes' son, Shiloh, was the only person in the Yukon on a cellphone at the time of the accident. When a motorist approached the Yukon to render assistance, she heard Shiloh's friend screaming through the open line.

Another crucial point of dispute is who crossed the center line first. At the accident scene, and in a later deposition, Mr. Rodriguez said it was Ms. Hughes. He said he steered to the right "for two or three seconds" in an attempt to avoid the Yukon. The DPS investigator and experts for the plaintiffs and TXI all agreed that a gouge mark 6 inches inside Mr. Rodriguez's lane was a point of impact. But they disagreed over whether it was the initial point of impact.

Plaintiffs' attorneys argued that if Mr. Rodriguez had steered to the right for two or three seconds, or even one second, and if initial impact was just 6 inches inside his lane, he must have started his turn on the wrong side of the center line.

Mr. Rodriguez changed his statement when he took the witness stand, now saying he had turned to the right for only one second. Under questioning from plaintiffs' attorneys, Mr. Rodriguez testified that he never crossed the center line while driving, on this or any other day.

Mr. Rodriguez continued driving for TXI after the accident, using his fraudulently obtained commercial driver's license. DPS and U.S. immigration didn't file charges against him, and the state didn't revoke his license.

DOJ_NMG_0064973

In July 2003, as part of a broader security check following the 9/11 terrorist attacks, DPS notified Mr. Rodriguez by form letter that the Social Security Administration had noticed a discrepancy in the number he used to obtain his commercial driver's license and asked him to report to his local driver's license office to verify his information or risk losing his license.

Mr. Rodriguez didn't respond, DPS spokeswoman Tela Mange said.

In July 2005, Mr. Rodriguez went to a Dallas-area DPS office to renew his commercial driver's license. But he could not verify his Social Security number and was denied. He was allowed to renew his regular driver's license, which according to DPS is valid until May 2, 2011. The News tried to find Mr. Rodriguez at four Dallas addresses listed for him in public records but was unsuccessful.

TXI's attorney said Mr. Rodriguez stopped driving for TXI in late May or early June 2004 after the company was convinced he was in the U.S. illegally.

"I think everybody would have assumed that he would be deported," said Michael Simpson, the attorney who represented the victims' families. "But he kept driving, just like nothing occurred."

TAX:

Partisan Battle Trips Up Popular Tax Benefits (LAT)

By Joel Havemann, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

Both parties want to extend a package of credits and deductions. But lawmakers are deadlocked over the bill it's attached to.

WASHINGTON — Just about every lawmaker in Congress favors extending a batch of popular tax benefits approved during President Bush's first years in office and authorized through 2005.

But in a case study of the tortuous process that can surround even the most highly regarded proposal on Capitol Hill, extension of the tax benefits appears to face an uphill road as Congress nears adjournment.

The benefits, claimed by more than 10 million taxpayers last year, give those who live in states without income taxes a deduction for their state sales taxes. They allow a deduction for some college tuition. Teachers may deduct the costs of buying supplies for their classrooms. And a research and development tax credit — hugely popular in the business community — is also part of the package.

But so far, these and 43 other tax benefits have become ensnared in a partisan battle over a minimum-wage increase, which Democrats and some moderate Republicans want, and a sharp reduction in the estate tax, dear to the hearts of conservative Republicans.

In July, Republicans thought they had scored a strategic coup when they stitched the minimum-wage increase and the estate tax cuts into a single bill that, they hoped, offered something for everybody to love. The trouble was, there was also something for almost everybody to hate.

So to sweeten the pie — and appeal to lawmakers of both parties — Republicans added an extension of the expiring tax breaks.

The maneuver was to no avail; the bill containing these disparate elements was derailed. And two months later, the tax benefits are still hanging as wrangling over the other issues continues.

Some lawmakers, including at least one powerful Republican, are pushing for Congress to break the deadlock.

"Taxpayers could miss out on valuable benefits through no fault of theirs," Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the tax-writing Finance Committee, said last week. "I urge the House and Senate leadership, both Republican and Democrat, to take this problem seriously."

Grassley warned that time is of the essence, saying that Internal Revenue Service officials have told him Congress must approve the benefits extensions by Oct. 15 if the changes are to be included in 2006 tax forms. That means Congress, which plans to adjourn at the end of this month to campaign for the November elections, has only two weeks to act.

Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, the top Democrat on Grassley's committee, recently accused other lawmakers of "ineptitude" for not having acted sooner on the tax benefits.

Baucus also decried the continuing GOP reluctance to allow a separate vote on the extension effort, noting that Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) was quoted in the Wall Street Journal characterizing the tax benefits as "hostage" to the estate tax dispute.

Baucus responded: "It is time we end these threats and get back to the business of legislating."

But when Baucus tried to bring to a vote a bill focused only on the extension of the tax benefits, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) blocked him.

DOJ_NMG_0064974

Frist said he wanted to preserve the option of a second chance for the full Senate to vote on the estate tax cut, the minimum-wage increase and extension of the tax benefits as a package.

The most expensive benefit is the tax credit businesses can claim for research and development conducted in the United States. A two-year extension would cost $16.5 billion.

The most widely used benefit — claimed on more than 8 million tax forms last year — is the deduction for state sales tax payments in places with no state income taxes. The cost of extending this provision for two years: $5.5 billion.

Nearly 2.7 million teachers who paid for classroom supplies out of their own pockets took a maximum deduction of $250 last year. Extending this provision would cost less than $400 million in 2006 and 2007.

Altogether, extending the miscellaneous tax benefits, most of them for two years, would cost $38 billion.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Your Money: Pentagon Travel System Under Attack (ABC)

By John Cochran

ABC News, September 17, 2006

Critics Say It's Actually Cheaper to Book Travel Outside the Program

Sept. 16, 2006 — - The Defense Department is the world's biggest purchaser of airline tickets -- so the Pentagon bought its own online booking system called the "defense travel system," which was supposed to save money on travel agents and paperwork.

The defense travel system was also supposed to buy only the cheapest seats. But many in Congress say the system is a disaster -- four years behind schedule and $200 million over budget.

"It will take 200 years to ever pay back the cost of this contract in terms of that savings," Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., told ABC News, "especially when you consider they're not getting the best price."

Four years ago, the Pentagon's inspector general recommended killing the defense travel system altogether, but it survived. Investigators say 70 percent of Pentagon travelers refuse to use DTS because of faulty software or because they believe they can get a better price elsewhere.

"In many cases," said Tom Schatz of the private group Citizens Against Government Waste, "they're simply finding it easier to pick up the phone and call the travel agent and say, 'I'd like to go from here to there. Can you do this for me?' "

In fact, critics say the Pentagon could get cheaper air fares simply by using discount online travel sites that many bargain-hunters use -- such as Travelocity or Expedia.

But Northrup Grumman, the company that devised the defense travel system for the Pentagon, said that's not true. Darryl Fraser of Northrup Grumman told ABC News the system will be up to speed sometime this fall.

"This is a program that the American taxpayer [and] the Department of Defense can be proud of," he said. "It is actually being deployed. It is being used, and it is going to save the Department of Defense money."

The company says part of the problem was that some Defense employees were reluctant to use DTS, and were more comfortable using the old travel system. That has changed, said the company, as more workers have gradually become more familiar with the new system and realized it is better.

Sen. Coburn is not buying that, and said it is time to kill a failed program.

"There are other systems out there," he said. "There's a better way to do it. We should not perpetuate this hoax on the American taxpayer."

Congress is deciding now whether to spend another $60 million toward the defense travel system, for a total cost of $474 million.

Inner Circle Taking More Of C.D.C. Bonuses (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

Top officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention received premium bonuses in recent years at the expense of scientists and others who perform much of the agency's scientific work, agency records show.

Those inside the office of the centers' director, Dr. Julie L. Gerberding, have benefited the most, the records show.

Using the Freedom of Information Act, The New York Times requested records of all cash awards of $2,500 or greater granted to current and former C.D.C. employees from 2000 to mid-2006. The most recent awards are dated July 21.

DOJ_NMG_0064975

Dr. Gerberding, whose leadership of the agency is the subject of an inquiry by the Senate Finance Committee, was not immediately available for comment, said Tom Skinner, a spokesman for the centers.

From 2002 through mid-2006, William H. Gimson III, the agency's chief operating officer, received bonuses totaling $147,863, which included seven cash awards of more than $2,500. Mr. Gimson's bonuses were about twice the amount granted to any other C.D.C. employee, the agency's records show.

Mr. Skinner said Mr. Gimson was not immediately available for comment.

Mr. Gimson's deputy, Barbara W. Harris, received six premium bonuses of $2,500 or more from 2002 through mid-2006 for a total of $84,894, agency records show.

Mr. Skinner said Ms. Harris was also not available for comment.

Mr. Gimson and Ms. Harris are part of the federal government's Senior Executive Service, a cadre of top civil servants whose salaries are generally among the highest in government. The salaries of Mr. Gimson and Ms. Harris were not included in the records requested by The Times.

The increase in bonuses to these officials was part of a decision by the Bush administration to make transformation of the management of the centers a top priority, said Glen Nowak, chief of media relations at the centers. "If we want to retain people, we need to recognize them," Mr. Nowak said Friday in an interview. "We are operating in a highly competitive environment."

Before Dr. Gerberding's appointment, members of the C.D.C. director's inner circle rarely received premium bonuses of $2,500 or more. After her arrival, in July 2002, such cash awards increased, the records obtained by The Times show.

In 2000, officials in the office of the director, Dr. Jeffrey P. Koplan, received bonuses totaling $30,000, which included eight premium bonuses of $2,500 or more. The bonuses represented 0.4 percent of all bonuses granted within the centers that year.

In 2005, the records show that officials in Dr. Gerberding's office received 60 premium bonuses totaling $515,075, or about 4 percent of all bonuses granted within the centers.

Because bonus money is limited — about 1.5 percent of the total personnel budget, Mr. Skinner said — the growing share of premium bonuses for Dr. Gerberding's closest advisers has meant less money is available for some scientists and other workers.

In an e-mail message on Friday afternoon, Dr. Gerberding informed workers at the centers that information about the agency's bonus program might soon be made public.

"It is important to remember one thing, though: that those of you who have received a monetary award, or will in the future, received it for your superior performance and special acts, which merit these awards," Dr. Gerberding wrote.

The agency's Executive Leadership Board recently voted to create a committee to review the cash awards process and address "any shortcomings," she wrote.

In addition to those within Dr. Gerberding's inner circle, the increase in large cash awards within the centers has mostly benefited employees in the agency's financial, computer and human resources departments — not its scientists.

"You have the administration signaling that these are the areas that they want to see significant improvements on, and they want that to happen as quickly as possible," Mr. Nowak said.

The administration also made security a priority, Mr. Nowak said. He said that helped to explain $41,485 in premium bonuses given since 2002 to William T. Porter, the agency's head of security.

"I'm sure Bill Porter's peers in the corporate world are being paid at a higher level," Mr. Nowak said.

Members of the Public Health Service are not eligible to receive cash awards, Mr. Nowak said. That is part of the reason so few scientists appear among the top recipients of premium bonuses, he said.

Soon after arriving at the centers, Dr. Gerberding began a comprehensive reorganization of the agency. In its wake, many of the agency's senior scientists and leaders either left or have announced that they are planning to leave.

The Washington Post and The Atlanta Journal-Constitution have reported on the turmoil at the centers in articles quoting disgruntled former senior scientists who said the changes had undermined the agency.

Five of the six former directors who led the agency in the past 40 years recently wrote a letter to Dr. Gerberding expressing concerns over the exodus of crucial administrative and scientific leaders and scientists, The Journal-Constitution reported.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa and chairman of the Finance Committee, has announced that the committee is trying to determine whether upheaval at the agency has jeopardized its scientific mission.

In another e-mail message, on Sept. 11, Dr. Gerberding noted the departures of top agency leaders and acknowledged that change was difficult.

"I respect those who don't believe these changes are needed, and I respect even more all those who are actively and constructively engaged in helping us find the best way forward," Dr. Gerberding wrote.

Among the other recipients of large cash awards since 2002 were James D. Seligman, the agency's chief information officer, who received $62,455 in premium bonuses; John C. Tibbs, director of the agency's financial management office, who received $52,880; and Kimberly S. Lane, a senior adviser to the Coordinating Center for Infectious Diseases, who received $50,565.

None could immediately be reached for comment.

Report: Most CDC Bonuses Go To Managers (AP)

AP, September 17, 2006

The employees at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention who get bonuses most frequently are not scientists, but instead are accountants, budget analysts, computer experts and other administrative managers, according to a published report Sunday.

The data appear to reinforce the findings of an internal CDC survey last year that found one of the top concerns among the agency's employees was a "loss of public health focus/mission in exchange for inappropriate business focus."

The 72 CDC employees who received five or more awards of at least $2,500 from 2000 through July 21 work primarily in non-science jobs, according an analysis by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution of agency data obtained under the Freedom of Information Act.

Some of those employees got $30,000, $50,000 and, in one case, more than $140,000 in cumulative bonuses during the period, the paper reported.

The CDC has about 9,000 employees, and 4,200 of them are considered scientific staff.

CDC officials said the agency is examining its system of awarding employees.

"We want to make sure that the system we have in place is equitable and that it rewards everyone, if in fact they are eligible for the award and if in fact they're deserving of it," spokesman Tom Skinner said.

In an e-mail to CDC employees Friday, in anticipation of the Journal-Constitution's report, director Julie Gerberding stressed that the agency was reviewing the program, Skinner said.

"You all work hard every day and often accomplish seemingly impossible feats within incredible time constraints," she wrote. "Without question, people at CDC who do exceptional work should be recognized with awards, including monetary awards."

Gerberding was not available to comment Saturday, Skinner said.

Skinner and other CDC officials said several factors may explain the frequent large awards skewed in favor of financial staff and administrative managers instead of core scientific staff.

One could be that not all front-line managers may be aware of or regularly use the awards. Another is that all federal agencies are being pushed to improve budget systems, technology and the like. There hasn't been such a push on the scientific side, said Glen Nowak, another CDC spokesman.

Also, about 800 of the CDC's 4,200 scientific employees are members of the U.S. Public Health Service Commissioned Corps, a uniformed service that operates under a different personnel system and is not eligible for the awards, CDC officials said. And about 600 distinguished scientists are in another classification that did not become eligible for annual performance awards until last fall, they said.

Cash awards given to CDC and other federal employees fall under two general categories: special act cash awards, which reward for a specific accomplishment or activity; and annual performance bonuses, tied to a percentage of the person's salary.

Since 2000, the CDC distributed about 2,500 special act and performance awards worth at least $2,500 to about 1,450 employees, the Journal-Constitution reported. About 560 received two or more of these awards, and 72 received five or more.

Three employees — a financial systems branch chief, a deputy director of budget and management, and another budget official — received 10 awards each. Their cumulative awards totaled $35,000, $34,326 and $32,000 respectively.

Five employees — working in facilities operations, budget, accounting and technical information — received nine awards each. Their cumulative totals ranged from $25,326 to $50,565.

CDC officials did not release copies of the award nominations or justification forms for the most frequent recipients.

Democrats Rap GOP For Medicare Rate Hike (AP)

By Andrew Miga, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 17, 2006

Democrats say failed Republican policies are behind rising Medicare premiums that are leaving millions of older Americans scrambling for basic health care.

Democrat Chris Murphy, a Connecticut state senator who is challenging 12-term Republican Rep. Nancy Johnson, criticized the GOP for failing to embrace the reforms needed to give seniors a break from increased health care costs.

DOJ_NMG_0064977

"It's time for new leadership in Congress, to take on President Bush's bad plan and take the Medicare drug program in a new direction," Murphy said Saturday in his party's weekly radio address.

Murphy warned that unless Democrats can step in with new ideas, such as allowing the government to negotiate for lower Medicare prescription drug prices, health costs will continue rising for seniors.

"The Bush administration announced this week that Medicare premiums will be going up again, and could even carry a new, expensive monthly fee," Murphy said. "This new tax on seniors will affect millions of Americans, and thousands of people in Connecticut."

Most elderly and disabled people on Medicare will see their premiums rise to $93.50 a month next year, a 5.6 percent increase that is much lower than had been anticipated.

"Being healthy should be a right, not a privilege available only to those that can afford it," said Murphy. "Over the past decade, seniors in this country have been hit with more and more bad news. They face confusing rules, added fees and now higher premiums. What's worse, Republicans in Congress have done nothing to ease the burden on American seniors."

Johnson, a major player in Congress on Medicare and other health care issues, is among three GOP House incumbents in Connecticut whom national Democrats have targeted in hopes of gaining the 15 seats they need to control the House.

"My opponent, Nancy Johnson, deserves part of the blame," said Murphy. "She wrote the confusing Medicare law in 2003. She is also one of many Republicans who opposes allowing Medicare to negotiate for lower drug prices — a Democratic idea, and more importantly, a good idea."

The new Medicare prescription drug benefit is the biggest change since the health program's beginning. Under the program, elderly beneficiaries enroll in plans administered by private insurers. Seniors had dozens of plans to pick from, leaving many of them confused and frustrated when the program was launched.

Medicare Part B Fees Head For A Sliding Scale (LAT)

Kathy M. Kristof Personal Finance

The Los Angeles Times, September 17, 2006

All recipients will pay more next year to adjust for inflation, but those with higher incomes will face bigger increases.

High-income retirees may be in for an unpleasant surprise this winter.

It involves the monthly premiums that older Americans pay for Medicare Part B, which helps pay the cost of doctor visits, diagnostic tests and other routine care. The premiums, which are automatically deducted from Social Security checks, are currently $88 a month.

In January, everyone's premiums will go up to adjust for healthcare inflation, but higher-income recipients will see even larger hikes.

As a result, a single retiree with an annual income of $80,000 or less (and a married person earning less than $160,000), could pay $98 a month next year, according to estimates, while a single person earning $81,000 would pay $110 a month. And under the same scenario a single person earning $200,000 would pay $170 a month — or 73% more than lower-income Medicare recipients. (See chart for more details.)

Medicare will calculate your premium based on your income in your most recent tax return.

Congress approved tying premiums to income to raise money to offset some of the cost in 2003's Medicare Modernization Act, which ushered in prescription drug coverage for seniors.

The sliding scale phases in over three years. As a result, those in the highest-income group will find their premiums soaring to more than three times the fees paid by those in the lowest-income group.

Of the 40 million Medicare beneficiaries, about 2 million will be adversely affected by the sliding scale.

But they will officially receive that news only a few weeks before their Social Security checks are docked for the higher cost.

"We will be notifying participants later in the fall — late November or early December," said Mark Lassiter, a spokesman for the Social Security Administration.

And, experts warn, some of those paying more will not necessarily be wealthy.

One-time events, such as the sale of stock or rental property, can temporarily knock otherwise lower-income retirees into a high-paying group, said Paul N. Van de Water, vice president for health policy at the National Academy of Social Insurance in Washington.

So could converting a traditional individual retirement account to a Roth IRA, or taking a lump-sum distribution from a retirement account.

"This is really a big deal," said Jill Allagood, a certified financial planner at Tarbox Group in Newport Beach. "It's pretty easy to kick over the top of the threshold if you're not careful."

DOJ_NMG_0064978

Consider Susan, a hypothetical retiree with $49,000 in taxable income who converted a $100,000 traditional IRA into a Roth last year. This one-time event boosted her 2005 taxable income to $149,000. So, instead of paying $98 a month in premiums next year, as she would have if her 2005 income had remained at $49,000, she will pay $130 a month, about 30% more. If she instead converted the IRA in 2007, she would pay $245 in 2009, almost doubling her cost.

The law does give retirees with "a major life-changing event" the option to dispute their premiums. But it's too soon to say how this dispute process will work or whether premium adjustments would be slow, swift, partial or full.

The government currently pays 75% of the cost of Medicare Part B, with recipients picking up the rest of the tab through their premiums. Under the new formula, higher-income recipients will pay 28% to 80% of the cost of their coverage under Part B.

The flat monthly premium of $88 this year reflected a 13% increase from 2005. If medical cost inflation remains at 13% a year, even beneficiaries in the lowest-income group will pay $98 a month in 2007 and $125 a month in 2009, Allagood calculated. But with the sliding scale, those who earn more will pay $175 to $400 a month in 2009.

AARP Begins Ad Blitz For Foreign Rx Drugs (MH)

The Miami Herald, September 17, 2006

The AARP is launching a $500,000 ad campaign today in 14 states pushing for Senate action on legislation that would let consumers buy U.S.-made prescription drugs from Canada and other countries.

David Certner, legislative policy director for the advocacy group, said the campaign focuses on the home states of senators who have shown some openness to letting people buy U.S.-made medicine shipped abroad.

"This is going on right now regardless of the law. People are going outside the country to buy their medicine," he said. ``We want to make sure the system is as safe as we can make it."

The bill that AARP supports, written by Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., has bipartisan support from 31 co-sponsors. It would allow consumers to buy U.S.-made prescription drugs from Canada and eventually from other countries such as Australia, Japan and nations within the European Union.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

SENATORS AGREE TO FEMA COMPROMISE

Senators have agreed on a compromise to restructure and expand the Federal Emergency Management Agency, restoring some of its responsibilities.

DOJ_NMG_0064979

The FEMA director, currently David Paulison, would have direct access to the president in a crisis, but the agency would remain a part of the Homeland Security Department. The compromise will be included in a budget bill Congress is scheduled to vote on this month.

Republican Sen. Susan Collins of Maine, who heads the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, worked out the compromise late Friday with Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the committee's top Democrat.

The plan, which now goes to House-Senate negotiators, includes stricter requirements for who could serve as FEMA director.

GRANDMOTHER PLEAS FOR BABY'S RETURN

UNION -- A grandmother of a newborn girl stolen from a rural home pleaded Saturday for the baby's safe return, as authorities searched for an abductor who stabbed and seriously injured the infant's mother before fleeing with the child.

"The family's in agony," Raylene Ochsenbine said at a news conference. ``Just give her back."

The attacker walked into the home, told Abby Woods' mother, "I'm here to take your child," then slashed the young mother's throat and fled with the 1-week-old child.

Stephanie Ochsenbine, 21, was in stable condition Saturday following surgery. She told police she did not know her attacker.

LOUISIANA

GUARD TO REMAIN IN NEW ORLEANS

NEW ORLEANS -- National Guard troops and state police will patrol the city through December, Gov. Kathleen Blanco said Saturday at a summit of law enforcement officials and crime experts called to address a spate of killings marring the recovery from Hurricane Katrina.

Police are on pace to recover as many illegal firearms this year as they did in the two previous years -- even though half as many people live in the city now, said Robert Browning, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

But in a positive sign, court and prison repairs should be done next month, an official said, which means the city's crippled criminal justice system will be able to process its influx of suspects more efficiently.

CALIFORNIA

ORGANIC GROWER UNDER SCRUTINY

SAN JUAN BAUTISTA -- Earthbound Farm, the country's largest grower of organic produce, is facing unwelcome scrutiny after federal officials linked a nationwide E. coli outbreak to its bagged spinach.

The company, also known by its legal name Natural Selection Foods LLC, recalled and stopped shipping all its spinach products after E. coli outbreaks killed one person and sickened more than 100 others in 19 states.

Earthbound officials were working with state and federal health inspectors to pinpoint the source of the contamination, spokeswoman Samantha Cabaluna said.

The Backdrop (WP)

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

The House is considering a bill, crafted by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), to give the District a representative with full voting rights. The bill would add two seats to the House, one for the District and one for the state next in line to expand its congressional delegation based on population -- currently Utah. A House subcommittee held a hearing on the matter on Thursday.

Congress Has The Authority To Do Right By D.C. (WP)

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

More than 40 years ago, the Supreme Court declared that "no right is more precious in a free country than that of having a voice in the election of those who make the laws under which, as good citizens, we must live." And yet, for more than 200 years the citizens of the District have been denied this right because they have no voting representation in Congress. To its credit, Congress is taking steps to begin correcting this longstanding injustice.

Specifically, the House Government Reform Committee has approved, and the House Judiciary Committee is considering, a bill that would give D.C. residents the right to full voting representation in the House. While conferring this right is surely the right thing to do, a legitimate question has been raised concerning Congress's authority to confer the right by simple legislation, rather than through constitutional amendment. We have carefully considered this question and believe for three reasons the bill is within Congress's authority: It is consistent with fundamental constitutional principles; it is consistent with the language of Congress's constitutional power; and it is consistent with the governing legal precedents.

First, interpretation of Congress's Article I legislative authority should always be guided by the fundamental principles upon which the nation and the Constitution were founded. Those principles include a commitment to a republican form of government and to the proposition that the laws enacted by the legislature should be based on the consent of the governed. There is nothing in our Constitution's history or its fundamental principles suggesting that the Framers intended to deny the precious right to vote to those who live in the capital of the great democracy they founded.

Second, Congress's specific power over the District of Columbia is one of the broadest of all its powers. In the words of the Constitution, "Congress shall have power . . . to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" over the District. In a 1984 case decided by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, on which we both sat, Judge Abner Mikva noted that through this constitutional provision, the Framers gave Congress "a unique and sovereign power" over the District. In that same case, Judge (now Justice) Antonin Scalia wrote that the broad language of the power gave Congress "extraordinary and plenary" power over our nation's capital. And in another case, that same court held that this broad power gave Congress authority to "provide for the general welfare of citizens within the District of Columbia by any and every act of legislation which it may deem conducive to that end." It is hard to imagine a broader, more comprehensive congressional power than this; and it is also hard to imagine that the power could not be used to advance a fundamental principle of our Constitution -- that the right to vote should be extended to all citizens.

Finally, and equally important, the most analogous legal precedent addressing Congress's authority over the District confirms that Congress can act now to give the vote to D.C. residents. That precedent concerned the fact that Article III of the Constitution confers on federal courts jurisdiction to hear suits brought by citizens of different states against each other. But the Constitution did not give any such express jurisdiction over suits brought by or against citizens of the District of Columbia. As a result, Congress, relying on its broad Article I power over the District of Columbia, remedied that unfairness through legislation that extended the right to District residents. In a 1949 case called National Mutual Insurance Co. v. Tidewater , the Supreme Court upheld that extension and also said that Congress was entitled to great deference in its determination that it had power to address this inequity. The logic of this case applies here, and supports Congress's determination to give the right to vote for a representative to citizens of the District of Columbia, even though the Constitution itself gives that right only to citizens of states.

It is not a surprise that our Constitution, ratified in 1789, contemplated that the right to vote would be enjoyed only by "the people of the several states." After all, in 1789, all U.S. citizens lived in a state. It was not until 1801, when the process Congress authorized by statute in 1791 to create the District out of lands ceded by Virginia and Maryland was completed, that District residents lost their federal voting rights. There is no reason to believe the Framers intended for this to happen. And in any case they gave Congress power to address the problem. Congress has initiated a process to do so, and we urge it to quickly complete the task. As George Washington said in his first inaugural address, the American people are entrusted with "the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty and the destiny of the republican model of government." It is time to extend that model to the citizens of the nation's capital.

Astronauts Allowed Extra Hour Of Sleep (AP)

By Seth Borenstein, Ap Science Writer
AP, September 17, 2006

With their hardest tasks behind them, space shuttle Atlantis' six astronauts got time to relax Saturday after almost a week of nonstop work adding a new 17 1/2-ton addition with wing-like solar power panels to the international space station.

NASA even let the crew sleep an extra hour before waking them with Jimmy Buffett's beach song "Twelve Volt Man."

"We said good morning to them, then a little housekeeping and then left them alone, gave them a chance to enjoy their time on orbit and wind down from what has been a very, very busy series of days on the flight," said flight director Paul Dye.

The astronauts were grateful and echoed Dye's description.

"We've been very, very busy so the chance to sleep in was very much appreciated," rookie astronaut Heide Stefanyshyn-Piper said during a news conference from space.

DOJ_NMG_0064981

Saturday was the last full day at the space station for Atlantis' crew. Besides relaxing and enjoying the view from 220 miles above Earth, they still had to unload supplies for the space station, including 90 pounds of oxygen.

The Atlantis astronauts were to say their goodbyes to the space station's three crew members and undock early Sunday. Once undocked, the crew planned to fly around the space station to get the first complete view of the orbiting space lab in several years.

"We're leaving it in an entirely different configuration than it was when we arrived," said Atlantis pilot Chris Ferguson. "So it would be very good ... to get a good look at the overall configuration and condition of the station."

The Atlantis crew delivered to the space station a 17 1/2-ton addition and, during three spacewalks, hooked up the new segment and prepared it so the 240-foot solar energy arrays could be opened up. The solar arrays will provide a quarter of the space station's electricity when it is finished in 2010.

It was the first shuttle mission devoted to space station construction since December 2002. The Columbia accident in early 2003 halted all construction while NASA worked to fix problems with the shuttles' external fuel tanks.

Contrary to appearances, this past week's spacewalks were difficult, said astronaut Joe Tanner, who went on two of the mission's three spacewalks with Piper.

"I want to squash that bug right now," said Tanner when told by CBS News that he made the spacewalks look easy. "These (spacewalks) were not easy."

Also not easy was getting used to zero gravity for Atlantis' rookies, Ferguson and Piper, who said they kept banging into things.

"I feel really clumsy in space," Piper said. "Because you think ... you're going to make it from point A to point B, and you kind of go to point C, D, and E, getting to point B."

Even Tanner, 56, who had been on three previous space flights, said getting used to zero gravity again was more difficult than when he was younger.

However, despite their initial wobbliness in orbit, the crew earned high praise from the mission's flight director.

"I rate this crew 110 percent. They've done an outstanding job up to this point," Dye said. "We're not going to lose our focus until we get on the ground so we'll keep our game face on. But I suspect everything's going to keep going pretty darn well."

Losing It, 200 Miles Above The Earth (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

In space, junk can kill.

When two bolts slipped away from spacewalking astronauts last week, astronauts and controllers expressed concern that the small objects might have floated into the moving parts of the $372 million truss that had just been added to the station.

One astronaut, Joseph R. Tanner, sounding glum, described the trajectory of a lost bolt to mission control and fretted about its possible effects. “I just hope that bolt is on its way to Mother Earth right now and not hanging around” in the truss, he said.

Space junk is nothing new. During the first American spacewalk, in 1965, Edward White lost a glove — though not one that he was wearing, fortunately. It was a spare that floated out of his Gemini capsule. NASA also had astronauts toss away a solar array for the Hubble Space Telescope during a mission in 1993. (As it drifted off, one exclaimed, “It looks like a bird!”)

So when a bolt is lost in space, should anyone care? Once analysts determined that the bolts had floated away, they dismissed the incident as trivial. But NASA also recognizes that the thousands of pieces of debris in orbit are potential hazards.

The concerns tend to focus on the risk of collision with objects moving at high speed, however; the relative velocity of something that has simply drifted away is low. Still, NASA mission planners require tethers for tools and objects during spacewalks.

Despite those efforts, astronauts commonly lose small objects. During the last shuttle mission, Piers Sellers lost a spatula used to test repair techniques. “It was my favorite spatula,” he joked during the mission. John McCullough, the lead flight director for the station, said last week that on Russian spacewalks, “they throw things away all the time.”

They hit things away sometimes, too. A Russian astronaut is planning to drive a golf ball in a coming space walk, part of a marketing agreement with a golf club company.

Timely Transcripts At Last (WP)

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

The Supreme Court becomes a bit less bashful.

DOJ_NMG_0064982

WHEN THE Supreme Court opens its term next month, it will finally begin making transcripts of its oral arguments available -- free, online and on the day of the arguments. That this represents a breakthrough shows how dramatically behind the times the justices are. But it is a breakthrough, nonetheless, that will dramatically improve the public's access to court proceedings.

Until now, the justices not only prohibited cameras and typically waited months to release audiotapes of arguments, they also waited weeks to release free transcripts. The public had to depend on the media to know in a timely fashion what happened. This was unfortunate, both because oral arguments are among the most majestic events in American democracy and because even excellent news stories often can't capture the full texture of arguments over complicated and nuanced points of law. For anyone interested in a particular case or the court as an institution, there is no substitute for knowing exactly what questions each justice asked and how counsel answered.

Timely transcripts are a half-measure. They imperfectly convey the atmospherics of an argument -- the tone a justice might strike, for example -- that sometimes indicate the court's direction more than dry words on paper. But given the implacable hostility some of the justices feel toward cameras, the move is a huge step forward.

Daydream Believers (NYT)

By Tim Weiner

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

A tremendous story is trapped inside this slim book: the triumph of technological fantasy at the Pentagon. The Defense Department controls the biggest and most inviting pool of public capital available to private contractors in the United States. Over the years, much of this 12-figure sum has gone down the drain in pursuit of wonder weapons. To take just one example, the Pentagon has so far spent roughly $100 billion on missile defense — which is serious money, levee-fixing money, cancer-curing money — but has produced only an insubstantial shield.

Almost no one says no to new weapons proposals nowadays — not Congress, not the Pentagon. As becomes clear from Sharon Weinberger's even-tempered "Imaginary Weapons," the planning process is beyond parody. The different branches of the armed forces conjure up dream weapons, setting technological requirements for them far beyond the state of science or the art of war. Once an idea is born, it goes through two stages of research and development: too soon to tell and too late to stop. Contractors cross their fingers while promising to fulfill the Pentagon's visions, whether or not those visions comply with the laws of physics. Occasionally the planned weapons are actually produced, though almost always at many multiples of their promised cost.

Weinberger, the editor of Defense Technology International, writes with enthusiasm and well-calibrated skepticism. She argues, irrefutably, that fringe science has reached ever greater heights in military circles. Since the United States has fewer and fewer real scientific experts in the government, fringe-science projects can receive the backing of the Pentagon without a semblance of peer review or the application of the scientific method.

"Imaginary Weapons" sets out to tell the story of one such project, the so-called hafnium bomb, a weapon that never existed and likely never will. Its progenitor, the book's protagonist, is Carl Collins, a physics professor from Texas who has been bumping around the lower echelons of military science for 35 years. Collins claimed in 1998 that he had used a dental X-ray machine to trigger the release of an enormous amount of energy from a trace of the isomer of hafnium-178. Isomers are atomic nuclei in an excited state. They hold tremendous potential energy. The trick is unlocking it.

If Collins was right, he was on the verge of a breakthrough in weaponry on the order of the invention of the catapult and the crossbow. A hafnium bomb the size of a hand grenade could have the force of a small tactical nuclear weapon. Better still, because the triggering was an electromagnetic phenomenon, not nuclear fission, a hafnium bomb might not be covered by nuclear treaties.

One small problem: the science properly belonged in The Journal of Irreproducible Results. As Weinberger writes, the breakthrough claimed by Collins could not be replicated. Nonetheless, the hafnium project received a $30 million budget — a pittance by Pentagon standards, but still a substantial amount — before it disappeared into justly deserved obscurity after five years of fruitless effort. In a nice piece of reporting, Weinberger quotes an expert's comparison of the military utility of the hafnium bomb to that of a jelly doughnut.

"Imaginary Weapons" wants to make the hafnium bomb a symbol of bad weapons science masquerading as good old American know-how at the Pentagon. It almost succeeds. Weinberger has talked to the right people and has done her homework on the hafnium bomb. And she valiantly translates the gobbledygook of Pentagon-speak and the jargon of physics into English, even if she has a tendency to leave a reader lost in minutiae and the repetition of minutiae. But a book about the Pentagon's scientific underworld requires a deeper analysis than a dissection of a single crackpot project.

The hafnium bomb was a very small example of a huge problem: the way the Pentagon wastes money on unworkable weapons. "Imaginary Weapons" leaps back and forth across years and decades, and performs loop-the-loops into projects like cold fusion and parapsychology (which are exemplars of bad science but have little or nothing to do with wonder weapons). Yet it never delivers a sense of the Pentagon itself, the institution that creates imaginary weapons. This is a little bit like writing "Moby-Dick" and leaving out the Pequod.

By focusing on one tiny target, Weinberger has missed the big picture. An array of military programs now under way is predicated on technological fantasy, the scientific equivalent of a wing and a prayer. A classic example is the Army's Future Combat Systems, with a cost well in excess of $100 billion. Weinberger could have asked why two generations of scientists and engineers have worshiped at the five-sided temple of the Pentagon, selling their genius for projects that have yielded very little of lasting value. That's a subject that will require a better book with a bigger bang.

Paulson Tells G-7 Not To Fret Over U.S. Housing Slump (BLOOM)

By Kevin Carmichael

Bloomberg, September 17, 2006

Sept. 16 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, making his debut at a meeting of Group of Seven economy chiefs, told his counterparts they needn't worry about a housing-led collapse of the world's largest economy.

``U.S. economic growth is settling into ranges more in line with our long-term potential," Paulson said in a statement after meeting G-7 finance ministers and central bank governors in Singapore today. ``The residential housing market is cooling from record unsustainable growth rates, but growth in the U.S. economy is being supported by other components."

Sales of U.S. existing homes have declined every month since G-7 officials last met in April, and the National Association of Realtors predicts house prices may decline in the remaining months of 2006, which would be the first year-over- year drops since 1993. The International Monetary Fund on Sept. 14 branded the slowing U.S. housing market a ``key risk" to global expansion.

U.S. economic growth slowed to an annual rate of 2.9 percent in the second quarter from 5.6 percent in the first three months of the year. Higher wages, ``strong" company profits and business spending will offset a weaker housing market, Paulson said. U.S. economic growth will average 3.4 percent in 2006, the median estimate of 80 economists surveyed by Bloomberg News Sept. 1 to 7.

Paulson, who replaced John Snow in July, said in the statement that protectionist pressures remain a ``serious threat." China needs greater currency flexibility to help even lopsided flows of trade and investment, reflected in the U.S.'s record current-account deficit, Paulson said.

No Currency Target

Paulson said he ``will listen" to China's government rather than just make prescriptions and it would be ``presumptuous" to set any type of target regarding a change in currency policy.

The U.S. would do its part to reduce the so-called imbalances by reducing its budget deficit. Europe and Japan must boost consumer demand, and oil exporters should invest more of their profits at home, Paulson said.

Like China, some of those oil exporters should permit greater currency flexibility, Paulson said, without naming particular countries.

Someone's Spoiling The Party, The Housing Market Says (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

TO hear some people in the real estate industry tell it, one of the biggest problems with the housing market is what is being said about it in the news media.

Agents and industry executives say reporters, editors and news anchors are making a cooling market sound worse than it is. While the number of sales may have dropped from 2005 (which was a record-setting year, the end of a five-year run) and more homes stay on the market longer, real estate professionals note that sale prices in much of the country are still higher than they were a year ago.

Richard A. Smith, vice chairman and president of the Realogy Corporation, the nation's largest residential real estate broker, said there was a "constant flood of media that is so negative" that it was discouraging many potential buyers and sellers.

"Nobody wants to be foolish in this kind of market," he said. "No one wants to sell too low or buy too high."

DOJ_NMG_0064984

The news media have always helped shape public perception of markets, whether for houses, stocks or tulips. But exactly how much the press influences mass consumer behavior is subject to debate.

Robert J. Shiller, the Yale economist and author of "Irrational Exuberance," said the news media played an important role in molding public opinion as markets both rise and fall. But he said he generally approved of the skeptical tone of many news reports about both the real estate boom and subsequent downturn. "The media has been pretty on top of this story, that this might be a psychological event," he said.

One of the industry's frequent complaints is that journalists do not put the current situation in context.

"The doom and gloomers out there are saying business is dropping 'x' percent," said Dave Liniger, chairman and co-founder of Re/Max, the real estate franchiser. "But you have to realize it doubled over the last five years."

Critics point to an article in Fortune magazine in October 2002 that they say illustrates how reporting can distort the market picture. The article, which was about housing on both coasts, argued that prices were rising so fast they were unsustainable, and that a bubble might be created that would inevitably burst.

An example of the problem, the article noted, was a San Francisco Victorian that sold for $285,000 in 1996 and was listed for $1.2 million in 2002. Coldwell Banker, which listed the home, complained that Fortune should have noted that the home had been significantly renovated, which would account for much of the price increase.

That year, in an interview with Real Trends, a trade publication, Alexander E. Perriello III, who ran Coldwell Banker then and now heads all five of Realogy's franchise brands, criticized the article. "I'm getting sick and tired of irresponsible journalism that attacks one of the few bright spots in the U.S. economy," he said.

But the real estate agent who listed the house, Al Rodriguez, said last week that home's value had soared even before it was put on the market in 2002. The couple that was selling it then had bought it the year before in a frenzied bidding war for $1.1 million.

Shawn Tully, who wrote the Fortune article, said in general it was the price of the land, not the homes, that was soaring. At any rate, he said, he wasn't sure what all the criticism was about. "If my story was so influential," he said, "why did the prices increase another 50 percent between 2002 and 2005?"

Indeed, home values climbed an average of 12.5 percent annually in the San Francisco area from 2002 to 2006, according to a government home price index.

Many journalists who cover the real estate market said they expected, and were not worried by, criticism from the industry. They said they were more concerned about whether the news media were skeptical enough about the boom while it was continuing.

"We were late to the savings and loan crisis and we were definitely late to the dot-com crash," said Bradley J. Inman, publisher of Inman News, a real estate news service, who said he believed that the news media have done a better job covering the housing boom.

Some critics say the news media did not include enough contrary viewpoints during the run-up in home prices.

"Obviously, people get carried away," said Dean Baker, co-director of the Center for Economic Policy Research in Washington, who runs a press criticism blog called Beat the Press. "But if there are voices that challenge it, it stops some people."

But Mr. Shiller said he was not so sure it did. In reviewing historical news clips, he said, he found that the press had frequently questioned the premise of booms, including the 1920's stock market boom. "Newspaper people do that more than their audience demands," he said. But it appears, he added, that people "read it blandly and it doesn't sink in."

A Fable, Adapted From Aesop (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

THERE is an Aesop fable about a man — Greek, of course — who sees a swallow fluttering about on an unusually warm winter day. Leaping to the conclusion that summer has arrived, the man sells his only coat to buy himself a good time.

Some economists say you merely need to replace the Greek with an American, and the coat with a house or condominium to understand the force powering the American economy during the recent housing boom.

In this updated version of the fable, Americans were intoxicated by the leaps in the value of their real estate. Assuming the good times were here to stay, they were unable to resist temptation, impulsively calling the mortgage broker to get another loan to pay for the plasma TV set, the Caribbean vacation and the three-burner barbecue grill.

Between the third quarter of 2005 and the first quarter of this year, home equity withdrawals were running at an annual rate of more than $850 billion, according to the Federal Reserve, and amounted to about 9 percent of disposable personal income. The personal savings rate declined into negative territory last year for the first time since 1933. And the economy surged.

In Aesop's world, winter set in again, the swallow died and the coatless man blamed the bird for his misfortune: "By appearing before the springtime you have not only killed yourself," he moaned, "but you have wrought my destruction, too."

Yet in American morality tales, it seems, spendthrifts aren't always punished. Winter has surely engulfed the housing market. But to the befuddlement of many economists, who had been expecting consumers to rein in their spending when the price of their homes stopped rising, America's happy consumers have so far eluded the payback.

"There is no sign of weaker consumer confidence raising the savings rate yet," wrote Charles Dumas, chief economist for the United States at Lombard Street Research, an economic research firm in London. "People have not yet started to pull in their horns in response to house price horrors."

Home prices have not yet fallen nationwide, but have declined in areas like Florida and California. And most other measures of housing activity look ugly. Sales of existing homes declined 11 percent over the last 12 months; mortgage lending fell more than a third since June 2005; construction of new homes has plummeted.

But consumers haven't blinked. Spending jumped 0.5 percent in July; the sharpest increase since December of last year, exceeding consumers' income by some $85 billion.

Of course, rising employment and income this year have helped keep spending afloat. But some economists are starting to question the magnitude of housing's impact on national habits of spending and thrift, concluding that the effect may be smaller than expected: tumbling home prices might not pull consumer spending into the abyss after all.

To begin with, much of the money extracted by Americans from their homes was never spent. Some was used to pay down liabilities like credit-card debt, a sound strategy when credit-card rates are about 8 percentage points higher than rates on a typical mortgage and mortgage interest payments can be deducted from income when paying taxes.

Money was put to other uses. One survey commissioned by the Federal Reserve of people who refinanced their mortgages in 2001 and the first half of 2002 found that only 45 percent had withdrawn any equity at all. About 26 percent of this money was used to pay down debt, 11 percent to buy stocks or other financial assets, 10 percent to buy real estate or make other business investments and 35 percent to finance home improvements. Only 16 percent of the money was used to finance consumption.

This doesn't mean that a decline in home equity extraction wouldn't hurt the economy. Residential investment would decline. Consumption would probably respond to declining house prices in indirect ways.

But relentless spending and a declining savings rate over the last few years seem mostly driven by other factors that occurred at the same time as rising home prices — notably, low interest rates — but were not caused by rising home prices. So the direct impact of falling home prices on spending is likely to be more muted than expected. "I think the slowdown will come," Mr. Dumas said. "But it is likely to be much more slow in operating than is being supposed."

In one recent study, Vladimir Klyuev and Paul S. Mills, two economists from the International Monetary Fund, suggested that the long-term decline in the propensity to save in the United States has to do primarily with financial innovations that have made borrowing easier and quicker, reducing the need for precautionary savings.

Mr. Klyuev and Mr. Mills untangled the effects of home equity withdrawals on savings from other factors, like inflation and interest rates, and found that for every dollar withdrawn from home equity, the savings rate declined by 20 cents in the short run but recovered in the long run.

LOOKING at it the other way around, they found that even if the amount of home equity withdrawal plunged from its current level of 9 percent of disposable income to 1 percent — its long-term average — savings as a share of income would rise by about 1.25 percentage points. Consumption might decline somewhat as a result, but that would hardly be a devastating blow. "There will be a pick-up in savings, but it won't be catastrophic," Mr. Mills said.

In America, the fable is likely to have a happier ending. It may no longer be the best of times, but consumers still own their homes and their barbecue grills — and the swallow still lives.

Who Bears The Risk? (NYT)

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

The housing boom would never have lasted as long as it did if mortgage lenders had to worry about being paid back in full. But instead of relying on borrowers to repay, most lenders quickly sell the loans, generating cash to make more mortgages.

For the past few years, the most voracious loan buyers have been private investment banks, followed by government-sponsored housing agencies, like Fannie Mae. The buyers carve up the loans into mortgage-backed securities — complex i.o.u.'s with various terms, yields and levels of risk. They then sell the securities to investors the world over, at breathtaking profit. The investors earn relatively high returns as homeowners repay their mortgages.

The process has encouraged homeownership and created wealth. But there is a downside, too, which demands attention.

As the boom thundered on, the pool of available credit grew larger than the pool of creditworthy borrowers, resulting in an explosion of risky mortgages with features like no money down, interest-only payments and super-low teaser rates. Investors — including mutual funds, pension funds, hedge funds, insurance companies and foreign central banks, to name a few — currently hold $2 trillion in mortgage-backed securities from investment banks, triple the amount from three years ago. Investors also own $4 trillion in mortgage-backed securities from government-sponsored agencies.

In a market so vast and dynamic, everyone knows that if mortgage defaults should rise, damage could reverberate throughout the financial system. So far, defaults have inched up. But many homeowners are at a dangerous juncture. Interest rates on adjustable mortgages are rising as home values are weakening, precluding for many the chance to refinance. Economists calculate that $750 billion of outstanding mortgage debt is now at measurable risk of default — about 7 percent of the total.

No one can predict the depth of the housing slowdown or its effect on the global economy. Even the Federal Reserve has taken, for now, a wait-and-see approach. Meanwhile, markets seems to take comfort in the belief that if housing hit the skids, the Fed would exert damage control by aggressively lowering interest rates. There is no guarantee, however, that interest-rate easing would have the same powerful effect it had in the past.

What if it didn't? Market makers and central bankers don't talk about that, for fear of unleashing a self-fulfilling prophecy. But we sure hope someone in charge has a fallback plan.

Balancing Act Begins With Bonds (WP/AP)

By Tim Paradise, Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 17, 2006

Interest Rate Volatility Brings Need for Equilibrium Into Focus

NEW YORK -- With some investors wringing their hands about inflation and the Federal Reserve's efforts to keep it in check, those with bond fund holdings could be forgiven for wanting to take their money and run. But while some market observers see volatility ahead, few are ready to call it quits.

"I would say things are going to get a little bumpy here in September for the bond market, but I don't think it's the end of the world," said Jeff Tjornehoj, a senior analyst at Lipper Inc. He contends that there are still smart plays to be made.

Bonds have faced a more difficult environment in the past two years as the Federal Reserve raised interest rates 17 consecutive times before pausing last month. While the rate increases hurt bond funds, leaving some investors wary, sentiment changed in late June after Fed comments led investors to believe the rate hikes had come to an end.

Bond prices move in the opposite direction of their yield. So as interest rates rise, the prices of bonds often fall because investors are not willing to pay as much for a bond that has a lower yield.

"Investors are saying that the Fed is done raising rates, and so that's why you see people taking more risk now," said Jim Kauffmann, head of fixed income at ING Investment Management. He noted that it became more acceptable to take risk in areas such as high-yield bonds, which have lower credit-quality ratings.

Kauffmann said the Fed's comments turned investors' attention to growth from inflation, with the notion that if growth in the economy moderates, then so, too, will inflation. "Now that's a huge leap of faith for investors to make," he said.

Still, Kauffmann believes that if interest rates hold, bond funds should have an easier time showing the returns investors are looking for.

The amount of money invested in bond funds is about $1.41 trillion, or about 15 percent of the amount invested in mutual funds overall, according to the Investment Company Institute, the mutual fund industry trade group. Displeased with lackluster returns for intermediate to long-term bonds, investors snipped their bond fund holdings in 2004 after having added since 2001.

But the funds saw renewed interest last year, with investors adding $31.3 billion to the sector, according to the ICI. The group attributes the increased investment in part to growth in funds that snap up shares of other funds, such as life-cycle funds. These funds, which aim for a balanced investment portfolio, generally include bond funds.

This year has seen a mixed performance for bond funds, with many of the year-to-date gains occurring in the three months since investors interpreted that the Fed was done raising interest rates.

Through July, however, investors added an impressive $22.7 billion to bond funds this year, ICI figures show.

"The summer has been a great time for bond funds to get back on track," Tjornehoj said.

Kauffmann expects that the Fed won't adjust interest rates when it meets this week, but he remains concerned that the effects of the earlier increases haven't been fully absorbed by the markets.

"There still remains a significant question whether inflation is going to become a problem," he said. "Typically inflation does not peak until after the Fed is done" raising rates.

DOJ_NMG_0064987

A cautious investor, perhaps someone closer to retirement, will likely be more comfortable investing in funds focused on shorter-term bonds, not those whose focus is bonds with 10- and 15-year maturities, said Steve Schoepke, vice president of research and product development at AIG SunAmerica Asset Management. Still, he said investors shouldn't necessarily shun longer-term maturities. He noted that as the Fed has tightened rates, short-term interest rates have advanced but longer-term rates haven't acted in tandem, therefore holding down how much some of these bonds pay out.

He prescribes diversification and, as an example, offered a strategy in which an investor's holdings are a mix of short-term and long-term maturities with few intermediate-term bonds. "It's certainly a strategy to mitigate risk and at the same time be positioned, maybe, if you're on the fence," Schoepke said.

Tjornehoj also preaches diversification. "I would want to have several maturities represented." He believes too many investors are convinced they need to be invested solely in funds that focus on maturities of a year or less.

He counsels investors to focus on funds that invest in high-quality bonds and to limit how deeply they venture into bond funds made up of tempting, but riskier, investments such as debt with lower credit quality or in developing nations. Such funds have shown strong performance but could suffer deep setbacks should there be a downturn in the bond markets. Too often, Tjornehoj said, he sees investors "chasing performance" and arriving late.

Rather than focusing on flashy emerging markets funds or high-yield bonds, he suggests that investors reexamine corporate and municipal bond funds. "I still think corporates are a pretty good play. I think they can finish the year out stronger than treasuries."

Diversification could simply help investors stomach swings that could occur as the markets await answers about everything from inflation and interest rates.

"We may be in for volatile times for the rest of the year," Tjornehoj said.

Retirement, Squeezed (WP)

As Traditional Plans Decline, Workers Face a Less Certain Future

Sean Schuback, a 15-year veteran of Verizon, arrived at work one morning last December to unsettling news: A company e-mail sent the night before announced that the telecommunications giant was freezing its pension plan.

In a instant, Schuback, 33, who joined the company as a phone operator right out of high school, saw the $469,286 pension payout he was told he could receive by working another 15 years sliced to $245,494, where it would stay no matter how many more years he put in.

"When I started, I thought, 'This is just a job for a while,' but the benefits were so good I stayed," said the Eastchester, N.Y., resident, who worked his way up to a managerial position. Now, his plan to retire early at 48 and work part time is dashed.

What happened to Schuback's pension is part of a long-running trend, as otherwise healthy companies -- not only Verizon Communications Inc., but also International Business Machines Corp. and, most recently, DuPont Co. -- freeze, terminate or alter the terms of their employees' retirement packages. Most of these companies increased other retirement offerings, which don't include fixed payouts.

Today, about 22 million workers, 19 percent of active private-sector employees, have traditional pension plans, compared with 39 percent three decades ago, according to federal government statistics.

Despite Schuback's financial setback, any retirement expert would say that Schuback should count his blessings as one of a dwindling number of U.S. workers who have a benefit that many say is quickly becoming a dinosaur.

"There's no doubt, if you have some guaranteed retirement from your employer, you are definitely in the lucky minority," said Jack VanDerhei, a professor in the business school at Temple University and a research fellow at the nonprofit Employee Benefit Research Institute.

He and other financial experts say workers fortunate enough to still have traditional pensions should not rely on them too much for retirement, as the long-term prospects of such plans are increasingly in doubt. While a new law signed last month by President Bush aims to shore up the private pension system by forcing companies to fund their plans more fully, some retirement consultants say the added expense may the trend of companies limiting their plans for existing employees or dropping them for new hires.

As workers make their retirement calculations, they should keep in mind the two, sometimes opposing, principles that govern the U.S. pension system and that the new law, the Pension Protection Act, reaffirmed: An accrued pension can't be wiped out, but companies can walk away from promised future benefits at any time.

That means workers who still have pensions will have to do more homework to determine how much money their plans are likely to provide, experts say. And they should be prepared for the worst-case scenario.

"It's always wise to cast a jaundiced eye on a pension and ask what happens if it doesn't deliver as promised," said James McGrath, a financial planner in Rockville.Changing Times

The traditional pension, also known as a "defined-benefit plan," is typically funded entirely by the employer and offers a steady monthly income, or a lump sum, upon retirement, based on a person's age, salary and years of service. Pension benefits typically accrue most of their value in the last few years of a 20- to 30-year employment cycle. Employers bear the risk and burden of properly investing the pension's funds to ensure full payout of promised benefits.

The costs of maintaining such plans have climbed sharply in the past six years because companies have been forced to put more money into pensions to compensate for lower-than-anticipated returns on investments stemming from low interest rates and declines in stock market values, said Matt Moore, senior analyst at the National Center for Policy Analysis, a nonpartisan think tank in Dallas.

As a result, employers are increasingly embracing other options, especially "defined-contribution plans," the most common of which is the 401(k). Under such plans, companies contribute a set amount each month, ask employees to bear the responsibility of deciding how that money will be invested and then hand over a check at retirement for whatever each account is worth at that moment. In 1978, only 17 percent of the workforce had a defined-contribution benefit. By 2003, the latest numbers available, it was 56 percent.

A smaller number have converted pensions to "cash-balance plans." They work like a pension because a worker gets a specified amount at retirement, but also like a 401(k) because the company puts in a set contribution for each worker -- regardless of age or seniority -- and specifies how the money will increase in value, for example at 1 percent above the interest on 10-year Treasury note. Thirty years ago, no pension plan had been converted to a cash-balance model. Today, an estimated 5.5 million people have converted to a cash-balance program.

Cash-balance plans appeal to a younger, more mobile workforce for two reasons, said J. Mark Iwry, a lawyer who is a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a one of the co-founders of the nonprofit Retirement Security Project. Benefits accrue steadily rather than accelerate sharply after a worker has been at one company for 20 or 30 years. And they are portable: Workers can take what they've accrued when they change jobs.

Those shifts mean that some workers with pensions have the added benefit of a second plan, such as a 401(k), though VanDerhei said that no one knows exactly how big the overlap is. Even so, a sudden drop in the future value of a person's traditional pension can change the retirement picture. Workers have only three options to close or at least narrow the gap between what they thought they would get and what they will get, financial planners say: Postpone retirement and work longer, save more to make up the difference, or accept a lower standard of living in retirement.Prepare for the Worst

The good news for workers with traditional pensions, retirement experts say, is that most plans are fully funded and will probably pay out as expected. And even if a plan isn't fully funded -- which means the employer has not set enough aside to pay all promised benefits -- there is a federally run safety net called the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., which ensures that workers owed a pension get at least something. If a firm goes into bankruptcy protection and is permitted under its reorganization to dump its pension, the PBGC will pay retirees a portion of what they are owed, up to an inflation-adjusted maximum of $47,659, for those who leave the workforce at 65.

Except for well-publicized instances, such as in the airline industry -- where pilots and others at carriers under bankruptcy protection have had to take a cut from the six-figure retirement packages they were owed -- 90 percent of workers paid by the PBGC get 100 percent of what they were due, said PBGC spokesman Randy Clerihue.

The bad news, though, is that no one can bank on a pension benefit continuing to grow as originally promised. So while many private-sector retirement experts say pension holders have many reasons to justify hoping for the best, they recommend preparing for the worst.

Pension holders should have sound estimates of how much they will need during retirement and how much they can expect from their pension, Social Security and personal savings, including 401(k)s and IRAs. Financial planners can help calculate that number and offer advice on how to adjust savings, if necessary. Internet-based retirement calculators are also available on the Web sites of many mutual fund companies and securities firms and some nonprofit consumer groups.

Retirement experts say workers often underestimate what they need. A paper published last week by EBRI concludes that an old rule of thumb that retirees need 75 percent to 85 percent of their pre-retirement income to live comfortably is outdated. A person today probably needs closer to 100 percent, said VanDerhei, the paper's author, because people are living longer and they need to include money for health care not covered by Medicare.

Workers also should check the financial health of their company's plan. The new law requires employers to send workers regular pension statements in plain English -- without misleading accounting tricks -- but not until the end of April 2009, according to the ERISA Industry Committee, a trade group representing the nation's biggest employers on benefit issues. Until then, workers will have to put in extra work to get a clear picture of their pensions. They should contact their company's benefits department for information, though it may be hard to decipher the numbers, retirement consultants say. Employees concerned about their company's plan might consider pooling resources to hire an outside pension consultant to analyze the data.

Clerihue, the PBGC spokesman, said workers also should remember that a fund that looks healthy today, even under the stricter requirements of the new pension law, can quickly fall behind, depending on the economy's, or an industry's, health. He said that in 2000, using an agency calculation that is more conservative than what most companies use, the PBGC had a $23 billion shortfall for about $1.3 trillion in owed pension benefits. Within three years, however, the underfunded amount had grown to $450 billion of $1.6 trillion owed.

Underfunded plans, even at a healthy company, are more likely to be frozen, financial experts say. The benefits consulting firm Watson Wyatt Worldwide Inc. said that last year, 113 of the 1,000 biggest companies in the United States had frozen or terminated a pension plan or had announced plans to do so, nearly double the number in 2004 and 2003 combined.

"If it's not being funded currently, you can expect problems sooner or later," said McGrath, the Rockville financial planner. "If it's healthy, you still need to see how well prepared you'd be if the pension were frozen today, in a year, in five years. It all depends on how old the worker is."Frozen Out

Pensions freezes can happen two ways, said Karen Ferguson, director of the Pension Rights Center, a nonprofit advocacy group. In a "soft freeze," benefits continue as usual for existing employees, but the pension is closed to new hires. In a "hard freeze," such as the one Schuback experienced at Verizon, everyone is affected.

Younger workers stand a greater chance of not getting all they were hoping to get from their pensions. But they have the advantage of having more years to work and save to make up for shortfalls under various scenarios, planners and other experts say. For example, the $223,792 drop in potential value of Schuback's pension isn't as devastating, largely because he's relatively young. And the $245,494 he is on track to get puts him way ahead of many of his peers: It's more than six times the average, $40,000, most people in their thirties have saved, according to EBRI.

Older workers are more likely to have accrued much of their pension benefits. But they will have less time to save for any shortfalls. Financial planners say this group should take full advantage of catch-up programs that allow workers over 50 to put more pretax money into 401(k)s and IRAs.

By assuming a worst-case scenario and bolstering personal savings to compensate, the worst that can happen, McGrath said, "is that you'll retire with too much money. Is that bad?"

Workers within a year or two of retirement who have worked at a company long enough to have locked in full benefits might find they can invest a bigger slice of their savings in stocks than conventional investment wisdom advises for older investors. For example, if a soon-to-retire worker has accrued a pension benefit of $50,000 a year, he might want to take a few bigger risks with other income -- investing in equities rather than bonds, for example, which could help a retiree stand a better chance of keeping up with inflation, McGrath and others said.

Those retiring should take special care when deciding whether to take a lump sum or monthly payments, experts say, because the interest rate companies can use to compute lump-sum payments can disadvantage a worker.

But no advice can help some older employees who have not locked in the full benefits of working two or three decades and did not factor in the possibility that their pensions would be curtailed. For this group, financial consultants say, a freeze or termination amounts to a pay cut. Verizon network services manager Margo Bryerton, 57, who has worked at the company for 18 years, estimated that the freeze lopped $300,000 from the retirement package she expected when she retires at 65. Now, she said, she will have to work past 65, take a second job or possibly sell her house to make up the difference.

"I based everything on faulty thinking. I assumed it would be there," she said. "I'm in that age group where I'm too young to retire but I'm too old to start over. It really is a pay cut for me."

Pension Plans On Ice (KCS)

By Gene Meyer

The Kansas City Star, September 17, 2006

More than 40 million Americans in the nation's nongovernmental work force are either covered by traditional pension plans or expect to be, authorities estimate.

Potentially, three things will happen to the lifetime income streams that these workers and current retirees are expecting after they leave the work force. And two of those — a pension plan being frozen or one being terminated — aren't pretty.

Congress passed, and President Bush signed, legislation last month to strengthen traditional pensions with mandates for employers to increase funding, faster repair requirements for underfunded plans, and some special provisions for troubled airlines with potentially whopping pension problems.

The new law also significantly improved many features of 401(k) plans and other similar products that increasingly have supplanted traditional pensions over the last two decades.

Although surviving pension plans will be stronger, many observers bet that employers will turn even more to 401(k) plans and shift an unprecedented share of the retirement funding load onto workers and their families.

"Of the traditional three-legged stool you use in retirement planning — your pension, your Social Security and your personal savings — you better look in the mirror hardest" to find your most likely source of retirement security, said Sandi Weaver, president of Financial Security Advisors Inc. in Prairie Village.

Some pension plans will be OK because employers will remain flush with funds and can cover the costs of running the accounts.

Having prepared wisely for longer-living retirees and rising costs, these companies will continue mailing out the monthly checks that help put gilt in their workers' golden years.

That's the best outcome. It also is becoming rarer.

Over the past 20 years, the number of traditional pension plans provided by companies — which generations of workers grew to count on — has declined about 73 percent, reports the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., the federally chartered insurer of last resort for the plans. The list of corporations turning to the guaranty corporation seemingly grows every week. Delta Air Lines is the latest notable casualty.

Alternately, a company might freeze its pension plan, a strategy that has become increasingly common. Freezing a plan, such as what happened at Sprint Nextel Corp., preserves the benefits that workers and retirees have earned, but requires employees to chip in more of their own money from then on to help provide secure retirements.

Freezing pensions hits hardest middle-tenure employees who haven't yet hit those peak earning years that plump up their retirement checks and may not have much time left to build big retirement stashes.

Stay ahead of the pain

"This is going to hurt a lot of people if they don't understand the benefits of a 401(k) plan," said Cindy Smith, 46, a Sprint Nextel worker.

In January, Smith's pension funds were frozen along with those of about 39,000 workers. Those workers were urged to enroll in a sweetened matched-contribution 401(k) plan.

Smith already was a 401(k) believer and plan participant when the freeze was declared. She said she didn't expect to feel pinched when her eventual Sprint pension check reflected only the benefits she earned in her first 10 years with the company. She said she thought that for her the enhanced 401(k) benefits Sprint was offering would make up the difference.

Others won't be so lucky.

Boston College's Center for Retirement Research calculates that a 50-year-old, $48,000-a-year worker with 10 years vesting a typical traditional pension plan might see a more than 17 percent reduction in retirement income, to $7,200 a month, if the plan were frozen and replaced with a 401(k).

Individual workers' results will vary widely because their work histories, their pension plans' benefit formulas and the performances of the 401(k) portfolios will differ.

"My dad's generation really counts on pensions, but we need to do more for ourselves," Smith said

Federal solution

Growing numbers of companies have cut back on their traditional pension benefits, either by freezing the plans or paying workers to walk away from the plans.

Others are going or have gone a step further and turned their plans over to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. to run.

Delta, for example, chose this month to end its plan and turn it over to federal insurers.

That's where the federal guaranty corporation steps in, often covering 50 cents or less of each dollar in originally promised benefits.

That could be the most devastating scenario for workers and retirees, especially for lifelong workers who are relying heavily on pension checks for secure retirements, said Doug Black, a financial planner and president of Larson Financial Services Inc.

"There is no easy answer if you haven't been putting aside other funds too," Black said. "Pray, maybe."

Research shows that although Americans in general are abysmal savers, their behavior is all over the lot.

For example, more than a third of the nation's 18- to 44-year-olds have no retirement savings, but some 80 percent of 55-year-olds have at least something stashed away, a recent A.G. Edwards survey found.

Just under 52 percent of an estimated 53 million 25- to 64-year-olds whose employers offer retirement plans of any kind are participating in those plans, which is a nearly two percentage point drop from 2004, the Congressional Research Service reports.

Not money in the bank

Traditional pensions — or defined benefit plans, as they are more formally known — remain squeezed by rising costs, squishier investment returns and the pressure that sponsoring employers feel from global competitors.

"It really has changed the way I advise people," said Kevin Taylor, a financial planner with H&R Block Financial Advisors in Overland Park.

Ten years ago, Taylor might have presumed that pension benefits were like future money in clients' bank accounts, he said. Now he checks to see whether it's possible — and possibly more prudent — for clients to pull lump sums out of the pension now and invest them directly for income in the future.

Taylor and other planners increasingly consider "what if" questions.

What if your company, for example, freezes its pension plan and encourages workers to open 401(k)s instead?

Many planners say that, in general, workers younger than 50 win — if they start putting as much money as possible into the 401(k)s and especially if the employer sweetens those plans as Sprint did.

Workers older than about 60 should be OK too if they've built up enough pension benefits over a couple of decades that a freeze nips only a bit of their accounts. Workers in between are the ones facing the biggest challenge, a broad consensus holds.

Also, rolling lump sums from frozen pension plans into personally managed retirement accounts, as Taylor suggests, won't always be possible. Some plans might not allow that, or they may require you to quit work first.

New breaks

Pension legislation signed last month allows companies to amend their existing plans, if they choose, to allow 62-year-olds to take what are known as in-service distributions, or money from the plans while they remain at their jobs.

These potentially more liberal withdrawal rules also may apply to frozen pension money, though that isn't clear yet.

Be warned: Serious saving will be required to make up lost ground at any stage.

Richard Salmen, a senior vice president at GTrust in Overland Park, said that if savers aren't maxing out their 401(k) contributions already, at a minimum they should notch up savings with at least half of each future pay raise.

Terminated pensions, the ones taken over by the guaranty corporation, are trickier.

First, federal payouts are far less generous than those promised by the companies whose plans failed. Look for your pension check from a guaranty-corporation-run plan to be half or less of what you expected.

Second, the federal insurers have different priorities than the companies whose plans were taken over. Those broadly are to pay retirees who already were receiving benefits first, then split what's left among workers with future claims. .

So workers approaching retirement with lots of benefits in shaky pension plans need to consider staying with their employers until they become first in line for the reduced benefits that the guaranty corporation pays, Weaver said.

"Take a job sweeping the floors if you have to," Weaver said.

Surviving the cut

·Make up for your reduced pension benefits by putting as much as possible in 401(k) or other plans your employer switches to, and in IRAs.

·Consider rolling your accumulated pension benefits into an IRA if your plan allows that. Many won't allow it unless you retire or change jobs, however.

·You may need to postpone your retirement, scale back your expected retirement lifestyle or take a part-time job to make up for pension cuts.

·Pare down your current living expenses now to save additional money on your own for retirement later.

Visions Of The Golden Years Dim As Pension Promises Fade (BOS)

By Robert Gavin, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, September 17, 2006

ESSEX JUNCTION, Vt. -- After the collapse of Digital Equipment Corp. cost him a 16-year career, Larry Millette started over, taking an entry-level factory job at the IBM plant in this Vermont village.

The pay wasn't great. But to Millette, then in his late 40s, IBM offered something more valuable: a generous pension. By working another 15 years or so, then cobbling together his IBM and Digital pensions, Millette figured he could yet enjoy a decent retirement.

But Millette's hopes have vanished in recent years as IBM all but abandoned the pension first promised to him. Today, after 11 years of 12-hour shifts, Millette has just $30,000 in his IBM pension account. He also has a new retirement strategy: ``Work until I can't work anymore."

Millette, now 59, is among hundreds of thousands of workers whose dreams of long, comfortable retirements are getting upended as US corporations shed both the costs and responsibilities of traditional pensions. Faced with intense competition in a global economy, and huge obligations as baby boomers retire, many of the nation's biggest companies are rewriting the social contract that for 60 or more years has bound them to workers.

Since last year, at least a dozen corporations with nearly 1 million US employees either froze pension benefits for current workers, eliminated pension plans for new ones, or both. Today, just over one-third of Fortune 100 companies still offer traditional pensions to new employees, down from one-half in 2002 and 89 percent in 1985, according to Watson Wyatt Worldwide Inc., an Arlington, Va., consulting firm.

The decline reflects a broader retreat by corporate America from its long-standing role as a provider of social safety net programs such as pensions and health insurance. Under pressure from investors to produce bigger profits and global competitors that don't provide similar benefits, US firms are withdrawing from these obligations and shifting risks, responsibilities, and costs to their workers.

The shift comes as both corporate profits and executive pay soar. Combined profits of the nation's 500 biggest public corporations are at record levels, having grown at double-digit rates for three years, according to Thomson First Call, a Boston research firm that surveys stock analysts and tracks corporate earnings. In about the same period, the average compensation of chief executives at these companies jumped more than 40 percent to $11.7 million a year, according to the Corporate Library, a research firm in Portland, Maine.

At IBM, for example, profits rose 7 percent in 2005, while Chief Executive Samuel J. Palmisano's pay jumped 29 percent to $11.4 million, including salary, bonus, and incentives, according to Securities and Exchange Commission filings. Palmisano, 55, who has worked more than 30 years at IBM, will receive a pension of about $4 million a year when he retires.

Certainly, by today's standards, IBM remains a generous employer. For example, unlike many companies that neglected to set aside enough money to cover future pension payouts, IBM has contributed $6.4 billion in the past four years to keep its US plans well-funded.

IBM once epitomized the old social contract of employee loyalty and corporate paternalism, refraining from layoffs during the Great Depression. The company promised lifetime employment, cradle-to-grave benefits, and a relationship built on the principle ``Respect for the individual."

But in the tumultuous 1990s, battered by changing technology and fierce competition, IBM began to reduce pensions and to redefine its relationship with workers. During a major pension redesign in the late 1990s, company memos described the need to ``eliminate the concept of retirement to the extent possible" and ``not create long-term incentives to remain at IBM."

The traditional pension was the cornerstone of the old paternalism. Companies made contributions to pension funds on their workers' behalf; managed the investment of the funds; and assumed the risks of generating enough income to support retired workers until death. Regardless of market conditions, retirees got their pension checks each month.

Now companies are replacing traditional pensions with saving plans such as 401(k)s, which can cut companies' costs by as much as half. Employers make set contributions to individual retirement accounts, and they're done. Choosing investments, navigating the ups and downs of financial markets, and putting aside enough money to last through retirement become the problems of workers.

Given disciplined savings, smart choices, and especially time, 401(k)s can produce greater retirement income than traditional pensions. But for Millette and other workers nearing retirement, time is something they don't have.

Millette knew the world was changing when he joined IBM. His layoff from Digital had taught him that. Still, during his orientation at IBM, which included an entire day to explain benefits, Millette was assured he could yet find security.

``They kept telling us, `If you're a good employee, a loyal employee, and you do your job, you're going to get all these benefits'," Millette said. ``Then someone signs a paper, and you get almost nothing."

Pensions are born Millette works seven 12-hour shifts over the course of two weeks. He's on the manufacturing floor of IBM's semiconductor plant by 6:45 a.m., 15 minutes before his shift starts.

Dressed head-to-toe in a white ``bunny" suit, he spends 10 of the next 12 hours on his feet in an IBM clean room, shuttling between nine tools that plate silicon wafers used in computer chips. When Millette gets home shortly before 8 p.m, he can barely stay awake another hour.

Millette never had big plans for retirement. He just looked forward to puttering around his home in Milton, Vt., tending to the tomatoes, cucumbers, and peppers in his garden; pruning the fruit trees he planted; making wine from his home-grown fruit. He thought he'd see more of his four grandchildren, and maybe even take a trip with his wife of 31 years, Rose.

``You know," he said, ``just enjoying whatever time we had left."

The idea of retirement as a time to relax, travel, and pursue interests put aside during working years is a modern phenomenon. A century ago, two of three men worked past the age of 64. The average age of retirement was 74. The average length of retirement: three years.

``If you look at people in the past, they continued to work in incredible amounts of pain," said Dora L. Costa, an MIT economics professor and author of ``The Evolution of Retirement." ``When they couldn't work anymore, they moved in with their children."

Social Security, enacted in 1935, began to change the nature of retirement. At the time, pensions were unusual. But with the outbreak of World War II and the drain on the labor force, more firms offered pensions, health insurance, and other so-called fringe benefits to attract and retain workers.

Meanwhile, high tax rates to finance the war made these programs attractive to both companies and workers, since firms could deduct their contributions and workers didn't have to pay income taxes on the benefits. The system eventually became institutionalized in company policies and union contracts. The result: Corporate-sponsored cradle-to-grave social insurance.

In 1950, the average retirement age was still 70. By 1983, it had slipped to 63, where it remains. Many analysts, however, now expect the age to rise as pension benefits dwindle and health-care costs increase.

Dreams of security Millette's views of retirement were shaped by his late father, Joseph, who worked for 35 years as a toolmaker at General Electric Co. in Burlington, Vt., retiring nearly 20 years ago with a pension, health benefits, and the economic security the next generation of workers would come to expect.

Millette grew up in Burlington, one of six children. He dropped out of high school to join the Army and spent four years in the service, including a tour in Vietnam. Stationed at a medivac hospital that came under regular mortar fire, he fought in the Tet Offensive, the fierce 1968 attack by North Vietnam that changed the course of the war. He returned home with two service medals, a general equivalency diploma, and a hearing loss that requires him to wear a hearing aid.

In 1977, after several modest jobs, he heard Digital Equipment Corp. was opening a plant in South Burlington. Like IBM, which had opened its Essex Junction plant in 1957, Digital boasted good pay, generous benefits, and a chance for the long-term security that Millette's father had earned.

``The attitude then was, `Thank you for working for us, for being a loyal employee,' " recalled Millette, who still has his Digital badge, No. 61763, and proudly notes he was Digital's 62 d hire in Vermont. ``I thought if I worked hard, did a good job, I wouldn't have anything to worry about."

Millette started at $2.85 an hour, but double-digit raises came every six months as Digital grew rapidly. He was promoted from solderer to inspector, technician, supervisor, and manager. He bought a three-bedroom home on a half-acre, for $41,000.

At the time, Millette's brother, John, worked for IBM, making for explosive family get-togethers. The brothers would argue the superiority of IBM or Digital with the intensity of Yankees and Red Sox fans. Eventually, their relatives imposed a new rule: No more talking about work.

``We both thought we worked for the best companies in the world," John Millette said. ``I ate, slept, and drank IBM. It was all first-class. If you worked hard and kept your nose clean, you had opportunity. You had a job for life."

Enter the `new economy' Thomas J. Watson Sr., a one-time traveling salesman, built IBM from a struggling conglomerate that made scales, time clocks, and mechanical accounting machines. Assuming the company's leadership in 1914, he forged IBM into a progressive employer, offering good pay, reasonable hours, safe conditions, and even vacations in an era before such policies were common. He once lectured executives that their prime duty was to employ people.

His son and successor, Thomas Watson Jr., brought the company into the computer age, stressing his father's principles of loyalty, dedication, and corporate responsibility. ``I wanted IBM to be recognized as one of the most generous employers in America," the younger Watson wrote in his memoir.

Watson Jr. retired as chairman and CEO in 1971. By the 1980s, IBM and its core product, the mainframe computer, were under assault from new technologies and new competitors, such as Microsoft Corp.

The ``new economy" firms had different relationships with employees, market-based rather than paternalistic. Instead of security, they offer the chance of big payoffs through stock and stock options. Instead of the stability of traditional pensions, they offered the growth potential and mobility of 401(k) plans.

The 401(k), a tax-deferred savings plan, was created in 1978 and named for the section of the US tax code in which its rules are spelled out. A 401(k) is a ``defined contribution" plan, because employers contribute a set amount to employee retirement, often tied to how much workers themselves contribute. Ultimately, this form of retirement plan depends heavily on workers' investment decisions and the performance of financial markets.

A traditional pension, on the other hand, is known as a defined benefit plan. Employers promise to pay workers a set benefit for life after they retire, based on earnings and years of service.

As the cost to companies has escalated, the number of defined benefit plans has fallen by half since 1980, while defined contribution plans have quadrupled, according to the Center for Retirement Research at Boston College. Sixty-five percent of workers with pensions were covered by defined benefit plans in 1980, compared to 30 percent in 2003, the most recent data available.

Several factors are driving the transformation. Many companies view 401(k)s as more attractive because workers, now more mobile, can take the money they build up with them to new jobs. A 401(k) typically costs less for companies. Perhaps most important, the costs, essentially fixed by contribution levels, are predictable.

That's hardly the case with traditional pensions. To meet long-term obligations, companies invest pension funds in stocks and bonds, and make additional contributions as needed. But the amounts can swing wildly, with rising markets reducing corporate contributions and declining markets having the opposite effect.

During the bull markets of the 1980s and 1990s, US corporations made average pension contributions of about $30 billion a year, according to the Center for Retirement Research. When the stock market crashed, the contributions jumped to $45 billion in 2001, and $100 billion in each of the next two years.

Many analysts expect the recently enacted pension reform law to accelerate the shift to 401(k)s, because the law requires bigger corporate contributions to underfunded pension plans and increases exposure to market swings.

``Firms want to get rid of uncertainty, and they're basically shifting it to employees," said Jack VanDerhei, a fellow at the Employee Benefit Research Institute, a think tank in Washington.

Handing out layoff notices In the early 1990s, the same competitive forces buffeting IBM slammed Digital Equipment Corp. After nearly 16 years at Digital, Millette had risen from the factory floor to a manager's office. Now, he was handing out layoff notices.

``What do you mean?" he still remembers stunned co-workers saying. ``I'm doing my job."

Millette's own layoff came at the end of 1992. A few months later, Digital shuttered its Vermont plant.

Millette was 45, and, for the first time in his life, worried about retirement. He had always counted on a 30-year career at Digital and the healthy Digital pension, so he hadn't saved a lot. His wife, then a self-employed hair dresser working in her own small shop in Burlington, had no pension at all.

Millette soon found a job in quality control at a pharmaceutical company in St. Albans, near the Canadian border. But two years later, when he heard IBM was hiring in Essex Junction, east of Burlington, he jumped at the chance.

The commute was shorter and he preferred working in technology. Most important, the entry-level job, although paying about half his last Digital salary of about $23 an hour, offered a pension that would help fund his retirement.

``You get to a point in life where you say, `I'm 40-something-years old, and I'm looking for a job,' " Millette said. ``I needed a bridge to retirement. IBM gave me an opportunity to recover from my layoff."

Changes begin at IBM

By the time Millette joined IBM in 1995, it was undergoing dramatic changes. Two years earlier, bleeding revenues, profits, and market share, IBM abandoned its no-layoff policy and began slashing tens of thousands of jobs. The company then turned to Louis V. Gerstner Jr. to save it from collapse.

Gerstner, the first outsider to lead IBM, arrived via RJR Nabisco Inc. He engineered what became a legendary turnaround. He also re-engineered the relationship with workers. In 1997, IBM launched a redesign of the employee pension plan that cut benefits, laying the groundwork for further reductions later.

As a February 1998 IBM draft memo explained, new retirement policies should ``move away from entitlement focus; eliminate the concept of retirement to the extent possible;" and ``not create long-term incentives to remain at IBM."

DOJ_NMG_0064995

The memo was one of many filed as evidence in an age discrimination lawsuit brought by employees after IBM completed the pension redesign in 1999. A federal appeals court in Chicago recently ruled IBM's plan did not discriminate, but plaintiffs plan to appeal to the Supreme Court.

The revamped pension adopted by IBM is known as a cash-balance plan, which has features similar to 401(k)s. Companies essentially make annual contributions to individual employee retirement accounts, which grow at interest rates tied to short-term Treasury bills.

When workers retire, they can take their pension earnings as lump sums or convert them to annuities, which provide monthly payouts for life. As with 401(k)s, workers also can take these retirement accounts with them when they change jobs.

Employers, in turn, get more predictable costs, typically lower than traditional pensions. IBM, for example, estimated the cash-balance conversion would cut pension costs by as much as $472 million annually in the first 10 years, according to IBM memos filed in the age-discrimination suit.

IBM was one of several companies converting to cash-balance plans in the 1990s in the face of projections that pension obligations would balloon. Retirees were living far longer than they did when traditional plans were adopted, and the approaching retirement of some 78 million baby boomers only promised to add costs. What's more, the company was locked in competition with younger technology companies that had never offered traditional pensions.

The problem with IBM's pension plan, an undated memo argued, was that it provided ``benefits that substantially exceed'' IBM's competitors while continuing ``to reflect a lifetime employment model, which is no longer presumptively the right model.'' Instead, IBM needed to expose its workers to market forces, so they would ``share in the rewards and risks, along with IBM's shareholders,'' according to the February 1998 draft memo.

IBM executives also said they were competing for talent, and the portability of cash-balance would appeal to younger workers who didn't expect or seek lifetime employment. But, they acknowledged, it wouldn't be so good for older employees -- particularly those with short tenures, such as Millette, who could lose nearly half their benefits.

IBM officials declined to comment on the memos because the case is still in court. But generally, said Randy MacDonald, IBM's senior vice president for human resources, the company has changed benefits as the competition and workforce have changed.

Executive pay soars With a job at IBM, Larry Millette's life had at last stabilized. His performance ratings were high. Raises followed. His benefits seemed solid. He was perfectly content working on the manufacturing floor.

As he settled onto IBM's production line, taking less than one sick day a year, Millette had no idea executives were embarking on a course that would cut his promised pension in half. There was little reason to suspect it.

Gerstner's turnaround strategy had succeeded. Profits totaled about $20 billion from 1997 to 1999, and IBM's stock price hit new highs. The pension fund was healthy, too. At the end of 1997, shortly after IBM began efforts to cut pension costs, the fund had a surplus -- $8 billion more than needed to cover obligations.

The pension fund, in fact, was generating profits for IBM. Under accounting rules, pension fund investment returns that exceed current and some previous costs increase a company's earnings, just as investment returns that fall short of such costs reduce earnings. By 2001, excess returns grew to 13 percent of IBM's profit, up from 8 percent in 1999, when the cash balance plan was put in place.

The impact of pension income on IBM's bottom line was important to company executives, whose compensation was increasingly based on IBM's financial performance. Gerstner believed executives should face the same risks as shareholders, and tied compensation to profits and stock price through bonuses, stock options, and other incentives.

During his tenure, the top five executives, Gerstner included, were awarded options for around 6 million shares, valued at the time between $300 million and $900 million, depending on possible appreciation, according to SEC filings. These executives received the most options in 1997, just as the project to cut pension costs got underway.

Gerstner, through an IBM spokesman, declined to be interviewed. MacDonald, the human resources executive, said potential stock gains for executives never played a role in pension changes. ``To suggest a quid pro quo is completely irresponsible,'' he said.

Still, surging executive pay in boardrooms across America has likely played a role in the erosion of traditional pensions, said Alicia Munnell, director of the Center for Retirement Research. Employee pension plans cap benefits at about four times average wages to qualify for federal tax breaks. But as CEO pay soared to nearly 400 times average wages, these benefits became inconsequential to executives.

``The conventional pension system is really not something they relate to,'' Munnell said.

Many companies, including IBM, created separate executive pension plans to provide retirement benefits above the cap, further disconnecting corporate officers from employee pensions, Munnell said. In Gerstner's case, his $1.1 million-a-year pension was negotiated in his contract, and unaffected by changes to the employee and executive pensions.

Gerstner retired from IBM in 2002, at 60, having engineered one of the greatest corporate turnarounds in history. On top of his pension, he was granted 125,000 shares of IBM stock, with an estimated value of about $14 million, and a 10-year consulting contract that gives him access to IBM perks, such as corporate cars and aircraft. As a consultant, he gets daily fees based on his final salary of $2 million a year. He also held nearly $150 million in unexercised stock options.

`The rules have changed' IBM unveiled the cash-balance plan in 1999, but it sparked such outrage among employees that the company allowed those over 40, with at least 10 years of service, the choice of keeping the old pension. Millette, with only four years at IBM, didn't get the choice. He was 52.

Today, seven years later, Millette's pension is changing again, and he's not sure it's for the better. In January, IBM said it would freeze pension benefits at the end of 2007 and put in place one of the nation's most generous 401(k) plans, more than doubling IBM contributions to employee accounts.

The company projects that that move and changes in other countries will cut pension costs by as much as $3 billion through 2010. MacDonald, the human resources executive, said IBM faces competitors from Asia and Latin America with far lower costs. If IBM fails to control costs, MacDonald said, the company risks the fate of US steelmakers, automakers, and airlines, which have plunged into or near bankruptcy, slashed tens of thousands of jobs, and, in some cases, abandoned pension obligations altogether.

``We have to evolve with our competition," MacDonald said. ``In the end, our employees understand, this is all about their employment security."

The 26,000 employees still in the traditional-type plan feel the greatest impact from the freeze. But IBM estimates 401(k) contributions -- up to 10 percent of pay -- and investment returns will offset benefit losses. Most of these workers will lose 5 percent or less of their retirement benefits, IBM said.

For employees in the cash-balance plan, IBM will contribute the same amount to their retirement -- up to 8 percent of pay -- but all of it will go into 401(k)s, instead of being divided between cash-balance and 401(k) accounts.

But not ending up worse is cold comfort to Millette, who lost about half his promised pension in the cash-balance conversion.

Millette's retirement problems really began with his Digital layoff. Traditional pensions are structured to gain their greatest value in the final few years of a 30- or 35-year career, so Millette never had the chance to earn those benefits. And he could never make them up.

When the IBM pension freeze goes into effect at the end of next year, Millette will be 60. Using his current earnings of about $40,000 a year, and assuming an annual rate of return of 8 percent, Millette would have to work at least 12 more years before IBM's additional 401(k) contributions equal the benefits he would have received at 65 under the pension he was first promised. That would make him 72.

Millette once thought he might be able to stop working at 62 or 63, but not anymore. Still, he considers himself lucky. He at least has some pension benefits coming from IBM as well as nearly $800 a month from his Digital plan. He has also boosted his 401(k) savings to 17 percent from 15 percent of his pay.

Still with his retirement increasingly dependent on Wall Street, it's hard to feel very secure, Millette said. In addition, health care costs are surging, and could very quickly gobble up retirement income.

``We're comfortable and I'd like to keep this same comfortable feeling," said Millette's wife, Rose, 56. ``I'm worried we won't be able to."

Sitting in the living room of their home, Millette recalled his early days at Digital, when everything seemed secure, and the day he was hired at IBM, when it seemed all right again. Today, Millette says he feels lucky to have a job at all.

IBM laid off hundreds of workers in Vermont a few years ago, and has shed some manufacturing operations. Last year, for example, IBM sold its personal computer unit to Chinese computer maker Lenovo, which later cut 1,000 jobs.

IBM arrived in Essex Junction a half century ago, providing new hope to a community reeling from the shutdown of three textile mills. A job at IBM quickly came to mean good pay, expansive benefits, and lifetime employment.

In recent months, as Millette pulled into work in dusk of early morning, he was reminded how much things have changed. Stretched at the entrance of sprawling complex, a sign advertised for temporary manufacturing workers. Length of job: No more than three years.

``My father, he was in the generation where you worked for a company your whole life, and everything was taken care of," Millette said. ``But all the attitudes have changed. All the rules have changed."

In Campaign Ads For Democrats, Bush Is The Star (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064997

WASHINGTON, Sept. 16 — From Rhode Island to New Mexico, from Connecticut to Tennessee, President Bush is emerging as the marquee name in this fall's Congressional elections — courtesy not of his Republican Party but of the Democrats.

A review of dozens of campaign commercials finds that Mr. Bush has become the star of the Democrats' advertisement war this fall. He is pictured standing alone and next to Republican senators and members of Congress, his name intoned by ominous-sounding announcers. Republican candidates are damned in the advertisements by the number of times they have voted with Mr. Bush in Congress.

Not surprisingly, given that Mr. Bush's job approval rating continues to hover around 40 percent, it is hard to spot the president in any of the Republican advertisements that were reviewed. In what may be taken as an indication of changing Republican tastes, Senator John McCain of Arizona is popping up everywhere.

There is Mr. Bush on television screens in Colorado, in an advertisement urging the election of Angie Paccione, a Democrat, leaning over to plant a big kiss on the forehead of Representative Marilyn Musgrave, a Republican.

There is Mr. Bush on the television screens in New Mexico, standing on a stage shoulder-to-shoulder with Representative Heather A. Wilson, a Republican struggling to keep her seat. "Heather Wilson supports George Bush on the war in Iraq with no questions asked," the announcer says, in an advertisement for Patricia Madrid, the Democrat.

The White House has entered this campaign season looking to seize control of the political dialogue by moving the debate away from issues like Iraq and to Mr. Bush's role in the campaign against terrorism. The decision by Democrats to invest in advertising directly attacking the war in Iraq, the administration's war on terrorism and the once overwhelmingly popular president is a marked turn from how they handled these issues in 2002 and 2004.

The emergence of this recurrent theme in Democratic advertising is not a coordinated push by the legions of consultants, party leaders, campaign managers and candidates. Democrats said using advertisements involving Mr. Bush was almost an obvious thing to do, given his lack of popularity, and reflects the effort by many in the party to turn this election into a national referendum on Mr. Bush.

"In certain districts he's exactly who we want to pivot off," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat leading the effort to win the House. "I tell all the candidates: Him and his agenda are on the ballot this year."

Evan Tracey, chief operating officer of the Campaign Media Analysis Group, a firm based in Virginia that tracks advertising, said Saturday that candidates and independent issue groups had already spent $900 million on statewide and national campaigns this year. Mr. Tracey said he expected that by Election Day, the spending would be $1.6 billion, a new record. At a minimum, millions are being spent by the Democrats on ads featuring Mr. Bush.

The strategy has risks. In part, the goal of the Democrats' advertisements is to rile up their base. But Glen Bolger, a Republican pollster, said that the constant attacks on Mr. Bush appeared to be accomplishing something Republicans had been unable to do: riling up Republican base voters.

"One thing we are seeing in our polling is that the Democratic campaign is helping to jazz up Republican voters," Mr. Bolger said. "There are two concerns among Republicans: Is our base going to turn out, and how are we going to get out swing voters. The Democrats are taking care of our first concern."
